LORD GIFFORD.—The main, and, indeed, the only question raised in this special case is, whether the children of John Cunningham, one of the brothers and residuary legatees of the testator, are entitled, in virtue of the implied condition si sine liberis, to the share which their father, the deceased John Cunningham, would have taken had he survived the testator. I do not think the other questions in the case are attended with any difficulty, and on these other questions I concur in the result at which your Lordships have arrived.

On the question of the condition si sine liberis, however, I have felt very great difficulty indeed, and, although it is with great hesitation and doubt that I venture to differ from your Lordships, I feel myself unable to concur in laying down the rule or principle which I understand to be indicated in the opinions which have just been expressed, that in general and apart from special circumstances the condition si sine liberis will not be held as implied where a testator names his brothers and sisters as his residuary or universal legatees. I hesitate to adopt a rule which, whatever its convenience, I scarcely think warranted either in itself or with reference to the authorities and decisions which have been pronounced. In the present case I incline to think that, looking to the whole circumstances, the terms of the testament in question, the position in which the testator stood, and his relation to the legatees named, the testator must have intended, in the event of any of his brothers and sisters predeceasing him leaving issue, that such issue should take their parents' share. I do not feel compelled, by any of the decisions which have been pronounced, to hold that children are excluded, and I cannot help feeling that it is more in accordance with the probable intentions of the testator to let in the claim of John Cunningham's children than to exclude them altogether.

Two cases seem to be clear upon the authorities. When legacies or shares of residue are bequeathed by a testator to strangers in blood, or even to distant relatives nominatim, without any mention of children or issue, such legacies lapse by the legatee predeceasing the testator, and cannot be claimed by the children or heirs of the legatee. The bequest is held to be personal to the legatee himself—to have been given from personal affection or upon personal grounds, and it does not go to the legatee's children when the legatee himself predeceases the testator unless the will expressly so provides. The general rule holds that legacies lapse by the predecease of the legatee.

The other case seems equally clearly fixed by the authorities, that when a father makes provisions, whether by way of legacy or by share of residue or otherwise, for his child or children, or for his grandchild or grandchildren, or other descendants, and the children or grandchildren so favoured predecease the testator leaving issue, such issue will take their parent's provision or share unless the testator has expressly excluded them. The conditio si sine liberis is always held implied in bequests or provisions to descendants, but not in the case of bequests or provisions to strangers. Of course if there is anything in the deed explaining the testator's intention that must be given effect to. I am only dealing with cases where the deed is silent.

The cases attended with difficulty are those intermediate between the two classes I have just specified,—that is, where the bequest is not to strangers nominatim, or to children or descendants, but to collateral relatives either called by name or as a class, and here it is very difficult to lay down a satisfactory principle.

It seems to be fixed that in a bequest to nephews and nieces of the testator, if some of them predecease the testator leaving issue, such issue will in general take their parent's share, and this seems to hold not only where they are called simply as a class, as for example "to all my nephews and nieces," or "to all the children of my brothers," or in some similar way, but also in the case where the nephews and nieces are named, provided that the enumeration embraces the whole nephews and nieces so as not to raise any indication that some are excluded.

The question now raised is whether the same presumption applies to a bequest in favour of the brothers and sisters of the testator. Does a bequest to "brothers and sisters," without anything else being said, imply a provision that if any of the brothers and sisters predecease the testator leaving issue, such issue shall take the share which would have belonged to their parent if he or she had survived the testator? Now, on the whole, and though not without great hesitation (all the greater that I am differing from your Lordships), I incline to hold that it does. I shall come to the specialties of the present case immediately. At present I am taking the case quite generally, as if the residuary or universal bequest had run "to my brothers and sisters equally share and share alike." Such a bequest I think implies that if any of the brothers and sisters predecease their issue shall take their place.

This is undoubtedly the law in regard to bequests to nephews and nieces. Why should the law be different when the bequest is to brothers and sisters? The only reason given, I think the only reason that can be given, is that an uncle is in loco parentis to his nephews and nieces, but is not so to his brothers and sisters. This may be true in some cases, or perhaps in many cases, but it is certainly not true in all cases. For example, if a man's own brother is alive and at the head of his family it can hardly be said that he, the uncle, is in loco parentis to his brother's children; the locus is occupied by the father himself. A man's nephews and nieces, if the children of a much elder brother, may be all older than himself, or in positions which make it unreasonable to say that he is in loco parentis to them; and, on the other hand, in the case of an elder brother, he may be so much older than the other children, especially if only consanguinean, as to be far more in loco parentis to them than he could ever be to nephews and nieces in other circumstances. It is dangerous to make a legal presumption that one person is in loco parentis to another. I rather think that this will always depend upon circumstances apart from the case of direct descendants.

Blair's Executors, &c. v. Taylor, &c.

But, farther, I scarcely think that even when mere relationship may raise a presumption of a testator being in loco parentis to beneficiaries that this is the true principle. I rather think the true principle is, does the testator, by the terms of his will, place himself in loco parentis, and can it be gathered from the deed that he assumes the duties or the burdens of a parent and is in this sense and by his own act in loco parentis? If so and even in the case of strangers in blood there might be the very strongest reasons for implying the condition si sine liberis. For example, if a testator should use such language as this: "As my adopted son, whom I intended to make my heir, has unfortunately predeceased me, I leave the residue of my estate to his children equally among them." In such a case as this I should be very much inclined to hold that grandchildren would take if any of the immediate children failed, and this although there was no tie of blood or relationship whatever with the testator. It is true the word children sometimes includes grandchildren or great-grandchildren, but I do not think in the case I have put it would make any or much difference if the testator instead of merely calling the children of his adopted son had named them all and described them as such. But there is express decision that the condition si sine liberis applies not only to bequests to nephews and nieces to whom an uncle may very often be said to be in loco parentis even when his brother or sister, their parent, is alive, but to the case of a bequest or provision to a testator's cousins. I allude of course to the case of Christie v. Patersons, 1 Shaw 543, new ed. 498; and although I know that this decision has been doubted, yet I think it has never been, either expressly or by implication, reversed or overturned, and I hesitate to do so without calling in the Judges of the other Division. Christie v. Patersons was decided by the First Division, and although there were specialties in it—for example, the cousins were described as "children of the brothers and sisters of my mother who shall be in life at my death,"—still the decision is not put upon specialties, such as the meaning of the word "children," but upon the relationship of the legatees, and the judgment bears to be in respect of the cases Wallace v. Wallace, Mor. Clause, App. 6, and Mackenzie v. Holt, Mor. 6602. Wallace was the case of nephews' children. In Mackenzie v. Holt it was the children of relatives, but the precise degree of relationship does not exactly appear. I cannot, merely on account of the doubts which have been expressed as to Christie v. Patersons, absolutely reverse that decision, as I think we are now asked to do. I do not think the doubts expressed in Rhind's Trustees v. Leith, 5 Macph. 101, warrant us, without calling in our brethren, in introducing another rule, especially as I am by no means satisfied that on general principles the rule should be so narrow as is now proposed.

The specialties in the present case seem to me strongly to favour the claim of John Cunningham's children, though here also I may well hesitate when I find myself in opposition to your Lordships. The testator bequeaths his whole estate first to his father as sole and universal legatory, and it is only in case the father should die before him that he substitutes for his father his whole brothers and sisters. I think this seems to shew that it was because they were all descended from the same father that the brothers and sisters were instituted residuary legatees. It was because they would succeed to the father that the testator made them his own successors, and the same reason, the tie of blood, would apply to brothers' children. They too will take not from personal reasons but because they are the grandchildren of the testator's father. Still farther, there is no express institution of survivors. The brothers and sisters alone are named to take equally, and nothing is said of survivors; and although in a conjunct bequest the effect may be the same as if survivors had been called, it is certainly a stronger case for the issue of predeceasers taking their parent's share.

On the whole, putting myself in the testator's place, as I am bound to do by the true canon of construction, and reading the testator's words as nearly as I can in the sense in which he must have used them—and this is the way to gather the intention of the testator—I cannot help thinking that he did not intend to provide that if any of his brothers and sisters predeceased him leaving children such children should be excluded from his succession.

Horn, for the second parties, asked whether the Court intended to decide the first question. He understood the majority of their Lordships to take the view that the bequest was given to the legatees nominatim and not as a class. He referred to the alternative argument for the second parties, viz., that the bequest being given in shares, the principle of accretion did not apply, and that the shares of beneficiaries who died before the testator fell into intestacy.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Assuming that we are right in holding that the condition si sine liberis does not apply, it necessarily follows that the intention of the testator was that those of his brothers and sisters whom he named in the deed who might survive him should take the whole of the property he should leave. Such, I am quite clear, was the meaning of the testator, and the true construction of the settlement. Whether the bequests were to be held to be to a class or not, as far as the conditio si sine liberis is concerned, does not affect this second question.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"The Lords . . . . are of opinion and find (1) that the two shares of the estate of the late Charles Cunningham provided by him to his brothers Archibald and John, who predeceased him, have not lapsed into intestacy, nor either of them; (2) that the brothers and sisters of Charles Cunningham who survived him have right to these shares to the exclusion of the said deceased John Cunningham; (3) that the children of John Cunningham have no right to the share of the testator's estate provided to their father; and (4) that they have no right to a proportional part of the share provided to their deceased uncle, Archibald Cunningham; and decern."

2D DIVISION. I.

JOHN NICOL left this holograph will:—"John Nicol, his last will and testament. . . . . Commits . . . . his estate to be disposed of as under, viz.:—To his half-brother, David Fletcher's children, five shares; to his half-brother, James Fletcher's children, seven shares; to his brother, Thomas Nicol, seven shares; the whole to be divided into nineteen equal shares." The testator was unmarried. Thomas Nicol was his only full brother, and David and James Fletcher, who were both dead at the date of the will, were the only children of his mother by a previous marriage.

In a special case presented by the parties interested, it was stated that the number of shares given to each step-brother's family corresponded with the number of children of which each family was composed when all were alive.

The Court, proceeding to some extent upon the implication of the testator's intention to be gathered from this coincidence, held that descendants of those children of David and James Fletcher who predeceased the testator were entitled to the shares of the residue of his estate to which their parents would have been entitled had they survived the testator, John Nicol.

Sale—Suspensive Condition—Delivery—Bankrupt.—The terms of a contract of sale of flax were set forth in the following note by the sellers:—"We confirm the sale made to you of . . . 10 tons . . . flax at £40, 10s. per ton, ex warehouse. Draft at 4 months from this date." The goods were forwarded by railway on the evening of Friday, 27th November, and were delivered at the buyer's warehouse next morning, when they were received into stock and partly used by the buyer's manager without his knowledge. On the same day, Saturday, a letter of advice, invoice, and bill, were posted by the sellers, and received by the buyer at his private residence after business hours. The buyer on calling at his works on Monday morning, for the first time learned that the goods had arrived, but before he had given any instructions regarding them he received a letter from his banker restricting his credit to an extent which obliged him to stop payment. The buyer then directed the goods to be put aside, and did not accept the bill.

In a question between the sellers and the trustee for the buyer's creditors, held (1) that the acceptance of the bill was a suspensive condition of the sale, and that, until it was implemented, delivery of the goods did not pass the property; (2) That the sellers had not waived their right to insist upon the condition by forwarding the goods before receiving the acceptance; and, therefore, (3) that the sellers were entitled to restitution of the goods.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Forfarshire. I.

THIS petition was presented in the Sheriff Court of Forfarshire on 3d December 1874 by Messrs Richard Brandt and Company, merchants, Dundee, against Robert Lumgair, manufacturer, Arbroath, and on his sequestration, on 11th December 1874, was insisted in against James Anderson Dickson, the trustee on his sequestrated estate. The petition was brought to obtain restitution of 10 tons of flax, which had been sent by the petitioners to Mr Lumgair's works in November 1874, in the following circumstances, which were brought out in a proof ordered when the case was brought by appeal before the Court of Session

Brandt and Company, the petitioners, on Tuesday, 24th November 1874, agreed to sell to Mr Lumgair 10 tons of flax, on the terms contained in the following note:—"To Robert Lumgair, Esq., Arbroath.

No. 64. Jan. 18, 1876. Brandt & Co. v. Dickson.

Dundee, 24th Nov. 1874.—We confirm the sale made to you to-day, of, ex 'Success' in Dundee public warehouses, about 10 tons superior Stararussa 12 hd. flax, at £40, 10s. p. ton, ex warehouse. Draft at 4 months from this date, and 1% discount. Should we require the draft payable in London, we shall allow the usual retiring charges of 2s. 6d. %. RICHARD BRANDT & Co."

The flax was weighed at the Dundee public warehouses between the hours of 3 and 5 o'clock P.M. on Friday, 27th November 1874, and was the same day delivered to the Caledonian Railway Company for transmission to Arbroath. The goods were forwarded the same evening, and were delivered at Mr Lumgair's warehouse on Saturday morning. The same day a portion of the flax was heckled by directions of the foreman.

On Saturday Messrs Brandt and Company wrote,—"To Robert Lumgair, Esq., Arbroath. Dundee, 28th November 1874.—Confirming our letter of 24th inst. we herewith beg to advise you having forwarded to your address of the Stararussa, 12 hd. flax, ex 'Success,' 182 bobbins and 22 hds. wg. 200 cwt. 2, 24 lbs, which we trust you will receive in good order.

"Enclosed we beg to hand you our invoice, amounting to £401, 17s. 7d., as well as our bill at 4 months, which please accept payable in London, and return to us in due time. RICHD. BRANDT & Co."

Enclosed in this letter was an invoice which had been prepared on the forenoon of the 28th November from the weigh-notes, and a bill for the amount of the invoice price drawn on London at four months from 24th November 1874. The letter was posted at Dundee between 1 and 2 P.M. on the 28th, and on the same day was received by Mr Lumgair after business hours (between 5 and 6 o'clock) at his private residence.

Mr Lumgair became aware of the arrival of the flax on Monday morning when on his way from his house to his office, by seeing it lying in the warehouse, but gave no instructions regarding it. On arriving at his office he had not accepted the bill when he received a letter from the Commercial Bank, with which he dealt, restricting his credit to an extent which made it necessary for him to suspend payment. After having resolved to stop payment Mr Lumgair was occupied for some hours making arrangements for submitting his affairs to a meeting of his creditors; but between three and four o'clock he sent down an order to his heckling foreman not to begin to the flax, and if he had begun to it to stop, and to lay it aside. This was accordingly done, even that portion of it which had been heckled being perfectly separable.

The petitioners pleaded;—The respondent being, and knowing himself to be insolvent at the time of transacting with the petitioners, and not having disclosed to the petitioners the true state of his affairs, the transaction between them and him was and is null and void, and they are entitled to redelivery and restitution of the flax sold as aforesaid. (2) The respondent being and knowing himself to be in insolvent circumstances at the time of receiving the flax, the petitioners are entitled to redelivery and restitution thereof. (6) The respondent never having granted his acceptance as stipulated, the delivery which took place did not pass the property in the flax libelled. (7) At least the respondent, on determining, by reason of his insolvency, not to grant his acceptance as stipulated, was bound to return the flax libelled.

The Sheriff-substitute (Robertson), on 4th March 1875, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds in law that a buyer who finds himself to be insolvent and unable to perform his engagement may and ought to reject goods he has purchased when offered for delivery: Finds that if he takes delivery under such circumstances a fraud is committed on the seller, of which the buyer's creditors can take no advantage: Finds, in the present case, that, as insolvency was announced almost immediately after the purchase and delivery of the goods, the onus of proving solvency lies on the respondent: Finds that the onus of proving the bankrupt's knowledge of insolvency lies on the petitioners: Allows a proof to both parties accordingly of their respective averments, and to each a conjunct proof."

Both parties appealed to the Sheriff (Maitland Heriot), who, on April 12, 1875, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recalls the interlocutor appealed: Finds, in fact: . . . . Finds in law that the property of the said flax did not pass to the said Robert Lumgair or to his trustee, and that the petitioners are entitled to redelivery and restitution of the same: Therefore ordains the respondent to deliver the same to the petitioners: . . . . Finds the petitioners entitled to expenses: Allows an account thereof to be given in," &c.*

The respondent (Lumgair's trustee) appealed to the Court of Session.

The Court, when the case came before them on 20th October 1875, were of opinion that they could not satisfactorily dispose of it even on the narrower ground taken by the Sheriff without proof as to the time and manner of the transmission and delivery of the goods, and of the posting and delivery of the invoice and bill, and that as there were other important questions raised, it was expedient that the proof to be allowed should be a general proof. Accordingly they allowed both parties a proof of their respective averments, to be taken before Lord Ormidale.

The facts above narrated were established in the proof.

A considerable portion of the proof was directed to the question raised in the first and second pleas for Messrs Brandt and Company, namely, whether the purchase of the flax in question was not made and delivery taken while Mr Lumgair was, and knew himself to be, in insolvent circumstances.† In the course of the argument the Court intimated an

* "NOTE.—It was a condition of the sale of this flax that a bill at four months should be granted for the price. That should have been done simul et semel as the delivery. Mr Lumgair was not entitled to take delivery of the flax without at the same time granting the bill.

"It may be said, no doubt, that the bill, if granted, would not have been much worth. That may be so, but with such arguments the Sheriff has nothing to do. He has merely to see that the respective parties faithfully observe the conditions of their contract, and it certainly was one of the conditions of this sale that a bill was to be granted for the price, which has never been done.

"Mr Lumgair was probably right, in the peculiar position in which he was placed, to decline the acceptance of the bill sent to him. By doing so he has saved the parties to this case from being under the necessity of investigating the precise position he occupied on the 28th November when he took delivery of the goods. The law on this subject is well stated at p. 259 of Bell's Commentaries, M'Laren's ed. vol. i.,—'If it be stipulated as the condition of a bargain, or if goods be sent accompanied by a draft to be accepted and returned, and the goods are received, but the acceptance is not sent, the property is not passed; the goods are still unsold.' The law as thus stated seems to the Sheriff to be exactly applicable to the facts of this case."

† The following portions of the evidence are specially referred to by Lord Ormidale in his opinion:—Mr Lumgair deponed,—"On 24th November I bought some flax from Richard Brandt and Company through one of their clerks. I made the purchase personally. It was payable by draft at four months from the day of sale, and 1 per cent discount. I first learned on the Monday morning, between nine and ten, that the flax had arrived. I called at opinion that Messrs Brandt and Company had failed to make out their case on this point.

Argued for Lumgair's trustee;—1. A suspensive condition in a sale of moveables was not to be presumed. On the face of the contract of sale there was certainly a condition that a bill was to be granted, but it was not expressed that it was to be granted simul et semel with the delivery. There was nothing said about acceptance in due course till the letter of 28th November. The obligation of the buyer would have been adequately implemented by accepting a bill after the goods had been delivered to him and had become his property. The facts of the case, therefore, did not come up to those of Brodie v. Tod, and the other cases founded on by the respondents. The terms of the contract were best interpreted by the actings of the sellers. They either considered that there was no suspensive condition in the contract, or they waived the one which there was.

the shop in passing, and found that it had been delivered. I had received the invoice on the Saturday afternoon, and also a draft for the price. I kept the draft over till the Tuesday. I never transmitted it. I was in the habit of accepting such drafts on the day they arrived, with the exception of some Dundee bills, which I occasionally took with me to the market on Tuesday. It is generally the practice to return these drafts in course of post. This was the first transaction I had had with Brandt and Company. I intended to have transmitted their draft, but my stoppage took place before I had time to do so. So far as I remember, it was between five and six o'clock on the Saturday afternoon when I got the draft. I resolved upon stoppage between eleven and twelve o'clock on Monday forenoon. Between three and four in the afternoon, I sent up word to my heckling foreman, James Fyffe, to lay aside the flax. I was not sure whether the flax was mine or not, and therefore directed it to be laid aside. I got an intimation from the bank that morning a little before eleven o'clock, and made up my mind in about half an hour that I could not go on. My business was going on in the ordinary course,—buying, selling, and doing everything as usual,—until I stopped on the Monday forenoon. I was making additions to my premises down to the time of my stoppage, in the intention and expectation of carrying on. The purchase in question from Brandt and Company was made in the usual course of business, and, until I got the bank's letter, I expected to be able to meet the draft at maturity. My people took in that purchase in the usual course of business, and at once began to heckle it. They were heckling at it on the Saturday and Monday, and continued at it on Tuesday to finish what they had in hand. Before they stopped they had heckled about 20 cwt. of it. I cannot say whether I saw them working at it on the Monday. I saw the flax in the warehouse on the Monday morning. I knew it was Brandt and Company's flax. I gave no orders with respect to it then, or until the afternoon." James Fyffe deponed,—"I was foreman heckler to Mr Lumgair previous to and at the time of his failure. I recollect a parcel of 10 tons of flax from Brandt and Company arriving upon Saturday, 28th November 1874. At that time we were out of that particular description of flax. In spinning flax it is necessary to mix up different sorts of it. The flax in question was quite distinguishable from other flax we had on the premises. On its arrival we commenced to heckle a portion of it, and continued heckling it until Monday the 30th, between three and four o'clock afternoon, when I received a message from Mr Lumgair not to begin to it, and, if I had begun, to stop. About a ton of it had been heckled by that time. That ton had not been in any way mixed with other flax, and I was able to lay it aside perfectly separate. The whole parcel was laid aside by itself, and was thereafter kept entirely separate from any other stuff. Cross-examined.—In beginning to heckle this flax we were just preparing it for being used up in the ordinary course of business. Until I received Mr Lumgair's message on the Monday afternoon we dealt with this flax as just to be used in ordinary course, as Mr Lumgair's other flax was used."

Brandt & Co. v. Dickson.

Had they intended that the acceptance of a bill was to be precedent to the passing of the property they would not have put the goods out of their control without taking steps to have the bill accepted on delivery. Instead of that the goods were delivered when handed to the railway company at Dundee, or, at latest, when received by Lumgair's warehouseman at Arbroath. Stoppage in transitu was no longer possible, and the buyer was not put in a position to implement this so-called suspensive condition till after he had had the goods in his possession for a whole day, and till a considerable portion of them had actually been worked up by his people. Under these circumstances it must be held that even if there was a suspensive condition it had been departed from, and that the delivery was unconditional.

2. The delivery being unconditional it was also complete, so that the buyer could not reject. When a merchant or manufacturer is going on with his business as usual, and goods are delivered to his workpeople in the ordinary course of his business, it requires no personal intervention of the employer to make the delivery complete. Delivery is taken as a matter of course by the warehouseman or other servant, who in a large business is employed for that very purpose. It is taken in compliance with the employer's known obligation to take delivery. No large business could be carried on on any other footing. Delivery of goods would be taken day after day in Mr Lumgair's business without his knowledge or intervention, and it could not be held that delivery was suspended in each case till he applied his mind to the matter and approved the acceptance of delivery. It was impossible to doubt, on the evidence in this case, not only that the fact of delivery was complete, but that even if Mr Lumgair's personal intervention was necessary he had accepted the flax with the intention of making it his own property. There was no mental reservation or suspense on the subject when he went to his office on the Monday morning, knowing that the flax was in the hands of his workpeople, and having the invoice and bill in his pocket. The property had passed, and after that it was too late for him to reject, without giving a fraudulent preference to the sellers over his other creditors.

3. But even then he did not reject. He gave no notice to the sellers. He did not accept delivery custodiæ causa merely. But foreseeing that there might be questions between the sellers and his general creditors he merely set aside the goods for whom it might concern.[1]

Argued for Messrs Brandt and Company;—1. The contract of sale contained a suspensive condition,—a bill at four months had been stipulated for in exchange for the goods,—a bill had been sent on delivery of the goods, and until that bill was accepted and returned the property in the goods was not passed by mere delivery, the transaction was incomplete. That was the fair reading of the contract as a mercantile document. That it was the understanding of parties was proved conclusively by their respective actings. Brandt and Company at once forwarded the bill and desired it to be returned in due time, which could only mean in course. The bankrupt knew that to complete the transaction and make the goods his he was bound to accept and return the bill in course. He would have done so but for his stoppage. But not having done so he knew that the goods were not his. He acted in the only way in which an honest man could have acted, in holding his hand and not accepting the bill, which would have raised difficult questions between the sellers and his general creditors. Admitting the general rule that "the moment the goods are actually in possession of the buyer by the vendor's authority, as sold to him, the transference is complete, and the price becomes matter of personal contract only,"[1] yet there might be conditions which prevented the operation of this general rule. The contract of sale was mutual. The obligations of the parties to pay and deliver were reciprocal. But they might or might not be concurrent. A sale might be for cash before delivery; or for ready money, that is, cash or bill on delivery; or on credit, that is, cash or bill after delivery. In neither of the former cases could the buyer insist for delivery without tendering the price. Where the contract of sale was silent as to the time of payment it was held to be either a ready-money bargain or on the usual trade credit. But if delivery was made the property was passed. The seller had only a personal action for the price. But where the contract was express as to the time of payment the condition as to payment was a condition suspensive—precedent to this effect, that it was suspensive of or precedent to the passing of the property notwithstanding delivery. While the law rejected an implied it admitted an express suspensive condition.[2] Non-performance of a suspensive condition rendered the contract of sale voidable. Transference of the property was suspended till the condition was fulfilled. Consent as well as tradition was necessary to complete the transference; and, until the condition was implemented, there was no consent to transfer. The condition as to payment in this case was an express suspensive condition, and very similar in its terms to conditions sustained as suspensive in decisions both of the Scotch and English Courts.[3]

2. The condition had not been waived by the sellers. So far as practicable in mercantile business they had sent the bill for acceptance simul et semel with the goods. The goods were large in bulk, could not be invoiced till weighed on their way to the station, and the bill could not be drawn till the invoice was made out. All this was done without loss of time, and in the ordinary course of business. It was a mere accident that the goods arrived before the bill.

3. Even were there held to be no suspensive condition the bankrupt had timeously rejected the goods. The goods arrived in the warehouse on Saturday morning, and were taken into the warehouse by his servants. But he was personally unaware of the fact. Even when he got the invoice and bill on Saturday night he did not know that the flax had come also. He only learned of its arrival on Monday morning. He then ordered the invoice to be checked, before which was done he naturally would not accept the bill, or take any other step towards accepting delivery. While the invoice was being checked circumstances emerged which obliged him to stop payment, and he then at once decided to reject the goods, delivery of which he had not then conclusively accepted. He personally accepted delivery only custodiæ causa.[4] Though the servant's act might bind the master in many cases it could not in such a case as this without special authority, which was not alleged, to the effect of altering the rights of creditors. The employer might have suspended

Brandt & Co. v. Dickson.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuer claims the goods in question on two grounds—first, that at the date of the contract the pursuer knew himself to be insolvent; and secondly, that the goods were not finally delivered.

I am of opinion that the first ground of challenge cannot be maintained. The footing on which the bankrupt's trade was conducted was a very slippery one—tiding over a low and falling market by a system of discounts of an irregular and hazardous kind. But I think he had faith in his system, and until he received the bank letter on the morning of the 30th of November he did not contemplate suspending payment. I think there is no ground, therefore, for rescinding the contract.

The second point is one of considerable nicety, and involves some delicate questions. The creditors maintain that the delivery of these goods was complete, and that the bankrupt could not restore them without conferring a fraudulent preference. It is contended, on the other hand, that the delivery was not complete, seeing that something remained to be done by the purchaser before delivery could be taken, and that this was a suspensive condition of the sale.

In all cases arising under bankruptcy regarding undue preferences the element of honest and straightforward dealing is always among the most important. The present is not a favourable case for the creditors. The return of the goods would have made them no worse than they were, and they could have no claim in equity for any part of their value. And, on the other hand, it is not unimportant that the manifest course of honest dealing was to decline to take delivery or grant the bill but at once to return the goods. But, taking the case on the strictest and most technical views of the law of sale and delivery, I have come to be of opinion that the delivery in this case was not complete, and that it was suspended until the stipulated bill was granted, which never was and never could have been done.

1. I think the despatch of the goods by rail, and the sending of the invoice and bill by post, were in law contemporaneous acts. One might arrive before the other, but they were manifestly intended to arrive simultaneously. If the letter had arrived first, the acceptance of the bill would have been postponed until the arrival of the goods, and, in like manner, if the goods had come first, the purchaser could not conclusively take delivery until he had received advice as to the terms on which they had been sent. In the present case the facts exclude the completion of delivery. In point of fact the bankrupt himself had done no act in the direction of accepting delivery. The goods arrived unknown to the bankrupt on the Saturday morning, and were received by the manager at the works, who immediately put part of them in hand. I attach no importance to that fact, and take the case as if the goods had simply been deposited at the warehouse awaiting the principal's orders. There was no power on the part of the manager to forestall any right or obligation which might arise to, or be imposed on, the principal when the invoice should arrive.

2. On the Saturday afternoon, after business hours, the invoice inclosing the bill was delivered at the bankrupt's private residence. If the conclusive delivery was at that time suspended, it continued so until the Monday morning. On the Monday morning the bankrupt looked in at his warehouse on the way to his office, and there he saw the goods, and learned for the first time that they had arrived. He gave no orders on the subject, but went to his office, and there he found a letter from the bank so far restricting the credit he had hitherto enjoyed as to induce him to resolve to stop, and he at once gave directions to set aside this consignment of flax, which has remained entire until now.

I am of opinion, in the first place, that until the letter of advice arrived, and the bankrupt had reasonable opportunity of acting on it, delivery was not complete, and might be honestly and properly refused when the resolution to stop was taken. But looking at the terms of the letter of advice, I am of opinion that the sale was one under the suspensive condition that a bill for the price should be granted on delivery. That bill was not granted, and could not have been given after the resolution to stop had been taken, and therefore the property never passed, and the seller is entitled to redemand his goods. It was pleaded, that even if the condition were precedent, it was waived by the seller, but I can find no ground for so holding.

Lord Neaves.—This is a case of considerable importance in its general bearing on mercantile transactions, as indeed are all mercantile cases which involve questions both of honourable dealing and of strict law. Mr Lumgair, the bankrupt, was engaged in a very extensive business, and his affairs were seriously embarrassed at the time he entered into the contract of sale with the pursuers on 24th November 1874. But I agree with your Lordship that we cannot hold either that he was insolvent, or that, if he was so, he knew himself to be insolvent, in the sense required by the law, to void the contract of sale on the ground of fraud. He had an enormous amount of property lying in foreign markets, and a favourable turn in those markets might have freed him from his difficulties. He evidently did not believe himself to be hopelessly insolvent, and who can put a limit to the sanguine credulity of persons engaged in such speculations as his? He had a cash-credit with the bank, which they had been in the habit of allowing him to overdraw. He had been allowed also to discount bills before acceptance, and he had further been receiving support from friends. I cannot hold that a merchant, in these circumstances, provided he commits no overt fraud, is so incapacitated from transacting that we must cut down any contract he makes on the head of constructive fraud. Accordingly, on the first ground relied on by the pursuers I am prepared to repel their plea.

Laying this point out of view, still the circumstances of Mr Lumgair's business, and his pecuniary position at this time, have a material bearing upon the remaining questions in the case. The history of his business affairs immediately previous to the transaction in question—the difficulties from which he admits he was struggling to extricate himself—followed by his ultimate determination to stop, are important elements in considering the bearing of his conduct on the day of his stoppage.

Brandt & Co. v. Dickson.

On the 24th November Mr Lumgair ordered this flax from the pursuers, and it is clear, from the bargain that it was to be paid for by bill running from the date of the purchase. I am prepared to hold that the granting of the bill was a condition of the purchase,—that an exchange of the bill for the goods was an inherent condition of the transaction entered into by Lumgair and the pursuers. The whole circumstances which occurred from the date of the purchase down to Lumgair's stoppage corroborate that view. The flax was weighed out on Friday afternoon, 27th November, and sent to the Dundee railway station to be forwarded to Arbroath. It arrived there so as to be delivered to Lumgair's people on the morning of Saturday, 28th November. It was not, however, received either by Mr Lumgair himself personally, or by his workpeople, with his knowledge or even with his express authority. It was received by the foreman heckler merely under his general authority to take in goods offered for delivery so as not to leave them in the hands of the railway. Mr Lumgair himself does not appear to have been in the warehouse or heckling-shop at all on Saturday, 28th November. In this state of circumstances, and looking to the terms of the contract, Mr Lumgair's personal intervention was necessary before the delivery said to have taken place was sufficient to pass the property in the goods. But while things were still in pendente, and before Mr Lumgair was committed by any personal act—for I cannot hold his passing visit to the heckling-shop on the Monday morning, on his way to his office, to have had any effect—a change of circumstances took place. A letter had been written on Saturday, 28th, by Mr Lumgair's banker in Arbroath, which, for some reason or another, was not delivered to him immediately, but was delivered on Monday, 30th, about eleven o'clock. This letter contained an intimation from the bank which caused Mr Lumgair, after a very few minutes' consideration, to resolve to stop payment.

Now, the invoice of the goods had also been despatched on Saturday, and the sending the invoice was, I consider, an integral part of the sending the goods. It would be most irregular for a merchant to send goods without an invoice stating the quantity and price, and mentioning any conditions as to payment or otherwise, and this more particularly when a bill for the amount was to be exchanged. Accordingly the pursuers having taken no farther interval than the night between Friday 27th and Saturday 28th November—and it must be kept in view that when they delivered the flax to the railway company on Friday between five and six o'clock in the evening they could not with certainty tell when it would be forwarded, or when it would be delivered at Arbroath—posted on Saturday the 28th, about one o'clock, the invoice and a bill for the price, and a letter intimating that they expected the bill to be returned accepted "in due time," which I must take as equivalent to "in course." This letter, with its enclosures, was delivered to Mr Lumgair after business hours on Saturday, the 28th. Now, it has been argued that because the goods had been despatched and arrived before the invoice and bill, therefore there was a waiver on the part of the pursuers of the condition in the contract of sale as to the granting a bill if such truly existed, and that the mere delivery of the goods was enough to pass the property. I think that argument entirely fails. In order to sustain it we should require to construe the duty of the seller in the matter with a strictness totally contrary to practice, and at variance with common sense. In reason and ordinary dealing the invoice, containing all sufficient particulars, and the bill should come simul et semel with the goods. It was a mere accident here which actually was first delivered. The two things were meant to be simultaneous and partes ejusdem negotii, and were so looked upon by Mr Lumgair. At the time the invoice was delivered to him there was lying for him either in the post-office or elsewhere the letter from the bank which I have already mentioned, and which gave the last fatal stab to his commercial credit. He had not seen it before learning at the heckling-shop on the Monday morning that the flax had arrived, but it was ready to be delivered to him when he reached his office. When he read it he saw that it contained two or three matters concerning his mode of carrying on business which at once convinced him that he could not go on any longer, and that he must surrender his affairs to his creditors, and this consequently shewed him that he could not honestly accept the bill which the pursuers had sent with their invoice. The matters contained in the bank's letter involved two changes of practice on the part of the bank, which were of most vital consequence to the bankrupt—first, the restricting him to the authorised amount of his cash-credit, and second, the refusal any longer to discount unaccepted bills. If these resolutions of the bank were enforced, which apparently he had good reason to know they would be, he had no doubt that he must come down.

With this conviction thus brought home to him on the Monday morning, what was it his duty as an honest man to do regarding the pursuers' bill? The question of accepting or rejecting goods when bankruptcy is impending gets into the region of morality as well as of law. Viewing it as a question of morality, could he go on to grant the bill? Certainly not honestly, as he himself knew. And accordingly he did not grant it. The only remaining question is, whether he was entitled in law to hold his hand and to keep the goods when he let the bill lie unaccepted, instead of accepting it, as he says he intended to do, and as was his custom in ordinary cases, and returning it to Dundee by Monday's post,—whether on the Monday morning, when a letter was lying for him which virtually told him that he could no longer honestly grant the bill, no other creditors having in the meanwhile interfered, and there having been no completed personal delivery, he was not entitled to reconsider his position, or whether there was a vested right in his general creditors to insist that he should act as a dishonest man, and accept the bill and keep the goods. That is in reality what the case comes to when plainly put. I have no hesitation in coming to the opinion that he was so entitled to reconsider his position, and to act as he did. He had only delayed accepting the bill from Saturday night to Monday morning, and then almost before he had had time to put pen to paper there came upon him the bona fide conviction, upon which he at once acted, that he could no longer accept the bill, and must put aside the goods for behoof of their true owners. In so acting he behaved as a man of honour, doing that which he was morally bound to do, and I have yet to learn that in such a case a man is not entitled in law to do what he is bound to do in morality.

On the whole matter I find nothing in this case to entitle the creditors to lay hands on these goods, and nothing to disqualify the bankrupt from acting as he did. In fact, the property in the goods had never passed from the pursuers to him, and the pursuers must therefore prevail.

Lord Ormidale.—The essential circumstances of this case are to be found in the few following passages of the proof (reads evidence quoted supra, pp. 377-8, note).

Jan. 18, 1876.
Brandt & Co. v. Dickson.

From these passages of the proof, as well as from the whole of it taken together, I conclude that Mr Lumgair acted in good faith in entering into the transaction in question. He was carrying on business at a time of great depression in his line of trade. His difficulties were increasing, and he was becoming more deeply involved down to the time of his stoppage. But still he appears, not only from his own testimony, but also from that of others, to have been acting to the last in the bona fide expectation of redeeming his fortunes, and retrieving his affairs from the state into which they had fallen. If that be so, it cannot be doubted that he must be held to have acted in good faith in entering into the transaction with Brandt and Company involved in the present case. Mr Bell says in his Commentaries (5th ed. vol. i. p. 244)—"At first, perhaps, it was natural to hold, that if a man was really insolvent, and especially, if from his books it could be made to appear that he was so at the time of entering into the contract, it was his bounden duty to disclose this circumstance, and that concealment of it amounted to fraud in the contract. Such, accordingly, was the opinion entertained by our Judges in the end of the seventeenth century. But this doctrine is inconsistent with an advanced state of commerce. . . . It is now settled, accordingly, that the mere appearance of insolvency from the books is not sufficient to infer fraud in the contract of sale, nor is it enough that a purchaser is struggling even with impending bankruptcy, if there be room for the attempt to retrieve his affairs, and if he be persevering honestly in that attempt." In the present case there was not even an appearance of insolvency on the face of the bankrupt's books. Having regard, then, to the law, as stated by Mr Bell—and its soundness, as so stated, was not impugned—I have no difficulty in holding that the first ground, viz. the fraud of the bankrupt, upon which Brandt and Company endeavoured to maintain their case, has not been sufficiently supported.

The next question in the case is, whether, assuming that there was no fraud in the contract of sale itself, the pursuers, Brandt and Company, who sold the flax in Dundee and forwarded it to Arbroath, where it was received by Lumgair's people on Saturday, 28th November, are entitled to recover it from the trustee for his general creditors. If they are not so entitled, and can only rank for the unpaid price on a sequestrated estate which has not yet paid any dividend, and, as we were informed, is not likely ever to pay except a very small one, the pursuers' case is certainly a hard one. That, however, may not be a legitimate consideration for us, as we must dispose of the case on the strict principles of law applicable to the circumstances.

The real question is, whether the flax in question was so delivered as in law to pass the property to the bankrupt and his general estate. The question is one of considerable delicacy and importance. It does not depend on the principle of stoppage in transitu, for the transit was complete. The flax had arrived in Arbroath, and had been delivered by the railway company to Lumgair's people, either at the station or at his warehouse; but then something else required to be done before the property can be held to have passed. The invoice had to be received, and the quality and quantity of the goods, as well as their price, ascertained to be correctly stated. Till the invoice arrived, and till it and the goods were examined, Mr Lumgair could not be expected to accept the draft which was inclosed along with the invoice. And till all this was done, and a reasonable time allowed for it being done, it does not appear to me that it was too late for Mr Lumgair to reject the goods, or to lay them aside for restoration to Brandt and Company. The acceptance of the draft was a suspensive condition of the sale, and it never was purified. Neither can I hold that Brandt and Company did anything whatever indicative of their having waived or departed from that condition. In this state of matters, and seeing that in place of accepting Brandt and Company's draft, Mr Lumgair, early on Monday, made up his mind to stop, and surrender everything to his creditors, I think he acted the part of an honest man in causing the flax in question to be laid aside, separated from the rest of his stock, to await any question that might be raised about it. In my opinion, this was done in sufficient time to prevent the property of the goods being held to have passed to his general creditors. The case falls, I think, within the principle stated by Mr Bell (5th ed. vol. i. p. 238), where he says—"So, if it be stipulated as the condition of a bargain, or if goods be sent accompanied by a draft to be accepted and returned, and the goods are received, but the acceptance not sent, the property is not passed—the goods are still unsold." And the case of Brodie v. Tod and Company, May 20, 1814, F. C., on which he founds, appears to me to be in point. If that be so, we must decide for the pursuers, Brandt and Company, on the second ground of action, to the effect that they are entitled to have the flax in question restored to them.

LORD GIFFORD concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that the goods in question were ordered from the respondents (petitioners) by the bankrupt, Robert Lumgair, on 24th November 1874, at the price of £40, 10s. per ton, for which a bill was to be granted as at that date; that the goods were forwarded on the evening of Friday, 27th November, by railway from Dundee, and were delivered at the bankrupt's warehouse on Saturday morning, and were received into stock by his manager, who used a certain portion of the goods, but without the bankrupt's knowledge; that the respondents, on the 28th November, sent by post a letter of advice, invoice, and bill, which were received after business hours by the bankrupt at his private residence: Find that the bankrupt, on calling at his works on Monday, the 30th November, learned for the first time that the goods had arrived; that, without giving any instructions, the bankrupt proceeded to his office, and there found a letter from the bank with which he did business restricting his credit to an extent which obliged him to stop payment: Find that the bankrupt did not accept the bill sent him, and directed the goods to be put aside: Find that in these circumstances the property in these goods never passed to the bankrupt, and that the sellers were entitled to have them back: Therefore dismiss the appeal, and affirm the judgment appealed against, and decern: . . . . for the defenders, at the same time expressing an opinion that the patent was void in law, and on the rule set aside the verdict obtained by the pursuers as contrary to evidence, and granted a new trial. The pursuers, in order that they might take the question of the validity of the patent by appeal to the House of Lords, proceeded to a pro forma trial before the Lord President on December 22, 1875, upon the same issues as had been tried in the former trial of the cause. The Judge's notes of evidence in the former trial were accepted as the record of the evidence, and the presiding Judge directed the jury in point of law—"That the letters-patent, dated 29th October 1868, and sealed 19th March 1869, and assigned to the pursuers by assignation dated 30th September 1871, are void in law, and that the jury must therefore return a verdict for the defenders on the pursuers' issue; and farther, that in respect of their verdict for the defenders on the pursuers' issue, it is unnecessary for the jury to return any verdict on the three issues for the defenders, or any of them."

Whereupon counsel for the pursuers excepted to the above direction and ruling.

The jury thereafter found for the defenders on the first issue, and a bill of exceptions was signed.

The bill of exceptions was put to the roll, and counsel intimated that they desired their argument on the former occasion to be held as repeated.

LORD PRESIDENT.—When this case was before us after the first trial on a bill of exceptions and a rule we found that the exceptions taken did not raise the question as to the validity of the patent, but at the same time we were all of opinion that the patent was in law invalid. As we were unable, from the manner in which the case was presented to us, to give effect to that opinion, all we could do was to make the rule absolute for a new trial, holding as we did that the verdict was against evidence. The consequence of that course was that the only remedy of the patentees was to proceed to a new trial. But in the face of the opinions delivered by the Court it was hopeless to go of new into the question of infringement, or to do anything except raise the question of the validity of the patent in such a form as would enable the patentees to take the case by appeal to the House of Lords. Accordingly the new trial which took place was a merely formal proceeding. It was arranged that the Judge's notes of evidence in the first trial should be accepted as the record of the evidence in the new trial. As presiding Judge, I directed the jury in accordance with the views expressed by the Court when granting a new trial. To that direction the counsel for the patentees excepted, and all that we have now to do is, in accordance with our opinions already expressed, to disallow the exception, and thus to enable the patentees to take the case to the House of Lords.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"18th January 1876.—The Lords having heard counsel for the parties upon the bill of exceptions for the pursuers, disallow the exceptions, and find the defenders entitled to the expenses incurred in discussing the bill, and remit," &c.

Thereafter the defenders enrolled the case to apply the verdict, but the Court suggested that as the pursuers' appeal required to be lodged within eight days after the commencement of the next session of Parliament, Execution of Deed—Notary Public—Docquet—Statute—Schedule—Conveyancing and Land Transfer Act (37 and 38 Vict. c. 94), sec. 41.—The 41st section of the Conveyancing and Land Transfer Act enacts that a deed may be subscribed for a party unable to write by one notary before two witnesses, "and the docquet thereto shall set forth that the granter of the deed authorised the execution thereof, and that the same had been read over to him in the presence of the witnesses. Such docquet may be in the form set forth in schedule (I) hereto annexed, or in any words to the like effect." Held, that as the statute did not prescribe the use of the form in the schedule, but merely suggested it as a good form, a docquet which was otherwise sufficient was not rendered invalid by its disconformity to the schedule.

1st DIVISION. Lord Young. B.

MRS CHRISTINA ATCHISON died on 17th October 1874. In an action of removing by her testamentary trustees under a settlement dated 19th May 1874, directed against her son William Atchison and his wife, and concluding that they should be ordained to remove from the house of Springbank, Bothwell, occupied by the deceased, the defenders founded on another testamentary deed bearing to be signed for Mrs Atchison by a notary and two witnesses of date 10th October 1874.

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 19) "With reference to the pretended deed founded on in the statement of facts for the defenders, the pursuers aver that said pretended deed is ex facie null and void, in respect that, while bearing to be notarially executed, the name and designation of the notary are not set forth in the docquet."

The pursuers pleaded;—(4) The pretended deed founded on by the defender being ex facie null and void, as set forth in article 19, the right of the pursuers is not excluded by said pretended deed, and they are entitled to decree as concluded for.

The deed was produced. The testing clause and notary's docquet were in these terms:—"In witness whereof these presents, including the marginal addition, all written on this page by John Dickson Ferrie, notary public, residing in Portobello, near Edinburgh (five words being deleted before subscription), are subscribed by me at Bothwell, the 10th day of October 1874, before these witnesses, Robert Hedderick Arthur, solicitor Supreme Courts, residing in Edinburgh, and Charles Peattie, gardener, residing in Bothwell." "The foregoing disposition and deed of settlement having been read over and explained by me, the undersigned notary public, to the above designed Christina Smith or Atchison, in presence of the witnesses also above designed, and she having approved thereof in every respect, and stated that she was unable to subscribe the same from weakness, and having desired me to sign for her, and in token of her request touched my pen, I do hereby subscribe the same for her in presence of the said witnesses. Per opera. J. D. FERRIE, notary public. Robert H. Arthur, witness; Charles Peattie, witness."

The Lord Ordinary repelled the pursuers' fourth plea, and afterwards dismissed the action.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The docquet did not fulfil the requirements of the 41st section of the Conveyancing and Land Transfer Act, 1874,[1] and relative schedule[2] in the following respects:—1. It did not contain the name or designation of the notary; 2. It was not stated that the granter "authorised" the notary to sign; 3. It was not stated that the witnesses subscribed "in testimony of their having heard authority given;" 4. There was no statement that "these presents" (including the docquet) had been read over. The new statute being a relaxation of the law on certain conditions, these must be strictly complied with.[3]

The defenders argued that the docquet contained all that was prescribed by the 41st section, and that it was not necessary to follow the precise words of the schedule.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action of removing at the instance of the trustees of the late Mrs Atchison acting under a trust-deed dated 19th May 1874. It is directed against the son of Mrs Atchison and his wife, who are in occupation of the premises. The defence is rested upon a deed dated subsequently to the trust-deed on 10th October 1874. The pursuers object to this deed as ex facie null, because it is not properly subscribed. It is not subscribed by Mrs Atchison but by a notary for her, and the question is, whether the subscription by the notary is well done in terms of the Conveyancing Act of 1874. The question is one of considerable importance in the construction of the Act. The object of the Act was to enable persons who were unable to write to subscribe a deed by one notary in presence of two witnesses, in place of two notaries in presence of four witnesses. It is said that this relaxation of the law is accompanied by certain conditions which have not been fulfilled, and the case turns on a careful consideration of the clause. But before coming to that, it is important to notice the previous state of the law. As we all know, two notaries and four witnesses were required, but it is more important, as affecting the present case, to consider what it was necessary that the docquet should bear, because it is alleged that the docquet in this case is imperfect.

Now, the one thing needful was that the fact should be distinctly set forth that the maker of the deed had authorised the notary to sign for him. It is not to be left out of view that the law in regard to this matter was statutory under the Act 1579, c. 80.

All that the statute required was the presence of two witnesses, and that they should be so designed that they could be found. But undoubtedly the common law required further that the docquet should set forth distinctly that the notary had the authority of the maker of the deed to sign for him; and farther, it was matter of consuetudinary law that the granter should touch the pen in token of giving his authority. But I am not aware that it was requisite to set forth any specific fact except the fact of the authority. Erskine states the matter thus in his Institutes, iii. 2, 9,—"The attestation or docquet of the notaries must express the special fact that the granter authorised them to sign, nor can this omission be supplied by mentioning it in the body of the deed." And he refers to the case of Birrel, M. 16,846, which is an important authority. There the objection to the docquet was that it did not bear that the maker had granted his authority. "It was answered—1st, That there was no form required by any statute of a notary's attestation, that when it bore pro illo subscribo that was in effect to bear the party's command, since otherwise it could not with truth be said. 2d, That Reid, the first notary, was writer of the deed, which bore in the body of it to be signed by notaries at the granter's command because she could not write, and which was equal to his having said so in the docquet." But these answers were disregarded, and the Court reduced the deed, and Lord Kilkerran makes some important observations. "Witnesses to a deed signed by notaries are not only witnesses to the subscription of the notary but also to the command given him, both which the witnesses attest, and for that very reason it is that four are required; and as witnesses are neither bound nor supposed in any case to know what is contained in the body of the deed, they attest no more than what is in the docquet. The authority also to notaries must be given at the very time of executing the deed, for till then there is locus pœnitentiæ, and, for anything that could appear from the face of the deed in question it might have been written many days before signing. The docquet's bearing pro illo subscribo was nothing, for though it may be true that the notary could not with truth say so without her authority, yet that was but his assertion, which, whether true or false, is the very question,—as no fact was asserted in evidence of such authority, the truth of which the witnesses were to attest." The answer that the authority was to be found in the deed itself is disposed of thus in an observation from the bench, given by Falconer,—"That in the body of the writ the notary speaks not but the party, and the thing to be attested is that the party has spoke at all."

That case was decided in 1745, and we see from it that the docquet in use was in Latin, and that the one thing required to be set forth specifically was that authority had been given. But it is instructive enough to see that in a work published about this very time (in 1762) on the office of a notary, the Latin form was as follows:—"De speciali mandato dicti A, calamum tangentis, scribereque nescientis ut asseruit, ego B, notarius publicus, pro eo subscribo." Therefore that was the thing necessary to be set forth. In the case of blind persons it was absolutely necessary that the deed should be read over to them in presence of the notaries, but it was not required, as matter of solemnity, that that fact should be set out in the docquet. It was so decided in the case of Yorkston, in 1794,[1] which affords an additional indication that nothing more than the authority given in presence of the witnesses was required to be set forth.

Now, that being the state of the old law, let us see the changes which have been introduced by the recent statute. Its main object was to dispense with the necessity of two notaries and four witnesses. The 41st section enacts that "without prejudice to the present law and practice, any deed, instrument, or writing, whether relating to land or not, may, after having been read over to the granter, be validly executed on behalf of such granter, who, from any cause, whether permanent or temporary, is unable to write, by one notary-public or Justice of the Peace subscribing the same for him in his presence and by his authority without the ceremony of touching the pen, all before two witnesses." So far the Act prescribes what is to be done. These are the conditions on which the lieges may avail themselves of this relaxation of the law.

It is further required, by the same section of the Act, that certain things should appear on the face of the docquet. "And the docquet thereto shall set forth that the granter of the deed authorised the execution thereof, and that the same had been read over to him in the presence of the witnesses." Here again there is a change. The docquet must set forth not only the authority, but that the deed was read over to the granter in presence of the witnesses. The question is whether this docquet complies with those requisites, and it appears to me that it does. It is in these terms:—"The foregoing disposition and deed of settlement having been read over and explained by me, the undersigned notary public, to the above designed Christina Smith or Atchison, in presence of the witnesses also above designed, and she having approved thereof in every respect, and stated that she was unable to subscribe the same from weakness, and having desired me to sign for her, and in token of her request touched my pen, I do hereby subscribe the same for her in presence of the said witnesses. Per opera. J. D. FERRIE, notary public. Robert H. Arthur, witness; Charles Peattie, witness." Does that not bear that the granter authorised the notary to sign, and that the deed was read over to her? It seems to me that it does. It is contended, no doubt, that the words "authority" or "authorise" are not used, but these words are not necessary de solennitate, and the words "approved" and "desired" are quite equivalent. But it is said that the docquet does not expressly bear that the authority was given in the presence of the witnesses, because these words are not repeated in reference to the authority, having been used in the first instance in reference to the reading over. But I think that is far too strict a construction. It seems to me that the touching of the pen in presence of the witnesses, though not now a necessary solemnity is a very clear indication that the whole thing was one continuous act, so that as far as the requirements of section 41 are concerned I hold them to have been fully complied with.

I am very much inclined to maintain strictly the doctrine laid down more than once in this Court, and particularly in the case of Johnston v. Pettigrew, that when a relaxation of the law is introduced on certain conditions, it is indispensable that the party who desires to avail himself of it should comply strictly with those conditions, and if I did not think that that had been done I should not sustain this deed. But we are told that there are other conditions contained in the schedule which have not been complied with. Now, the authority of a schedule depends entirely on the terms and nature of the reference to the schedule in the enacting clause, which in this case is in these words:—"Such docquet may be in the form set forth in schedule (I) hereto annexed, or in any words to the like effect." It is said that the docquet, a form of which is given in the schedule, requires to set forth four things, 1st, the designation of the notary, 2d, that authority has been given him, 3d, that the deed has been previously read over to the granter, and 4th, that the witnesses subscribe in testimony of their having heard the authority given, and it is said that this docquet is defective in the 1st and 4th points. But in my opinion a party is not bound to absolute and slavish compliance with the words of the schedule if he fulfils the requirements of the 41st section. If it were so, there would not be compliance in this case. But I cannot read the Act in that sense. It does not even direct that the schedule should be followed as nearly as circumstances will permit. The schedule is merely a suggestion of a good practical form, but there is nothing in the Act to make void any form which complies with the provisions of section 41.

Atchison's Trustees v. Atchison.

Stress was laid on the case of Johnston v. Pettigrew, and it is an important decision upon the construction of the recent Conveyancing Act of 1858, 21 and 22 Victoria, c. 76. The first section dispenses with the necessity of a separate instrument of sasine, and substitutes the registration of the conveyance. The provision is in these terms:—"It shall not be necessary to expede and record an instrument of sasine on any conveyance of lands, but it shall be competent and sufficient for the person or persons in whose favour the conveyance is granted, instead of expeding and recording such instrument of sasine, to record the conveyance itself, in a register of sasines applicable to the lands therein contained, and the conveyance being presented for registration with a warrant of registration thereon, in or as nearly as may be in the form of schedule (A) No. 1, hereto annexed, specifying the person or persons on whose behalf it is so presented, and signed by such person or persons, or his or their agent, and, being so recorded along with such warrant, shall have the same legal force and effect in all respects as if the conveyance so recorded had been followed by an instrument of sasine duly expede and recorded, &c." Now the warrant for registration in that case was in these terms:—"Register in behalf of Matthew Pettigrew; William Maclean, agent." That was on the face of it a most imperfect writing. Matthew Pettigrew might or might not be the disponee. There might be more than one person of the name. William Maclean might be anybody under the sun, and he is not called the agent of Matthew Pettigrew. Now, the schedule of that statute is in these terms:—"Register on behalf of A B (insert designation). Signed A B [or] C. D., W.S., Edinburgh (or as the case may be), agent of the said A B." There there was a failure to comply with the terms of the schedule, and a very serious failure. And this proceeding was to have the effect of completing a feudal title to a landed estate by entering the register of sasines, without any means of determining who the party was who was to be infeft, or who his agent was. And the terms of the enactment stand in very direct contrast to those of the statute with which we are dealing. It is not, as here, that the warrant may be in the form of schedule (A) or words of like force and effect. The warrant is to be in or as nearly as may be in the form of schedule (A). When such language is used, a departure from the form is in ordinary circumstances only permissible when it is made necessary by the circumstances of the particular case. But when the statute says that a writing may be in the form of a schedule, that means merely that the schedule is suggested as a good form, but it does not superadd anything to the enacting words. It is therein that the great distinction or rather contrast lies between this case and the case of Johnston v. Pettigrew, and others of the same class. For there are other cases in which a schedule has been given effect to and enforced where it has been prescribed as the proper form to be used, and no more latitude has been given than is implied in the words "as nearly as may be."

On these grounds I think we should adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD DEAS.—Laying aside, in the first instance, the recent statute, the law applicable to the signature by notaries of deeds of importance was regulated by the Act 1579, c. 80, and certain Acts of Sederunt, and by the practice which followed upon these. We are not, however, called on to decide what, apart from the recent statute, was essential to the validity of a notary's docquet, and upon that matter I give no opinion. In the case of Henry v. Reid, the Lord President mentioned some things as essential. He says,—"In the first place, it is indispensable that the granter of the deed should specially authorise the notary to subscribe for him; in the second place, such authority must be intelligently given,—that is to say, the granter must signify that he is aware of what he is doing, and for that purpose should state the fact and specify the cause of his inability to write; and, in the third place, this must be done in the presence and hearing of the witnesses. All these matters ought to be expressly set forth in the docquet." I do not see at present that there is any inaccuracy in that opinion. His Lordship does not say that these exhaust all the things which are essential, but we are not here called upon to decide whether they do or not. But my opinion is, that whatever was necessary before this statute is necessary still, except in so far as it is expressly dispensed with by the statute, and further, that those things which are specified in section 41, in so far as they are additional, must likewise be contained in the docquet. Now, I think it a very nice question whether, in order to take advantage of the relaxation of the law, it was not necessary to have a docquet, either in words or in substance, the same as the schedule. On the whole, however, I am of opinion that if the docquet contains all that was necessary before, and all that section 41 may be held to have added, it will be sufficient, although it does not follow the words of the schedule, and is not even in all respects substantially to the same effect with the schedule. If it were imperative that it should be substantially to the same effect, in all respects, with the schedule, it would be difficult to say that this docquet complies with that requisite. But having regard to the terms of the statute itself I do not think this was intended to be imperative, and consequently I come to the conclusion that the subscription should be held good.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—The only point for consideration at present is, whether the signature of Mrs Atchison, given for her by a notary-public, is valid? Is this docquet probative? And if so, is the deed validly subscribed?

The date of the deed is subsequent to the recent Conveyancing Act (37 and 38 Vict. c 94), and therefore the signature by one notary, and in presence of two attesting witnesses, is sufficient,—as sufficient as two notaries and four witnesses had formerly been. The old law regarding subscription by notaries for those unable to write is well known. The statutes 1540, cap. 117, 1579, c. 80, and 1681, c. 5, contain the enactments of the law on the subject down to recent times. But by the Conveyancing Act of 1874 a change was made, and while the old procedure was not abrogated or put an end to, a new and more convenient mode of subscription by notaries was permitted. Now, I fully admit that when a party adopts this newly permitted form of subscription, he must, in exercising the new power, conform himself to its requirements. This is fully and instructively explained by your Lordship from the chair of the Second Division in the case of Johnston v. Pettigrew on 16th June 1865. Some distinction, however, there is between the requirements of the enacting clauses and the inferences from the language of the schedule. There is more precision of authority, more stringency of obligation, in the enactments of the clauses than in the terms of the schedule.

I have carefuly considered the objections taken by the pursuers to this subscription and this docquet in so far as we can now deal with them.

I am satisfied that the docquet—if itself valid—does sufficiently and legally instruct the subscription of the deed by Mrs Atchison. I am also satisfied that in this docquet there is not any violation of the enactments of the statute of 1874. All that the statute requires as necessary to a notarial docquet attesting and instructing subscription by a person who is unable to write is, in my opinion, within this docquet.

In regard to the schedule, the adoption of it is not imperative. It may be adopted. I am of opinion that exact observance of the form of the schedule in minute particulars is not imperative. The statute does not so direct the use, or the mode of the use, of the schedule, as to make every part imperative. The word "may" is not imperative. Not every variance from form is fatal, but only a "material variance."—Nixon v. Nonney, 6 Eng. Jurist, 389. To hold that every trifling deviation from the words of the schedule is fatal to the docquet and to the subscription would be contrary to the spirit of our law, as evinced by all recent legislation and judicial decision on the subject of subscription of deeds.

In the case of Henry v. Reid (10th February 1871) the docquet was not holograph, and this was admitted. If it was necessary that the docquet should be holograph, then there was no doubt that it was void and null, for holograph it was not. That was the only question. No other objection was taken. If the docquet in the case of Henry had been holograph it would have been sustained.

If this case had been under the law previous to the Conveyancing Act of 1874, and if this docquet had been signed by two notaries and four witnesses as then required, and if the docquet had been in the terms of that now before us, I am of opinion that it would have been valid. There is no case of a docquet in such terms as these ever having been set aside on the head of ex facie nullity. Lord Kilkerran's remarks, quoted by your Lordship, are, in my view, most important. A witness subscribing as attesting the docquet does attest what is expressed in the docquet, and this, in the case of a blind person, means that the witness attests the authority given to the notary. That which the notary states in the docquet to have been done is by the witnesses attested. In the case of Hardie (6th December 1810, Fac. Coll.) a docquet less correct than the present was sustained; and that case of Hardie was a unanimous judgment in the time of President Blair, and is referred to as an authority by recent jurists.

Now, it was not the purpose of the recent statute to multiply the requirements of formal procedure, or to increase the difficulties of subscription by the blind. On the contrary, to facilitate such subscription was the Legislature's intent.

Accordingly, my opinion is that the Lord Ordinary's judgment is right.

In repelling the fourth plea in law for the pursuers—a plea founded on the alleged express nullity of this deed—I think the Lord Ordinary has pronounced a decision in accordance with legal principle and precedent; and there is no other question before us, for if that fourth plea is repelled the action of removing falls to be dismissed.

LORD MURE.—Had this been a question which fell to be disposed of under the old law, in a case in which only one notary was required, and there were such cases, I should have been of opinion that this was a good docquet, because it bears that the deed was read over to the granter, that authority was given to the notary to sign, and that in token of the authority the granter touched the pen. In addition to the passage in Erskine which has been referred to, to the effect that the docquet must express the special fact that the granter authorised the notary to sign, I find it laid down in Bell's Principles, section 2226, and in Bell's Law Dictionary, voce Testing Clause, that the statement that authority to sign has been given is the essential point. This docquet also bears that the deed was read over. It was a question at one time whether it was essential to state this in the docquet, but it was decided in the case of Yorkston, 2d December 1794, D. 16,856, that it was not, and in the case of Hardie, 6th December 1810, a docquet which did not bear that the deed was read over was unanimously sustained. I have no hesitation, therefore, in holding that this would have been a good docquet under the older law.

Now, I do not think that the recent statute has imposed any additional requirements beyond requiring by sec. 41, as an essential, that the docquet should bear that the deed was read over to the party, in the presence of the witnesses. In the docquet here in question this has been complied with, and it also bears that the granter desired the notary to sign for her. And as it contains the substance of all that the form given in the schedule contains, though in somewhat different language, still in "words to the like effect," I am of opinion that it complies with all that the 41st section of the statute enacts, as well as all that the older law required.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think it right to make an explanation as to the passage from my opinion in the case of Henry v. Reid which Lord Deas has referred to, as it is capable of a construction which was never intended. I do not say that all these matters must, under the old law, be set forth in the docquet, but that they ought to be set forth. They are three in number,—The granter's having given authority; secondly, that the authority should be intelligently given, and for that purpose that the granter should signify that he is aware of what he is doing, and specify the cause of his inability to write; and thirdly, that this should be done in the presence and hearing of the witnesses. As regards the 1st and 3d points, I am of opinion that they must be set forth; as regards the 2d, I cannot affirm that it is necessary that it should be set forth, and therefore, if that should be construed to be implied in my opinion I beg to disclaim it.

Succession—Nearest of Kin.—Two spouses made a mutual disposition of their whole estate by postnuptial contract, directing that the survivor should have the liferent of the whole, and that after his or her death the estate should pass to trustees, who were directed to divide it into two equal portions, and to pay or convey one to any persons to be appointed in writing by the husband, and "failing his executing such, to his nearest in kin equally." The husband predeceased, having made no appointment of legatees. Upon the death of the wife, held that the fee of the husband's half of the estate destined to his next of kin was intended to be given to those who should be his next of kin at the date of his death, and that upon his death without having exercised the power of appointment their interest vested.

BY postnuptial contract between John Leighton, merchant in Brechin, and his wife, the spouses mutually disponed to each other their whole estate, and directed, inter alia, that the longest liver should, on the death of the other, make up an inventory and valuation of the estate, and deliver a signed duplicate to one of the trustees to be kept "for the use of the nearest in kin or legatees of the first deceaser, and such longest liver shall liferent the whole estate, and shall have the full and entire administration and management thereof during his or her life, with power to sell, use, or dispose thereof for onerous causes, at pleasure," "but shall not have power gratuitously to gift or dispose of the estate to the prejudice of the legatees or nearest in kin of the first deceaser;" and, thirdly, "after the death of the longest liver of the said parties, the said estate and effects shall devolve and belong to George Ferrier," and others, as trustees, "and said trustees shall divide the same into two equal shares after deduction therefrom of the funeral expenses of such longest liver, and of the whole debts and expenses chargeable upon said estate, including the expense of executing the trust hereby created, and one just and equal share thereof shall belong and be paid or conveyed to any person or persons, legatee or legatees, to be named or appointed by or for the purposes to be mentioned in any deed or writing that may be executed by said John Leighton, or failing his executing such, the same shall be paid or conveyed to his nearest in kin, equally, share and share alike, whether they be males or females, or the said property be heritable or moveable, and the other just and equal share thereof shall belong and be paid or conveyed to any person or persons, legatee or legatees, to be named or appointed by or for the purposes to be mentioned in any deed or writing that may be executed by said Elizabeth Leighton, or failing her executing such, the same shall be paid or conveyed to her nearest in kin equally, share and share alike."

John Leighton died in 1841, leaving no testamentary writing other than the postnuptial contract. His widow, who married a Mr Craig, survived him also, and died in 1874. Upon her death various questions arose as to the succession to the half of the estate under Mr and Mrs Leighton's postnuptial contract destined to the legatees or nearest of kin of John Leighton.

A special case was presented by the following parties:—(1) The trustee under Mr and Mrs Leighton's postnuptial contract; (2) the trustee under Mr and Mrs Craig's antenuptial contract; (3) the trustees under a trust-disposition and settlement by Mrs Leighton or Craig and James Craig, the residuary legatee named therein; (4) William Angus, who was in right of John Leighton's nearest of kin at his death; and (5) Robert and John Leighton, who were John Leighton's nearest of kin at the date of the death of his surviving spouse. The first question was in substance whether Mrs Leighton, afterwards Craig, effectually conveyed John Leighton's half of the common estate by her antenuptial contract with Craig. The second and third questions were, assuming that the first should be answered in the negative (as it was),—"2. Is the fourth party entitled to the fee of the share falling to the nearest in kin of John Leighton under the said postnuptial contract? Or, 3. Are the fifth parties entitled to the fee of the said share?"

Argued for the fourth party;—The legacies vested a morte testatoris. The term "nearest in kin" has an ordinary signification,—those who are entitled to succeed ab intestato; and it requires something special in the way of implied intention to displace the natural meaning.

Argued for the fifth party;—The question was entirely one of construction. When a testator used words describing a class the natural period to ascertain who are in that class is when the benefit opens, and that is what the testator must be presumed to have intended.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—(After stating his opinion that the first query must be answered in the negative)—The second and third queries may be taken together. They raise the question whether it is the next of kin of the husband as at his own death or at the death of his widow who are to take his share. That depends upon the construction of one particular clause, and though at first sight the point is attended with some little doubt, I think there is no great difficulty in deciding it. The direction to the trustees is to divide the estate into two equal shares, and "one just and equal share thereof shall belong and be paid or conveyed to any person or persons, legatee or legatees, to be named or appointed by or for the purposes to be mentioned in any deed or writing that may be executed by said John Leighton, or failing his executing such, the same shall be paid or conveyed to his nearest in kin, equally, share and share alike."

This is entirely a question of construction, and any reference to the case of Lord v. Colvin, and other cases of the same class, seems to me out of place, as these decisions are only applicable to cases of intestate succession. The question is, What do the parties mean when they say the nearest of kin, failing legatees of each spouse? The ordinary sense of the words would be the heirs in mobilibus of the spouses, that is, the next of kin of each at the time of his or her death; and when we come to consider the clause more minutely that ordinary construction is confirmed. The destination is not to the next of kin in the first place, but to legatees to be appointed in any writing by John Leighton, or failing his executing such, to his nearest in kin. Suppose he had died after executing a writing appointing a legatee to take his share, what would the result have been? The right of the surviving spouse being one of liferent merely, the legatee must have taken a vested interest from John Leighton's death. Well, if the next of kin take the right, failing legatees, they are conditional institutes. They cannot be described in any other way. They are certainly not substitutes. But when a conditional institute takes on the purification of the condition, he takes exactly what would have vested in the party first preferred, if the condition had not been purified. If no legatee is named, the next of kin must take a vested interest in the husband's half at the date of his predecease, and, if so, it is in vain to say that it is not the parties who then stood to the husband in the relation of next of kin who are called.

LORD DEAS.—On 15th August 1833 John Leighton and Elizabeth his wife, both now deceased, executed a postnuptial contract of marriage by which, in the outset, they disponed, in general terms, the means and estate belonging to each of them respectively to each other, but declaring that this conveyance was granted "for the uses and purposes, and with and under the conditions and provisions underwritten." One of these conditions was to the effect that the longest liver should liferent the whole estate, heritable and moveable, and should "have the full and entire administration and management thereof during his or her life, with power to sell, use, and dispose thereof for onerous causes at pleasure," "but such longest liver shall not have power gratuitously to gift or dispose of the said estate to the prejudice of the legatees or nearest of kin of the first deceaser." It was next provided that after the death of the longest liver the estate and effects, after deduction of funeral expenses, and of "the whole debts and expenses chargeable upon said estate," should be divided, by trustees therein named for the purpose, into two equal shares or halves, one of which should be paid or conveyed to whomsoever the husband should have named by any writing under his hand, and failing his executing such, then to his nearest in kin equally, share and share alike, and the other half should be paid or conveyed to any person or persons to be named or appointed in any deed or writing that may be executed by the said Elizabeth Leighton, or failing her executing such, the same shall be paid or conveyed to her nearest in kin equally, share and share alike.

Mr Leighton died in 1841 without issue, and without having executed any deed or testamentary writing subsequent to the said postnuptial contract.

Mrs Leighton survived her husband, and in 1843 entered into a second marriage with David Craig, on which occasion these parties executed an antenuptial contract of marriage which bore to convey their whole means and estate to the survivor, but with and under the conditions and provisions therein underwritten. These conditions and provisions were in similar terms to those contained in Mr and Mrs Leighton's postnuptial contract, including a provision that one-half of the means and estate should go to whomsoever the husband should appoint, and, failing thereof, to his nearest in kin equally, share and share alike, and the other half to whomsoever the wife should appoint, and, failing thereof, to her nearest in kin, also equally, share and share alike. Mr Craig died in 1871 without issue, and without having executed any deed or testamentary writing subsequent to the said antenuptial contract.

Mrs Leighton or Craig died in September 1874, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement by which she conveyed her whole means and estate, including whatever she had power to dispose of, either through the death of her first or the death of her second husband, to trustees for behoof of certain parties named, of whom the claimant, James Craig, is the sole survivor. He is, at the same time, the sole next of kin of James Craig, her second husband.

The first question stated in the case is in substance whether Mrs Leighton, afterwards Craig, had power under her first marriage-contract to convey or make over, and did by her second marriage-contract effectually convey or make over to the Craigs, the one-half of the means and estate comprehended in her first contract, which had been thereby eventually destined to the Leightons. I am of opinion that she had no such power; that the power to sell, use, and dispose thereof for onerous causes was a power conferred for administration only, and accordingly it was coupled with a declaration that she should not have power gratuitously to gift or dispose of the estate to the prejudice of the legatees or nearest of kin of the first deceaser. In short, she was practically limited to a liferent of that portion of the estate, the fee being destined to the nominees of her husband, and failing such, to her nearest in kin. I concur, therefore, with what I understand to be the result arrived at by all your Lordships, that the first question ought to be answered in the negative, and I have thus far explained what I conceive to be the fair construction of the deed, not because there is any difficulty upon that point, but simply to make clear the observations I have now to make in answering the second and third queries, which raise the important question whether, under a destination such as we have in the post-nuptial contract between Mr and Mrs Leighton, the share which the husband had the power to dispose of, but did not dispose of, goes to his next of kin as at his own death, or to his next of kin as at the date of the death of his wife who survived him.

In the case of Lord v. Colvin the residue of the estate of the testator, Dr Cochrane, was destined to his two sons when they should attain the age of twenty-five, and failing them to the issue of a Mrs Moorhouse. These parties,—everybody, in short, named or described in the deed,—died before the period of vesting arrived. There was no destination of any kind beyond them, and, in these circumstances, the Court held that the parties entitled to take were the testator's next of kin as at the date of his death, or their representatives in their place. The destinations, which had never taken effect, were held to have been mere burdens on the legal right of succession, which flew off as the parties successively died, and ultimately left the estate as free intestate succession.

I expressed no opinion on that question on its merits. It appeared to me, for reasons which I explained very fully, that in one of the branches of Dick v. Gillies[1] the very question had been deliberately decided by the Second Division in the opposite way; and as the question was raised before us, not in a lawsuit in this Court, but by a case directed from Chancery, under the statute, for our opinion, which was to guide the English Court, I thought we ought to consult the other Division, so that the opinion might really be the opinion of the Court of Session, which otherwise it could not be said to be. In this I was overruled, and of course I now accept the opinion of the majority in that case as conclusive of the law wherever the succession is regulated, as it came to be there, provisione legis. The point was new, but I by no means suggest that it was otherwise than rightly decided.

The deed in this case is different in its terms. In Lord's case, failing Dr Cochrane's sons and their issue, and the issue of Mrs Moorhouse, there was no destination, either to the testator's own heirs or to any description of persons whatever. Here, on the contrary, failing the nominees or nominee of Mr Leighton, there is a destination to his nearest of kin equally, share and share alike. That is the destination to which effect must now be given. The destination is therefore regulated, not provisione legis, but provisione hominis.

I see that in the second case of Lord v. Colvin I am reported to have said,—"If there had been in this deed, as regards that residue, an express destination, failing the sons and Mrs Moorhouse all without issue, to the heirs and assignees whomsoever of Dr Cochrane, I rather suppose the result would have been to give the residue to those who were the heirs of Dr Cochrane at the time of the failure of the issue of Mrs Moorhouse. In so far as there is any authority upon the subject, it goes to that." I am disposed to adopt and apply that observation to the present case. There is here, what there was not in Lord v. Colvin, an ultimate destination in favour of the testator's own heirs in mobilibus, for the deed expressly bears that failing Mr Leighton exercising the power of legating his half of the estate, "the same shall be paid or conveyed to his nearest in kin equally, share and share alike, whether they be males or females, or the said property be heritable or moveable." I think that plainly means his nearest in kin at the date of his death; and as William Angus, the party of the fourth part, is now in right of these next of kin, I concur in holding that the second query must be answered in the affirmative, and the third in the negative.

In regard to the remaining queries, I concur with your Lordship, and I have nothing to add.

Lord Ardmillan.—On the second question, I concur in the opinion that the fourth party, who, I understand, represents the nearest of kin at the death of Mr Leighton, is entitled to succeed; and that the fifth party, representing the nearest of kin at the death of Mrs Leighton, afterwards Mrs Craig, is not so entitled.

The decisions quoted, such as Lord v. Colvin, relating to intestate succession, do not, in my opinion, apply to this case, which is a case not of intestate succession, but of testate succession depending on the construction of a deed.

On the question of construction of the deed before us, I concur with your Lordship in the chair. The period for ascertaining the next of kin must, I think, be the same in the two cases,—the one where the legatee was named, and the other where the condition was purified, and there being no nomination of legatees, the next of kin succeed. As matter of fact, no such nomination of legatees was named, but the power to make it must affect the question of construction.

On the other questions I have nothing to add except the expression of my concurrence.

Lord Mure.—I am of opinion that the first question must be answered in the negative. On the point raised by the second and third questions I do not find it necessary to found on the case of Lord v. Colvin, as I do not think that it has any very direct application. That was a case of intestacy. Here the question turns upon the terms of a deed, in which the direction to the trustees is to divide the fund into two equal portions, and to convey one-half to any legatees whom the husband may appoint by a writing under his hand, and, failing such appointment, to "his nearest in kin." Under this clause I think that the nearest in kin whom the parties had in view must be held to be the nearest in kin at his death, because the term, in its ordinary sense, is equivalent to "heirs in mobilibus," who must be looked for at the date of the death of the party whose succession is in question; and when the other clauses of the deed are examined the intention becomes still more clear. Thus, an inventory is to be made up at the death of the first deceaser, and is appointed to be delivered to one or other of the trustees "for the use of the nearest in kin, or legatees, of the first deceaser," thereby clearly shewing that the nearest of kin at his death were, at that date, intended to be benefited by the succession. And the alternative provision in favour of his legatees points to the same construction. It would, I think, be unreasonable to suppose that the makers of the mutual settlement would enable each of them to name legatees, unless they were to be able to select them during their own lives. For if a party is to name a person, or describe a class of persons who are to take as legatees, not at his own death, but on the death of some one who survives himself, it may be for a considerable period, he cannot know for certain who his legatees will be. But I rest my opinion mainly on the broad terms of the destination in favour of the "nearest in kin" of John Leighton.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—" . . . In answer to the second question, find and declare that the fourth party is entitled to the fee of the share falling to the nearest in kin of John Leighton under the said postnuptial contract: In answer to the third question, find and declare that the fifth parties are not entitled to the fee of the said share," &c.

Ferguson's Trustees v. Magistrates of Kinghorn.

Superior and Vassal—Reddendo—Conversion of Victual Feu-Duty—Bear or Barley.—The reddendo of certain lands in the county of Fife, held under a charter of date 1622, was a victual feu-duty of "three chalders bear, guid and sufficient stuff." After proof that the vassals had been in use for upwards of a century to pay this victual feu-duty converted in whole or in part at the rate of the barley fiars, at first, of Midlothian, and latterly of Fife, held (in accordance with Marquis of Tweeddale v. Aytoun, 4 D. 213) that the term "bear" occurring in deeds of the date of the original charter of 1622 applied equally to bear and barley, and that the usage of payment determined that the victual feu-duty was to be paid in barley, or converted at the Fife fiars prices for barley.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Shand. M.

THE trustees of the late Robert Munro Ferguson of Raith and Novar, and, as such, infeft in the lands and barony of Westfield, of which the lands of Rosse formed a part, raised this action against the Magistrates of Kinghorn, as representing the burgh, the vassals of the pursuers in the lands of Rosse, for recovery of byegone feu-duties.

The original charter by the Earl of Morton, then proprietor of the lands of Westfield, to the burgh of Kinghorn, was not produced.

The sasine upon this charter, dated 1623, was produced, but it did not set out the reddendo.

The earliest document found which contained a reddendo was a draft signature of confirmation, partly illegible, which was admitted to have been written between 1649 and 1651. The reddendo clause was,—"To be halden the said lands acres and pertinents y^{r}of be the said Bailies Counsell and Comunitie of the said Burgh and y^{r} successors of the said umq^{ll} Earl his heirs in the Baronies of Aberdour in feu farm and heritage forever zeirlie the said Bailies Counsell and Comunitie of the said Burgh and y^{r} successors to the said umquhile Earl and his said spouse and the longest liver of y^{m} twa and his heirs meall taillie and successors fore[d] three chalder bear guid and sufficient stuff betwixt ye feistes of zuill and candlemas with twenty six capones yeirlie at the feist of Peace in name of s[d] feu ye said Baillies and Counsell of the said burgh and y[r] successors," &c.

It was admitted that the burgh had been in use to pay, in accordance with the terms of the reddendo in this draft signature, a feu-duty of 3 chalders or 48 bolls victual, and a sum of £1, 1s. 8d. The question raised in the action was as to the rate of conversion of the victual feu-duty.

A state was produced, made up from the Raith rental-books and from the accounts and minutes of the burgh, shewing the annual payments by the burgh of Kinghorn to the proprietor of Raith in respect of the Rosse lands, for crops 1766 to 1869 inclusive.

From this it appeared that from 1766 to 1794 the victual feu-duty was partly paid in kind and partly converted, and that from 1794 downwards it was all converted.

That there were no fiars of barley struck in the county of Fife prior to 1789, and that from 1766 to 1789 the conversion was according to the Midlothian best barley fiars.

That from 1789 to 1816 the rate of conversion was always 6d. under the Midlothian best barley fiars, but considerably above the Fife barley fiars.

That from 1816 onwards the conversion was at the rate of the Fife barley fiars.

The burgh averred, but failed to establish by proof, that the payment of the victual feu-duty in barley had been made in terms of an agreement entered into for convenience sake, but which was not binding on them beyond their own pleasure.

The Lord Ordinary, on 29th June 1875, pronounced this interlocutor: —"Finds that the feu-duty payable by the defenders to the pursuers, the superiors of the Rosse lands, described in article 1st of the condescendence, is 48 bolls of barley, and £1, 1s. 8d. sterling in money, and that, in accordance with the usage for time immemorial, the grain feu-duty for crop 1870 should be converted according to the barley fiars prices for the county of Fife for the year, being at the rate of 25s. 7¼d. per boll: Therefore decerns against the defenders in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Finds them liable in expenses," &c.*

* "NOTE.— . . . . Having regard to the decision in the case of the Marquis of Tweeddale v. Aytoun, &c., 9th December 1841, 4 D. 213, and to the facts admitted and proved in this case, the pursuers appear to me to be right in their contention, and I do not think the question is attended with much difficulty. The original feu-charter of the lands, which appears to have been dated in 1622, cannot be found, and no mention of the feu-duty is made in the extract of the sasine, No. 10 of process, dated 9th and registered 20th January 1623, which followed on it. There appears to be no doubt that in this charter and sasine the victual feu-duty would be designated by the term 'hordeum,' and the argument of both parties proceeded on that footing. Beyond the rental-books and other books from which excerpts have been produced the only document in which the feu-duty is mentioned is the writing No. 12 of process, which appears to be the draft of a signature or proposed signature for a charter of confirmation by the Crown of the feu-charter and infeftment which had followed on it, in which the feu-duty is mentioned as three chalders bear, 'guid and sufficient stuff.' This document was recovered a number of years ago, as explained by Mr Barclay, from the papers of the late Mr James Rutherford of Ashintully, who was factor on the estate of Raith, and also town-clerk of Kinghorn. Whether such a document was ever completed or used in obtaining a charter does not appear. It may be assumed, however, that in the original charter and

The defenders reclaimed.

Argued for them;—Though the defenders had paid in error during the past they were not to be prevented from having matters set right in the future. Hordeum was a word of doubtful meaning, and was sometimes used for bear and sometimes for barley, and, consequently, had to be interpreted according to circumstances, as in the Marquis of Tweeddale's case; but "bear" was not, like hordeum, a word of doubtful signification. Bear and barley were botanically two distinct plants, and, "bear" was never used to express barley or anything but bear. They were therefore entitled to have their feu-duty converted at the Fife fiars prices for bear.

Argued for the pursuers;—The victual stipend of 48 bolls bear should be converted as formerly at the rate of the Fife barley fiars. Bear, as used in charters of the 17th century, meant either bear or barley, according as the lands were capable of growing the one or the other.

sasine the feu-duty was described as 3 chalders or 48 bolls 'hordei,' and it appears from the writings of earliest date produced, including the draft of the signature, which may, however, have been written many years after the charter and sasine, that the term 'hordeum' was used to designate bear in the sense in which that word was used at the beginning of the seventeenth century. In the case of the Marquis of Tweeddale the Court proceeded on the view that the terms 'hordeum' and 'bear,' respectively, were used generally to include not only that kind and quality of grain which is distinguished in the fiars prices as bear, but also barley, as belonging to one common genus. It is unnecessary to repeat the reasons on which the Court proceeded. The usage which was proved in that case was held sufficient to shew that the feu-duty was payable in the better class of grain described as hordeum or bear, viz., barley.

"In the present case the usage proved is even more distinct and conclusive than in that case. In the Raith rental-books the feu-duty for the earlier period for which the books are extant is described sometimes as bear and sometimes as barley, but for many years during the later period as barley only. Beginning with 1766, and from that date to 1794, the entries in these books and in the town-council minute-book, shew that the victual feu-duty, in so far as not delivered in kind, was annually converted into money at the Midlothian fiars prices for the best barley. As noticed in Lord Tweeddale's case, fiars prices for barley were fixed in the county of Fife for the first time in 1789. From 1794 to 1816, the whole feu-duty was paid in money, and the rate of conversion was sixpence less than the Midlothian barley fiars, this rate having been uniformly higher than the Fife barley fiars, and the difference having been sometimes considerable. Again, from 1818 till the present question was raised, being upwards of fifty years, the feu-duty has been regularly converted at the Fife barley fiars prices, and the entry in the Raith factor's book in 1818 refers to an agreement as the origin of the change then made, and afterwards given effect to. It is specially worthy of notice that in 1774, and again in 1788, as appears from the town-council minutes, the feu-duty payable was the subject of special investigation, and no question appears to have been raised as to the liability of the vassals at that time to pay at the rate of the Midlothian fiars for the best barley. In the state appended to the last of those minutes in which arrears are mentioned the feu-duty is described under the name barley.

"The result seems to be the proof of an invariable practice for upwards of a century which recognised barley as the victual leviable; and the probable explanation of the Midlothian fiars prices having been taken for so long a time, and even after fiars for barley were fixed in Fife, is that from the nature of the Rosse lands, and the facilities for taking the barley which they produced (and which in the draft signature is referred to as 'bear, guid and sufficient stuff'), to the Midlothian market, the tenants were able practically to realise Midlothian fiars prices. However this may be, the usage appears to me to have settled, beyond reasonable question at the present day, that the pursuers are entitled to have the victual feu-duty converted at the Fife fiars prices for barley."

Ferguson's Trustees v. Magistrates of Kinghorn.

Whether the bear delivered was "guid and sufficient stuff" was to be judged of by the capabilities of the land; and that as the lands now grew barley and not bear, and as there was no contrary usage of payment in bear, or at the fiars price of bear, they were entitled to payment in barley, or at the rate of the Fife barley fiars.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—This case stands in a peculiar position, because we have not the original charter by the Earl of Morton to the burgh of Kinghorn to refer to. We have indeed the sasine upon the original charter, but unhappily in it the reddendo is not set out. It is necessary, therefore, to resort to other evidence in order to determine the case. However, that there was a reddendo stipulated is clear, and usage of payment is established. The only dispute is whether the reddendo, as ascertained by an old draft signature in Exchequer, is to be read as requiring the vassal to deliver to the superior three chalders of bear or three chalders of barley, construing it with reference to the circumstances of the present time. This draft signature is admitted by the parties to have been written between the years 1649 and 1651, and although it appears that nothing followed upon it, it is agreed that it shall be received as sufficient evidence of the reddendo.

What we have in this signature of confirmation is that the lands of Rosse are "to be halden the said lands acres and pertinents y^r^of be the said bailies counsell and comunitie of the said burgh and y^r^ successors of the said umq^ll^ Earl his heirs in the baronies of Aberdour in feu farm and heritage forever zeirlie . the said bailies counsell and comunitie of the said burgh and y^r^ successors to the said umquhile Earl and his said spouse and the longest liver of y^m^ twa and his heirs meall taillie and successors fore^d^ three chalder bear guid and sufficient stuff betwixt ye feistes of zuill and candlemas with twenty six capones yeirlie at the feist of Peace in name of s^d^ feu ye said bailies and counsell of the said burgh and y^r^ successors," &c.

Now, I confess I am unable to distinguish this case from that of the Marquis of Tweeddale, and as far as I am concerned, the ground of my judgment is expressed in a few sentences of Lord Gillies in that case. He is speaking of hordeum, and I may say that it appears to me that hordeum and bear, in charters of the date of the original charter to the burgh, viz. 1622 or thereby, are convertible terms. Lord Gillies says—"I think hordeum may mean either bear or barley, and that it is a mistake to suppose that these are different species of grain. They are only different varieties of the same species, just as there are different varieties of wheat or of oats. It would be absurd to maintain that if at the date of a charter only the worst variety of any of these grains happened to be grown in a country, therefore the payments should in all future time be estimated according to the price of that variety." That is, I think, sound common sense and good law as applied to charters of this kind and date. Applying it to the present case, I cannot doubt that barley such as grown in this part of Fife is to be the bear delivered under this charter.

LORD DEAS.—I agree with your Lordship in thinking that we have sufficient materials to enable us to ascertain what was the reddendo in the original charter. The draft signature produced is obviously a very old writing. Its very appearance would warrant us in looking at it, and we are aided by the admission of the parties that it was made at or about 1650. On the whole, it is pretty clear that the reddendo was as stated in that draft signature.

[1] Marquis of Tweeddale v. Aytoun, Dec. 9, 1841, 4 D. 213, 14 Scot. Jur. 83.

No. 68.

Ferguson's Trustees v. Magistrates of Kinghorn.

That being so, I am also of opinion that the word "bear," as there used, comprehends barley, if it appears that barley has come to be held by the parties as what was to be delivered to the superior. Now, it has been the usage of more than a century to convert this victual feu-duty according to the fiars prices of barley. It appears to have been at first converted according to the fiars prices of Midlothian, there having apparently been no fiars struck for barley in Fife until about 1789. From 1816 down to the raising of the present question it has been converted according to the Fife fiars. It might have been a question whether the conversion was to continue at the Midlothian or at the Fife fiars prices, but that question has not been raised, and we are therefore relieved from any embarrassment which it might have introduced.

The question in the case is whether, the reddendo specifying bear, the vassal is now to deliver or pay for barley, which is just a finer kind of bear. I do not understand it to be disputed that barley has been grown in Fife, and on this very land, for a great part of the period which has elapsed since the granting of the charter to the burgh. If grown in Fife at all it might be expected to be so in the neighbourhood of Kinghorn, which is well known to be among the best land in the county of Fife. That of itself is to my mind conclusive of the question. It is perfectly clear that by "three chalders bear, guid and sufficient stuff," was meant grain grown on the ground of the lands disponed, so that if any difference occurred between the superior and vassal about the quality of the grain tendered under the reddendo the superior would always be entitled to say, give me three chalders of that kind of bear which has been grown on the lands, or similar to what has been so grown, and I will be satisfied. That in a practical point of view seems really to be conclusive.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I have felt this question to be one of interest. There is undoubtedly some nicety in deciding what is the original meaning of hordeum. But, looking to the long period in which barley or its commuted value has been in use to be paid, we must hold now, as was the unanimous opinion of the Court in the case of the Marquis of Tweeddale, that hordeum may mean bear or barley. I think it originally meant barley, but that it may mean bear as one of the inferior kinds of barley; and I find this to be borne out by the opinion, in the Marquis of Tweeddale's case, of Lord President Boyle, who, in addition to his authority as a jurist, was himself no mean authority on farming matters.

We must therefore read the old titles by the aid which we can get from the proof which we have of subsequent usage. If, as has been averred, there was at one time an agreement to convert the victual stipend into barley for convenience sake, that, of course, would to some extent take away the effect of the usage, as illustrating the construction. Where you have usage going back beyond the memory of living men, you are entitled to presume an identity of usage back to the date of the old charter. But if you find an agreement brought as the foundation and explanation of the usage, the case is different. Here I observe that an agreement is mentioned, but I find no such agreement proved, and still less do I find that it led to an altered usage. Payment has been practically made at the current rates of the county for barley, which is the species of hordeum grown in the district. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment should stand.

Partnership—Company—Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845—Assignation—Transfer of Shares—Bankruptcy.—A person executed a transfer of railway shares and a year after his estates were sequestrated. After the sequestration the transfer was duly recorded by the transferee in the railway company's register of transfers. Many years after the registration of the transfer the trustee in the sequestration, who had not taken the steps to complete his title pointed out by the 19th section of the Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, raised an action of reduction and declarator against the transferee and the railway company, in which he claimed the shares, on the ground that, in virtue of the act and warrant of confirmation in his favour (which the Bankrupt Statute declared to be equivalent to an intimated assignation) the shares vested in him at the date of the sequestration. Held that the true criterion of the completion of a title upon a transfer of shares in a public company was not bare intimation to the company, but the reception of the transferee as a partner of the company according to the forms prescribed by the statute; and therefore that although the trustee, at the date of sequestration, was in a position to complete a title to the shares, as he had never complied with the statutory forms, he could not now displace the transferee, who had been duly entered in the company's register as the holder of the shares.

2D DIVISION. Lord Young. R.

THIS action was raised on 1st July 1875 by Mr J. M. Morrison, trustee on the sequestrated estate of George Merrett, against Mr Thomas Harrison and the Forth and Clyde Junction Railway Company.

The conclusions of the summons were for reduction of a memorial or entry in the company's register of a deed of transfer of fifty shares in the Forth and Clyde Junction Railway Company by Merrett in favour of Harrison, and for declarator that the pursuer, as trustee, had right to the shares.

Merrett's estates were sequestrated in 1856, the date of the first deliverance being 13th August 1856. The trustee originally appointed having died, the pursuer was appointed in his room in January 1875.

The transfer of the shares in favour of Harrison was dated 28th June 1855. It was not delivered to the secretary of the railway company, nor any intimation of it made to the company, until after Merrett's sequestration. On the 17th September 1857, about a year after the sequestration, the transfer was received by the secretary of the company, and a memorial thereof duly entered in the register of transfers of the company in terms of the Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845.*

* The following are the sections of the Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, on which the question chiefly turned :—

Sec. 14.—"Subject to the regulations herein, or in the special Act contained, every shareholder may sell and transfer all or any of his shares in the undertaking, ... and every such transfer shall be by deed duly stamped, in which the consideration shall be truly stated; and such deed may be according to the form in the schedule (B) to this Act annexed, or to the like effect."

No. 69.

Feb. 3, 1876. Morrison v. Harrison, &c.

The pursuer averred that the transfer to Harrison was in security only, and pleaded;—(1) The said transfer not having been delivered or intimated to the defenders, the Forth and Clyde Junction Railway Company, and a memorial thereof not having been entered in the register of transfers of said company until after the sequestration of Mr Merrett's estates, the pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of the conclusions.

Mr Harrison pleaded;—(2) The defender having acquired right to the said shares before his cedent's bankruptcy, was thereby empowered to complete his title by enrolment in the register of transfers, and the said memorial and enrolment are not reducible under the bankruptcy laws.

The railway company stated;—"The defenders, the Forth and Clyde Junction Railway Company, take no part in the question of the ownership of fifty shares in their undertaking raised in this action, and they offer no opposition to any decree as to the right to these shares, whether the same be in favour of the pursuer, or of the defender Thomas Harrison. They have only to explain that no declaration was lodged with them by the pursuer, or his predecessor in office, in terms of section 19 of 'The Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845,' and of the practice of the defenders and other railway companies thereunder; that the transfer in favour of the defender Thomas Harrison was presented to and registered by them in the ordinary course of business, so far as they were concerned, under section 16 of the said Act, and that, in terms of said section 16, the share certificates were thereupon endorsed and delivered to the defender, the said Thomas Harrison. That according to the practice of the defenders and other railway companies, and the terms and intent of the said Act, the said certificates should be delivered up and cancelled before the said company can register the pursuer and issue new certificates in his favour."

Sec. 15 provides that transfers may be executed according to Scotch or English form.

Sec. 16.—"The said deed of transfer (when duly executed) shall be delivered to the secretary, and be kept by him; and the secretary shall enter a memorial thereof in a book to be called the 'register of transfers,' and shall endorse such entry on the deed of transfer, and shall, on demand, deliver a new certificate to the purchaser; . . . . and on the request of the purchaser of any share an endorsement of such transfer shall be made on the certificate of such share instead of a new certificate being granted; and such endorsement, being signed by the secretary, shall be considered in every respect the same as a new certificate; and until such transfer has been so delivered to the secretary as aforesaid, the vendor of the share shall continue liable to the company for any calls that may be made upon such share, and the purchaser of the share shall not be entitled to receive any share of the profits of the undertaking, or to vote in respect of such share."

Sec. 19.—"If the interest in any share have become transmitted in consequence of the death or bankruptcy or insolvency of any shareholder, or in consequence of the marriage of a female shareholder, or by any other lawful means than by a transfer according to the provisions of this or the special Act, such transmission shall be authenticated in writing as hereinafter mentioned, or in such other manner as the directors shall require; and every such declaration shall state the manner in which, and the party to whom such share shall have been so transmitted, and shall be made and signed by some credible person before a Sheriff or Justice, and such declaration shall be left with the secretary, and thereupon he shall enter the name of the person entitled under such transmission in the register of shareholders; . . . . and until such transmission has been so authenticated no person claiming by virtue of any such transmission shall be entitled to receive any share of the profits of the undertaking, nor to vote in respect of any such share as the holder thereof."

Morrison v. Harrison, &c.

And pleaded;—(1) The share certificates endorsed and issued in favour of the defender Harrison should be delivered up to the defenders' company before any decree is pronounced for the registration of the pursuer and the issue of new certificates in his favour. (2) The said company are entitled to expenses.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustains the defences, and assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses," &c.

Argued for the pursuer;—Apart from statute, it was certain that the trustee, who in virtue of the act and warrant of confirmation in his favour held the first intimated assignation,[1] was preferable.[2] The argument for the defender was in effect that unless a transference was effected modo et forma, as pointed out by the Companies Clauses Act, it was ineffectual. The statute did not provide a complete code for the transfer of shares. It pointed out certain proceedings which might be followed, but it left all the common law methods of transmission untouched. The statute, indeed, expressly recognised bankruptcy as an effectual transmission of shares. The words of the 19th section, "have become transmitted," shewed that it was not the declaration which vested the shares in the trustee or other legal assignee. Having already so vested, the assignee had a certain method of completing his title for the purposes of railway bookkeeping, and for the purpose of relieving the former holder of liability to calls upon the shares, and giving the assignee a right to the share of the profits. It was not of much importance whether the provisions of the statute were held to be imperative or directory; for even if they were imperative, the precise consequences of not following them were pointed out (sec. 16). These forms were prescribed for the convenience of the company,[3] and it was jus tertii for any third party to plead the want of them.[4]

Argued for the defender Harrison;—The Legislature were dealing with a new and peculiar species of property. A transferable share in a public company represented only the right to become a member of the corporation. Accordingly, the Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, secs. 14–21, contained a complete code for the transfer of shares in such companies. The pursuer argued on the footing that intimation was something over and above the statute, whereas the statute regulated the mode in which intimation must be made. There was no authority for saying that a secretary of a railway company was entitled to refuse to make an entry of a transfer because some one had written a letter to him that he had got an assignation to the same shares. The very words of the Bankruptcy Act put the trustee in no better position than a transferee who had written such a letter, which was quite unavailing. The statute prescribed the mode in which the trustee must complete his title; and as in the case of heritable securities, he had to run a race of diligence with competing creditors. It was competent for a creditor to complete a security after bankruptcy by any step which did not require the bankrupt's intervention.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is an important case, and as it touches upon questions of difficulty we might have taken time to consider our judgment. But I am so well satisfied with the argument addressed to us on behalf of the defender that I am prepared at once to affirm the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

I do not think it necessary to hold that the Companies Clauses Act provides a code for the transfer of shares in the sense that any deviation from the form prescribed vitiates what is intended to be done. The statute points out a certain course which is in general to be followed where the transmission takes place inter vivos. Substantially, however, shares may be transferred by any mode habile in law to transfer personal property of that kind; but where this is not done in the form pointed out by the statute certain additional procedure is necessary before the company are bound to put the transferee on the register of shareholders. That which is essential under the statute is that the transferee shall be put on the register of shareholders, and the only question precedent to that is, whether the title to be put on the register of shareholders has been transferred by a habile deed.

When this, however, is granted, the case for the trustee is not advanced. He says that he holds an intimated assignation, and that is the case. He might so acquire a right to become a partner of the company, but the question is whether he is a partner. That he can only attain according to the rules of the copartnery which he seeks to enter. I think the observation made by the Dean of Faculty is sound, that the transferable share in a joint stock company does not by itself represent the full interest the partner has in it. It represents the right to become a partner in the company, and the right to become a partner is surrounded by conditions which the company are entitled and bound to observe. One of these is, among other formalities, that the deed of transfer is to be delivered to the secretary, and kept by him, before the cedent is divested of and the transferee can acquire the character of a partner. The ultimate result is to place the transferee not merely in the position of the holder of an assignation with intimation but of a partner with its rights and liabilities. It is quite plain, therefore, that an assignation to shares, though intimated, will not make the assignee a partner of the company.

In this case the defender Harrison completed his transfer by becoming a partner of the company twenty years ago. Since then he has been liable for the debts and obligations of the company, and the bankrupt has been liberated from them in respect of the defender's name being placed on the register. The trustee is not a partner, and never was. He has never taken the steps necessary for becoming a partner, and he cannot now displace the defender from that position.

LORD NEAVES.—I concur, and upon the same grounds.

Mere assignation is not the proper mode of completing a right of this kind. Assignation is the transmission of a jus crediti. In its original conception it was a mandate from the cedent to the assignee to recover a debt due to him. The purpose of intimation is twofold—to prevent the debtor from paying to his original creditor, and to shew that the assignee is henceforth to be held as the proper and sole creditor. These principles are not applicable to the transfer of a bilateral right like partnership, a position involving both active and passive consequences, both rights and liabilities. There must be some proceeding necessary to complete the transfer, amounting to a claim on the part of the transferee to exercise the rights of a partner, and to an agreement on his part to assume the liabilities of a partner. The mere appointment of a trustee in a sequestration does not confer upon him the position of a partner in every or any company of which the bankrupt was a member; and that position may often not be a safe or proper one for him to assume.

The transmission of shares in a company is a thing sui generis, to be governed not by the rules which regulate the transmission of a unilateral debt, but by the necessity of the transferee asserting the position of a partner. The statute here prescribes the mode in which this is to be done.

Lord Ormidale.—I am of the same opinion. The question which we have to decide relates to a species of property which has been for years growing into increasing importance, and it is certainly somewhat remarkable, if such a question as the present has, as it was said, not hitherto been brought into controversy either in the Courts of England or Scotland. If that be so, I can only account for it by supposing that the statutory provisions in regard to the mode of transferring shares have been held to be too clear and unambiguous to admit of serious doubt as to their true meaning and effect. And, not improbably, it was this consideration that, for a period of twenty years, prevented the present action from being raised.

I am quite clear, with your Lordships, that the defender Mr Harrison has a good and the only right to the shares in dispute. He held at the date of and for a considerable time before the bankruptcy a regular and unobjectionable transfer of these shares. It is true that the transfer was not registered, and that the bankruptcy and sequestration intervened before it was registered. But still registration was made, and the title of Mr Harrison thereby completed, before that of the trustee. There might possibly have occurred a race, such as has sometimes taken place, between a trustee for the general creditors in a sequestration and the holder of a heritable security not completed by infeftment. If a creditor holding such a security gets first infeft he will cut out the trustee. So here Mr Harrison, having got his right and title to the disputed shares duly completed by registration before the trustee or any one else, must, having regard to the statutory provisions bearing on the matter, be held to be the owner of them,—keeping in view that there was nothing unfair or fraudulent in anything he did. The trustee says that the act and warrant in his favour operated as an intimated assignation, and that this was enough to cut out Mr Harrison, as he had not previously intimated his transfer by presenting it for registration or otherwise. I cannot think there is anything in this. The only form or kind of intimation available in relation to the shares in question was the statutory one of giving in the transfer for registration and getting it registered. In any other view the railway company would require to keep not only a register of transfers but also a register of intimations,—a thing unheard of in reference to railway stock.

Morrison v. Harrison, &c.

Without saying more, except that I concur generally in the views which have been expressed by both your Lordships, I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be adhered to.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion. The true completion of a transfer of shares in a joint stock or railway company, constituted under the public general statutes regulating railway and joint stock companies, appears to me to be the reception of the transferee as a shareholder of the company, so as to give him the rights and subject him to the liabilities of a partner. There may be a contract to convey shares in the company and to accept thereof and to become a shareholder, but that remains a mere contract or obligation until it is completed by the party actually becoming a shareholder. In that view I think the Dean of Faculty's argument is well founded, that bare intimation to the company, not followed by the transferee becoming and being received as a partner, is not the criterion of completion of the rights of the transferee. If so, the whole argument for the pursuer falls to the ground, for the pursuer's right has never been completed either by actual intimation or by the terms of the Bankrupt Act, which makes the act and warrant equivalent to intimation. The Bankruptcy Act makes the trustee's rights to the bankrupt's moveable estate as complete as if actual delivery, or possession, or intimation had followed. Delivery or possession is out of the question in a case like the present, where the right is the incorporeal right arising to a partner of a railway company. Delivery and possession are not applicable or appropriate to such a right, and accordingly the trustee maintains that his right is equivalent to an intimated assignation. But, even at common law intimation does not complete a right of this kind. It gives no right to the assignee to assume the position of a partner, though it may be effectual for certain purposes as an inchoate right. On the terms of the Companies Clauses Act this is still more clear. Until received by the company the assignee is not entitled to act as a partner, to uplift or draw dividends, or to attend and vote at meetings, nor will he be liable in calls or responsible for the debts of the company, or otherwise liable as a partner.

The circumstances of the present case are very much against the pursuer's claim. It would be extraordinary if the trustee could lie out for twenty years, avoiding all responsibility for the shares, it may be during their period of depression, and let Mr Harrison take all the risk of the company failing, and then after the shares have greatly risen (and this may possibly be the case) step in and claim the whole. This is an illustration of the propriety of the principle that admission to the company is the test of preference.

Counsel for the pursuer objected to expenses being found due to the railway company, on the ground that they had no interest in appearing. Expenses were only concluded for against them in the event of their appearing to defend the action.

LORD NEAVES.—The company had an interest to see that they were not obliged to keep a register of intimations.

THE COURT adhered, and found the pursuer liable in additional expenses to both defenders.

Sheriff—Jurisdiction—Poor, collection of Assessment for—8 and 9 Vict. c. 83, sec. 88.—Held that in an action brought in the Sheriff Court by a parochial board for recovery of poor-rates, the function of the Sheriff is not ministerial to interpone judicial authority for recovery of the assessment but judicial, and that it is competent for the Sheriff to entertain and decide questions as to the legality of the assessment.

Observations on the cases of Calder v. Trotter, June 8, 1833, 11 S. 694, and Pollok v. Robertson, Nov. 12, 1833, 12 S. 14.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Argyllshire. M.

THIS action was raised in the Sheriff Court of Argyllshire by the inspector of poor and collector of poor-rates for the parish of North Knapdale against the Commissioners of the Caledonian Canal, to recover, inter alia, the sum of £555, 18s. 3½d. as poor-rates due by the defenders for the years from 1865-66 down to 1872-73 inclusive, in respect of their being proprietors and occupiers of that portion of the Crinan Canal which was situated in the parish of North Knapdale.

The pursuer pleaded;—(3) The defenders having failed timeously to appeal against or object to the assessments imposed on them for the years from Whitsunday 1865 to Whitsunday 1869, are debarred from challenging the assessments for these years. (5) The assessments pursued for having been regularly and validly imposed, the pursuer is entitled to decree therefor, with interest and expenses as concluded for.

The defenders stated the preliminary plea;—(1) The action should be dismissed, in respect that the Sheriff has no jurisdiction to try the present question.

In support of this plea the defenders relied on the Acts 43 Geo. III. c. 102, sec. 37, and 44 Geo. III. c. 62, sec. 81, which they contended subjected them only to the jurisdiction of the Court of Session, and which had been renewed in general terms in subsequent Acts.

The defenders' main plea on the merits was—(3) The defenders should be assoilzied, in respect that the annual average cost of repairs, and other expenses necessary for the maintenance of the canal and its appurtenances, and the rates, taxes, and public charges payable in respect of the same, exceed the gross annual value of the subjects, and there is therefore no annual value in respect of which assessments can be imposed.

The Sheriff-substitute (Home) and the Sheriff (Irvine) repelled the preliminary plea for the defenders, and it was not farther insisted in.

Thereafter, the Sheriff-substitute pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard parties' procurators, and made avizandum, Finds, as regards the conclusion for poor-rates, that the Sheriff's duties are only ministerial, and that the defenders' pleas as to the assessments being imposed on too large a valuation cannot therefore be entertained in the Sheriff Court: . . . . Therefore decerns against the defenders for the sum of £555, 18s. 3½d. sterling of poor-rates . . . . with interest from the time of said assessment falling due, in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Finds the pursuer entitled to his expenses," &c.*

* "NOTE.—It seems to the Sheriff-substitute sufficiently settled by the cases of Calder v. Trotter, 8th June 1833, 11 S. 694, and Pollok, 12th November 1833, 12 S. 14, that the Sheriff's duties as regards the recovery of assessments under the poor-law, are purely ministerial, and he sees no reason to doubt that the law as laid down by these decisions is as much in force as ever, though he understood the defenders' procurator to suggest that this was not the case. It is therefore beyond his power to inquire into the justice of the assessment; the

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—The Poor-Law Amendment Act of 1845 created an entirely new system of poor-law administration. The former Acts and Proclamations[1] had been swept away. They constituted what was really a criminal code against begging. They laid on the Sheriff nothing but a ministerial duty, and conferred no discretion upon him. The heritors and kirk-session were to stent themselves at their own discretion, and all that the Sheriff had to do was to give effect to their resolutions. But the Act of 1845 committed to a new body the power of assessing for the poor. The parochial board, as representatives of the ratepayers, while fulfilling all, and more than all, the duties of the heritors and kirk-session, were in a very different position. They were a statutory body whose functions and powers were derived solely from statute. They were subject, just like any other local board, to the Sheriff's jurisdiction, so far as not excluded by statute. They were empowered[2] to apply to him for a summary defenders' objections to it may possibly enough be perfectly good, but they cannot be entertained in the Sheriff Court." . . . .

* "NOTE.—The defenders plead that the deductions to which they are entitled under section 37 of the Poor-Law Amendment have not been made to the full extent, and they contend that had they been so made no assessable value would have remained on which rates could be imposed. The immediate question is, whether the matter of this defence may competently be inquired into in the Sheriff Court.

"It seems clear that where the parochial board adopts the summary mode of recovery authorised by section 88 of the statute the Sheriff acts ministerially rather than judicially. On production of sufficient evidence that the assessment remains unpaid warrant is usually granted as matter of course, and the only competent remedy is suspension of that decree.

"But does this necessarily hold where the parochial board, leaving the summary method authorised by the Act, proceeds by ordinary action in the Sheriff Court? Where, as in the present case, objection is taken, going substantially to the legality or illegality of the mode of assessment, and a question is thus raised, whether that which has been done is within the powers of the parochial board, it may be argued that the Sheriff must have jurisdiction to entertain and determine the point, 'because it truly resolves into the question whether or not the case is one which authorises him to interpose.'

"It appears to the Sheriff that there would be much force in this argument could the question be considered as still open; but the plea was urged unsuccessfully in two cases already referred to in the course of these proceedings, viz., Calder v. Trotter, 8th June, and Pollok v. Robertson, 12th November 1833. In the latter case the plea maintained for the defender had the high sanction of the Lord Ordinary, Fullerton, but failed to convince the Judges of the First Division, who unanimously altered the interlocutor. It is true that these judgments were given before the passing of the Poor-Law Amendment Act of 1845, but it does not appear that this affects their application. The parochial board comes substantially into the place of the heritors and minister in matters relating to the relief of the poor, and by section 40 of the Act remedy is reserved to any one who considers himself aggrieved by any assessment—'in the like form, and on the same grounds, as at the date of the passing of the Act was competent to any party who considered himself aggrieved by any assessment imposed under the statutes then in force for the relief of the poor.' Nor is it unimportant to observe that for the thirty years during which the Act has been in force, and amidst the many questions that have arisen under it, no decision has been pointed out controverting the principle involved in the earlier cases referred to."

warrant or by way of small-debt action in order to recover rates. But there was nothing to prevent them appealing to his ordinary jurisdiction, and if they did so there was nothing to prevent him applying his mind to the case and disposing of defences and objections. If they wanted his ministerial interference merely they could always ask for a summary warrant. But if they proceeded by way of ordinary action they must shew that they were entitled to decree. The cases of Calder and Pollok, referred to on the other side, were obsolete, as having occurred prior to the passing of the Act of 1845.

Argued for the parochial board;—There was nothing to distinguish the position and functions of the Sheriff in relation to the administration of the poor-laws under the Act of 1845 from what they were prior to the passing of that Act. The Sheriff could act in the matter ministerially only, or as the executive of the assessing body. It had been so held conclusively in the cases of Calder v. Trotter,[1] and Pollok v. Robertson.[2]

Lord Deas.—In this case the parochial board of North Knapdale raised an action in January 1874 before the Sheriff of Argyllshire against the Commissioners of the Caledonian Canal, concluding, inter alia, for the amount of poor-rates which they had imposed on the commissioners for the years from Whitsunday 1865 to Whitsunday 1873. A record was made up in that action, and certain pleas in law, both preliminary and on the merits, were stated for the defenders.

The important question decided by the Sheriff was that his function under the Poor-Law Act was purely ministerial, and that question, which has been fully argued, is the only one with which we have now to deal.

The Commissioners of the Caledonian Canal maintain upon the merits that when deduction is made of their total outgoings for repairs, &c., nothing remains on which they can be assessed. The Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute did not enter into the question. They held that the Sheriff's function was purely ministerial to interpone judicial authority for recovery of the assessment laid on by the parochial board, and consequently they simpliciter decerned for the amount of poor-rates so assessed, and for the registration assessment, which last is no longer in dispute. In the note to his interlocutor giving effect to this view, the Sheriff-substitute says it seems to him to be sufficiently settled by the cases of Calder and of Pollok, that "the Sheriff's duties, as regards the recovery of assessments under the poor-law, are purely ministerial, and he sees no reason to doubt that the law, as laid down by these decisions, is as much in force as ever, though he understood the defenders' procurator to suggest that this was not the case. It is therefore beyond his power to inquire into the justice of the assessment." The Sheriff, while acknowledging the force of the opposite argument had the question been open, held himself foreclosed by the above decisions, and consequently affirmed his Substitute's interlocutor.

It becomes, therefore, necessary to inquire into the grounds of judgment in these two cases of Calder and Pollok, and whether that ground of judgment still remains applicable.

Now, the ground of these decisions, I think, was simply this,—that the heritors and kirk-session, in administering the poor-law, as it then existed, were substantially acting as a Court. They had a judicial jurisdiction as well as a ministerial function. There was no statutory power conferred on the Sheriff to review their decisions; and as, in the ordinary case, no inferior Court can review the decisions of another inferior Court, it followed that in the supreme Court alone could that review be competently obtained. That, I think, is the explanation of the decisions in the cases of Calder and of Pollok, and, looking to the position in which the heritors and kirk-session then stood, I think it was a sound ground of decision.

I do not propose to go over in detail the Acts of Parliament and Proclamations of the Privy Council on the subject of relief of the poor, which, acting on my suggestion, were so fully brought under our notice by the Dean of Faculty in his reply. But I am satisfied that the conclusion is a sound one that the heritors and kirk-session, while acting within their competency, were acting in a judicial capacity, and consequently that their decisions were not subject to review except in this Court.

That being so, the next question is, whether the parochial board have been placed, by the Poor-Law Amendment Act of 1845, in the same judicial position which was previously occupied by the heritors and kirk-session? There is no presumption in favour of that view. It is one thing to say that the Sheriff is not to review the decisions of another inferior Court, and quite another thing to say that he is not to review what has been erroneously done by a popular board, chosen, to a great extent, from among the general body of ratepayers, under a new and totally different code of laws. There are some matters expressly provided for in the Act to be dealt with by the Sheriff, and others to be dealt with by the Board of Supervision; and it may very well be that in the exercise of certain discretionary powers the parochial board may be subject to no review at all. But that is quite a different question from whether the parochial board is a Court of law, whose decisions cannot, for that reason, be reviewed elsewhere than in the Court of Session. The 40th section of the Act provides that nothing contained in the Act shall preclude any person aggrieved by an assessment from his remedy at law in like manner and on the same grounds as at the date of the Act, "but to the extent and effect only of exempting himself from payment of any surcharge which may have been made upon him." It would be very inconvenient if relief from that surcharge, however trifling in amount, could be obtained only in the Court of Session. The present question relates solely to alleged surcharges, and it is only as to these that we are called upon to decide. They happen to be large, but the smallness of their amount could have made no difference in the view taken by the Sheriff. If such a rule had been intended, I think it ought to have been and would have been distinctly expressed. The remedy by law reserved by sec. 40 to the party aggrieved in the like form as at the date of the passing of the Act must mean, in the absence of anything said to the contrary, in the appropriate form of an action at law in any Court competent at the date when the action is brought. There is nothing in the words here used to erect the parochial board into a Court of law if not so erected otherwise, and consequently it was not this section but section 88 which was mainly relied on in support of the Sheriff's view. Section 88 enacts that all rights and remedies applicable to the recovery of the public taxes shall be applicable to assessments for relief of the poor, "and the Sheriffs, Magistrates, Justices of the Peace, and other Judges may grant the like warrants for the recovery of all such assessments in the same form and under the same penalties as is provided in regard to such land and assessed taxes, and other public taxes: Provided always that it shall nevertheless be competent to prosecute for and recover such assessments by action in the Sheriff's Small-Debt Court." It was maintained that this section forms a code of procedure, and confines the Sheriff's duties to such as are ministerial merely, except in actions competent in the Small-Debt Court. At first sight there is some plausibility in this argument. But, unfortunately for its soundness, it goes too far. The parochial board might have applied to the Sheriff for a summary warrant, in which case his duty would, I presume, have been ministerial merely. But that is not what they did. They instituted an ordinary action by a summons in the ordinary Sheriff Court form, concluding not for a summary warrant under section 88 of the Poor-Law Act, but that the defenders ought to "be decerned to pay to the pursuer," the inspector of the board, certain specified sums, with interest and expenses of process. The board, through their inspector, concurred in making up a voluminous record by condescendence and defences, and revised condescendence and revised defences, on the merits of the claim, with pleas in law appended, in the course of all which there is not a word said about a summary warrant, and the 88th section of the statute is never once alluded to, either in the statements or pleas. Nor did the Sheriff-substitute grant a summary warrant under authority of that section. What he did was to decern against the defenders for £555, 18s. 3½d. of poor-rates, and £12 of registration assessments, with interest, "in terms of the conclusions of the summons," and to remit the account of expenses, which he found due to the pursuer, to the Auditor of Court to be taxed in ordinary form, and to this interlocutor the Sheriff simpliciter adhered.

But, in truth, the 88th section of the Act, in place of excluding the Sheriff's jurisdiction when appealed to, as it was here, by the parochial board, in an ordinary action, is, when the proviso is attended to, strongly the other way. The proviso, referring back to the power conferred of obtaining summary warrants, bears that "it shall nevertheless be competent to prosecute for and recover such assessments by action in the Sheriff's Small-Debt Court." It cannot be contended that, under this proviso, an action could be brought in the Small-Debt Court for a sum exceeding the very limited amount to which the jurisdiction of that Court is conferred. A plea to that effect would imply that the action in the present instance had been brought in the wrong Court, but would be obviously unfounded. A small-debt action may, however, in all cases be remitted by the Sheriff to his ordinary roll, which strongly implies that it is the statutory limitation of amount and not the nature of the claim which prevents it from originally coming into that roll. The natural construction of the proviso is that common law procedure in the ordinary Courts for recovery of the poor-rates not being excluded by the special powers of recovery conferred by the Act, the like procedure shall be competent where the sum is limited to the statutory amount in the Small-Debt Court, notwithstanding the peculiar nature of the claim and the other and more stringent remedies which might be resorted to. And this appears to me to be the reasonable and sound construction of the enactment. It was argued, indeed, on behalf of the board, that the Sheriff can have no jurisdiction in the matter in question, other than what is expressly conferred on him by the statute of 1845. I do not think that that is so. The only thing which excluded or rather sopited the Sheriff's jurisdiction prior to the Act of 1845 was that jurisdiction had been committed to another Court, namely, the heritors and kirk-session, whose decisions he could not review. But when that Court ceased to exist, his ordinary jurisdiction came into play without any enactment to that effect being required.

On the whole, I am of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute and Sheriff ought to have dealt judicially with the action, and that in so far as they have not done so their interlocutors ought to be recalled. On the merits, however, the amount sued for being large, and extensive inquiry being necessary, the action may properly enough be allowed to go on in this Court.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—This case is by no means unattended with difficulty. The action was commenced in the Sheriff's ordinary Court, at the instance of the parochial board, seeking to recover certain arrears of assessments. That action was resisted by the defenders, on the ground that the amount sued for was not due, in respect that large deductions should have been made from their valuation as appearing in the assessor's books, and that if these deductions were made nothing would remain on which to impose an assessment. The Sheriff-substitute has decided for the pursuers, and given decree de plano as craved, with expenses, and he explains in his note that the Sheriff's duties in regard to the recovery of assessments are purely ministerial. That judgment was appealed to the Sheriff, who affirmed it, and stated that he held himself bound by prior decisions. In short, the ground of the decision by both the Sheriffs is that an action for recovery of poor-assessments is an action in which the Sheriff is bound to proceed in his purely ministerial capacity, that he can decern for the sum concluded for and for expenses, but cannot dispose of any defences that may be stated.

At first sight this appears a strange result. I always thought that assessments in this country can be enforced only by bodies whose acts were reviewable by some superior body, or by a Judge who was required to apply his mind to the question. To say that a person is to be charged on a Sheriff's warrant to pay a sum in which he has been assessed by a parochial board, with no power to resist, or opportunity of shewing cause why he should not be so charged, is indeed, to my mind, very startling, and leads at once to the question, Is it really the case that in this matter the Sheriff is acting merely ministerially, as the executive of the parochial board? It is pretty clear that but for the cases of Calder and Pollok such would not have been the Sheriff's own opinion. He has yielded his own opinion to supposed authority. It is necessary therefore, at the outset, to consider those two cases, and the circumstances in which they were decided, to see if they apply as conclusive authority.

The true view, in my opinion, is that, prior to the passing of the Poor-Law Amendment Act of 1845, the heritors and kirk-session were in the position of an inferior judicatory, whose decisions were reviewable by this Court, but not by the Sheriff. When, therefore, the Sheriff proceeded, as he was bound, to enforce the resolutions of the heritors and kirk-session, he may be said to have been acting only in an executive or ministerial character, the judicial function residing, in the first place, in the heritors and kirk-session, and in the ultimate resort in this Court. Accordingly, as has already been explained, the Court held, and rightly held, in the case of Calder, which is the leading case, and of Pollok, both decided in the year 1833, that the Sheriff's function in relation to the assessment for the poor laid on by the heritors and kirk-session was purely ministerial.

I concur with your Lordship in holding that the parochial board, under the Act of 1845, does not in this respect occupy the same position in this matter as the heritors and kirk-session formerly did. Accordingly, we do not find that any resolution of a parochial board has ever been brought here directly for review. It is true, a parochial board may go to the Sheriff and get the Sheriff to interpose, periculo petentis, his authority, in order to enforce their resolution. If they do, the Sheriff issues his warrant very much as he did before the Act of 1845, and his warrant may be brought under suspension in this Court. But the Act of 1845 gave a parochial board power to go to the Sheriff otherwise than merely to obtain, at their instance and risk, an executorial summary warrant. The Act gave them power to appeal to him in the exercise of his judicial functions in one of his ordinary judicial tribunals—in the Small-Debt Court.

Now, the question here arises, does section 88 of the Act of 1845, which authorises the parochial board to apply for a summary warrant, or to raise action in the Small-Debt Court, create a code of procedure which cannot be departed from, or does it give the remedy of a summary warrant, which would not have been available without such statutory enactment, and then merely mention an action in the Small-Debt Court to obviate any misapprehension as to the competency of the procedure, without intending to create an absolute code? The pursuers brought the action. If this is an absolute code, their action is not competent. If it is not an absolute code, why should the Sheriff's judicial jurisdiction be excluded? The case, if in the small-debt roll, might have been transferred to the ordinary roll—a thing often done. I am clearly of opinion that the 88th section cannot be held as so absolutely a code as to limit the competency of procedure to the small-debt roll. The respondents at any rate cannot well contend that the 88th section creates a strict and inflexible code of procedure, for they themselves have deviated from it, and brought their action, not in the Small-Debt Court, but in the ordinary Court of the Sheriff. Therefore, they cannot say, and do not say, that such action is incompetent. Now, I am humbly of opinion that the Sheriff in his own Court is a Judge, the Judge Ordinary, and that his functions are judicial, unless it clearly appears that by the direct interposition of statute they are declared or rendered merely ministerial. I do not say that the Act of 1845 makes this procedure by force of statute an application to the Sheriff in his judicial capacity, but I do say that the Sheriff is a Judge, and that his deliverances in his ordinary Court are judicial, unless there is in the statute some provision operating as a direct exclusion of the judicial functions of the Sheriff. The action has, in my opinion, been competently raised in the Sheriff's ordinary Court, and so the respondents maintain, and if so, it is competent for the Sheriff, when called on to decide for one party, to see that he does justice between the parties by disposing of the defences.

I go no farther at present. I give no opinion as to the nature of those defences. The only decision that we can give now is that the Sheriffs have yielded to decisions not applicable, and have thus misapprehended their position under the statute of 1845.

Lord Mure.—I agree in the opinions expressed by your Lordships, and substantially on the grounds stated by Lord Deas—namely, that parochial boards do not act in a quasi judicial capacity in relation to this matter as the heritors and kirk-session did prior to the Poor-Law Amendment Act of 1845; and that the cases of Calder and Pollok have now therefore no application. It appears to me that the whole machinery for enforcing assessments and obtaining relief from surcharges which was in operation at the date of the passing of the Act of 1845 was altered by that Act. Formerly the Sheriff acted ministerially merely in enforcing payment of the rates laid on by the heritors and kirk-session, and his duties were limited to that. But by section 88 of the Act of 1845 a complete change was effected in the mode in which assessments were to be recoverable. One method was introduced by that section under which the Sheriff was still to act merely ministerially in the same way as he acted in relation to the land and assessed taxes. But the section did not limit the mode of recovery to this. It provided for recovery in the Small-Debt Court by a small-debt action, which involves judicial investigation by the Sheriff of any defences that might be proponed. This makes it pretty clear that the Sheriff was not intended under the Act of 1845 to act entirely in a ministerial capacity. And the question that remains is, did the statute intend to exclude the right of action in such cases in the Sheriff's ordinary Court. I confess that I had at first some difficulty on this point. But on consideration I have come to be of opinion with your Lordships that the ordinary jurisdiction of the Sheriff was not excluded by this provision of the statute. And one ground upon which I have been led to this conclusion is that by authorising such recovery in a summary way the Legislature was, by implication at least, if not directly, sanctioning proceedings in the ordinary Court, because it is made competent for a Sheriff by the 14th section of the Small-Debt Act, in any case of difficulty, to order written pleadings and when he does so he is required to remit the case to his ordinary roll.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 29th April 1875 and the interlocutor of the Sheriff of 7th July 1875, in so far as they relate to the finding that, as regards the conclusion for poor-rates, the Sheriff's duties are only ministerial, and that the defenders' pleas as to the assessments being imposed on too large a valuation cannot therefore be entertained in the Sheriff Court: . . . . Recall in hoc statu the decerniture for the sum of £555, 18s. 3½d. sterling of poor-rates, and also the finding as to expenses; reserve all other questions hinc inde between the parties, and continue the cause in the roll; and reserve also all questions of expenses in the Sheriff Court and this Court."

Ship—Charter-party—Demurrage—Lay-days.—A charter-party stipulated that the vessel should "proceed to a loading berth in Leith docks, as ordered, and there load in ten working days, as customary, a full and complete cargo of steam coals." On 16th April the master intimated to the charterers that the ship, then lying at a loading berth, was ready to receive her cargo. The charterers had, however, entered her in the dockmaster's books for a crane berth, for which the vessel had to wait her turn till 3d May.

In an action for demurrage, held that under the charter-party the charterers had the choice of a loading berth, but that the lay-days commenced to run from 17th April, when the loading might have been commenced.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Craighill. M.

ON 22d March 1875 the vessel "Presidente Washington" of Genoa, being then on a passage from Berdianske to Leith, the owner, Francesco Dall' Orso, by his agents, Stevenson, Ressich, and Company, shipbrokers, Leith, entered into a contract of affreightment with the defenders, Messrs Mason and Company, Leith, for the carriage of a cargo of steam coal from Leith to Montreal.

The charter-party, inter alia, stipulated "that the said ship . . . shall, with all convenient speed, sail and proceed to a loading berth in Leith docks, as ordered, and there load in ten working days, as customary, a full and complete cargo of steam coals, not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry; and being so loaded, shall therewith proceed to Montreal, or . . . ; demurrage over and above the said lying days at 4d. per register ton per day."

The "Presidente Washington" arrived in Leith on 30th March 1875, and proceeded to discharge her cargo at a quay berth in the Albert Dock, Leith. On 7th April the master informed the charterers that he would require 50 or 60 tons of the cargo to be put on board as "stiffening," or ballast, to prevent the ship heeling over. This was done on 12th, 13th, and 14th April, and on 16th April the master gave notice to the charterers that the ship had discharged her inward cargo, and was ready to ship her cargo of coal under the charter-party of 22d March.

The vessel had been on 13th April entered by the charterers at the shore-dues office at Leith for "a crane berth," but as there were several vessels on the books before her, her turn to get under a crane did not come round till 3d May. In the meantime she lay from 16th to 28th April at the quay berth where she had discharged, but at the end of that time, as she was not loading cargo, she was ordered out to the buoys in the centre of the dock by the dockmaster. After getting under a crane on 3d May her loading was completed on 12th May.

Between 16th April and the date of the loading being completed the charterers received several complaints in writing from the agents and master of the vessel as to their delay in finding her a berth, and putting the cargo on board. On 23d April the captain suggested that as the turn for getting a crane berth seemed long of coming round, loading should be commenced by hand, but his suggestion was not attended to, and on 27th April he intimated that demurrage would be claimed if the ship was detained after the expiry of the ten lay-days.

The owner, F. Dall' Orso, raised this action against the charterers to recover £102, 18s. 4d. as demurrage under the charter-party for thirteen days, contending that the ten working days stipulated in the charter-party for loading the vessel commenced on 17th and expired on 29th April, and that the ship was on demurrage from 30th April to 12th May inclusive.

The defenders stated (Art. 1),—"According to the custom of the port of Leith cargoes of coal are loaded at the steam crane, where alone proper provision for such loading exists, and according to the custom of the said port the lay-days of a vessel chartered to carry coals as the 'Presidente Washington' was, do not begin to run until the vessel comes under the said crane to be loaded." (Art. 2) "The defenders, of this date (April 13, 1875), duly entered the said vessel in the harbour books, in order that she might obtain from the harbour authorities her turn for loading under the crane, but owing to the number of vessels which had already been entered for their turn the said vessel did not get under the crane until 3d May, and the lay-days under the charter-party then only began to run."

They pleaded;—(2) The vessel having been loaded within the number of days stipulated by the charter-party, as customary in the port of Leith, no damage or demurrage became due.

It was established by the evidence that the practice of loading vessels with coal by steam crane at Leith had only been introduced of recent years; that the number of crane berths was limited, and that there were plenty of other berths where the practice of loading by hand was still carried on; that it was the duty of the merchant or charterer to find a berth for the vessel chartered, and of the master to go to the berth selected, always subject to the orders of the dockmaster; that when a charterer selected a crane berth the vessel had to be entered in the dockmaster's books, and was only admitted to a crane berth in her turn; that it was both more expeditious and cheaper to load by crane than by hand; but that if a vessel was to be long delayed in getting to a crane berth it was always a question for the charterer whether he would load by hand or run the risk of demurrage.

The Lord Ordinary, on 12th July 1875, pronounced this interlocutor:—"In the first place, finds as matter of law that, according to the sound construction of the charter-party sued on, No. 6 of process, by which it was contracted that the vessel called the 'Presidente Washington' should, 'with all convenient speed, sail and proceed to a loading berth in Leith docks, as ordered, and there load, in ten working days, as customary, a full and complete cargo of steam coals,' the lay-days did not begin to run till the ship had reached the loading berth chosen, and to which she was ordered by the defenders, the charterers: In the second place, finds as matters of fact—(1) that the said vessel was ready to take in the stipulated cargo on 16th April last, and of this intimation was given by the master to the defenders; (2) that there are crane berths, and also other berths at which vessels are loaded by hand, at Leith docks; but though coal is frequently loaded, and gas-coal is almost always loaded, at these other berths, by much the greater part of the coals shipped at Leith are loaded at crane berths; (3) that though the 'Presidente Washington' was, as aforesaid, ready to take in cargo on 16th April, and though on 13th April, in anticipation of this, the defenders entered the vessel's name in the harbour books, that she might obtain from the harbour authorities a turn for loading under the crane, she, in consequence of the number of vessels which had previously been entered for their turn, did not get under the crane till 3d May; and (4) that upon that day a part of her cargo was taken in, and notwithstanding interruptions in the course of loading, her loading was completed on 12th May, which was within ten days from the day on which she entered her loading berth: Therefore sustains the defences, assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "NOTE.—The meaning of that clause of the charter-party quoted in the foregoing interlocutor is really the only thing which is in controversy. If the pursuers' reading is to be taken, the defenders do not dispute that the demurrage claimed is due; and, on the other hand, should that of the defenders be adopted, the pursuers admit that the claim must be disallowed.

"The pursuer's reading is this. He says that, once notice was given that the ship was ready for cargo, the defenders were bound to find the berth at which she was to be loaded; and if from any cause—even a cause resulting from harbour arrangements, over which the defenders had no control—the berth 'as ordered' could not be obtained at the time, they must be answerable for the consequences. The defenders, on the other hand, say that they had the selection of the berth, and that, till the ship entered that for which she was ordered, the time for loading had not arrived.

"The Lord Ordinary's first impressions of the case were in favour of the pursuer's view of the contract, but he has seen cause not to adopt the opinion which originally he was disposed to entertain. What was done and said in Tapscott v. Balfour, decided 23d November 1872, and reported in Law Reports, 8 Common Pleas, p. 46, are the things to which this result is mainly to be ascribed. There the charterers had a choice of docks, as here the defenders

Argued for him;—The Lord Ordinary's first view, as expressed in his note, was correct. The case of Tapscott v. Balfour,[1] upon which alone he founded his ultimate decision, was not against but in favour of the pursuer. Bovill, C. J., there laid it down,—"When a port is named in the charter-party as the port to which the vessel is to proceed, the lay-days do not commence upon the arrival of the vessel in the port, but upon her arrival at the usual place of loading in the port, not the actual berth at which she loads, but the dock or roadstead where loading usually takes place. If, when she arrives there, the place is so crowded that she cannot load, the loss must fall on the charterer; the shipowner has done all he was required to do when he has taken his vessel to the usual place of loading in the port." Accordingly, it was decided that the lay-days began as soon as the ship was in the dock, though she could not get to the particular berth selected for her by the charterer. That was exactly the view contended for by the pursuer in the present case.[2]

Argued for the defenders;—In Tapscott v. Balfour the words "as ordered," when applied to dock at a port where there were several docks, had been interpreted to mean that the charterers had the choice of docks, and that until the vessel entered the dock to which they ordered her the lay-days did not commence. All they asked was that the same meaning be given to the words "as ordered" when applied to loading berth. The words were not usual in a charter-party, and their occurrence in the present took the case out of the general rule. To sustain the pursuer's contention would be altogether to refuse effect to these words "as ordered," which were the ruling words in the clause.

had of loading berths; one was chosen in due time, but into that chosen the chartered vessel could not enter till after an interval, 'because the coal agents employed by the defendants to supply the cargo had three vessels already in the dock, and two others in turn to go in.' In an action for demurrage on the charter-party, the Court held that the lay-days did not commence at the time when the ship was ready to enter the dock, but at the time when she got into the dock. If the words 'loading berth' be substituted for the word 'dock,' that case and the present, so far as the language of the charter-party is concerned, will be identical; and the actual variance, the Lord Ordinary thinks, is not a difference necessitating or warranting a different decision as to the meaning of the clause which is now the subject of controversy. Were it otherwise there would, so far as the Lord Ordinary can see, be a denial of the stipulated option, because, though a particular berth might be that desired, and be in consequence the one at which the vessel was ordered to load, that, possibly or probably, could not be selected unless under the penalty of incurring demurrage, not being open on the day on which it was expected she would be ready for cargo. Hardship has, as usual, been suggested on both sides, but the true view is that there is hardship on neither. The matter is simply one of contract; and, if the consequences of what has happened are in future not to fall on the ship, this must be prevented by a change in the provisions of the charter-party.

"The pursuer has here led evidence of an alleged usage at the port of Leith, but the Lord Ordinary thinks, in the first place, that the proof upon this point is not very strong, and, in the second place, that, even if it were much stronger, it could not control the words of the contract. These words are not ambiguous, and their plain ordinary meaning, whatever others may think, is that to which effect must be given by the Court."

At advising,— No. 71.

Feb. 4, 1876. Dall' Orso v. Mason & Co.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—This is an action brought by the owner of a vessel called the "Presidente Washington," of Genoa, which arrived in Leith on the 30th March 1875, and was ready on 16th April following to load an outward bound cargo, to recover demurrage from the charterers in respect they detained the vessel for thirteen days beyond the lay-days allowed by the charter-party. Intimation was duly given by letter on the 16th April by the shipmaster to the charterers that the vessel was lying ready to receive her cargo under the charter-party.

The charter-party, which was entered into on 22d March 1875, bore that the vessel should proceed "to a loading berth in Leith docks, as ordered, and there load in ten working days, as customary, a full and complete cargo of steam coals." Now, it is obvious that the words "as ordered," on which the case really turns, mean that the vessel, when arrived at Leith, and ready to go to a loading berth, is to be under the orders of the charterers—is to go to whatever loading berth in Leith docks the charterers direct. There she is to be loaded, and that in ten working days, after which demurrage is to be paid at a specified rate per diem. Demurrage is just the substitute for the freight which the vessel would or might have earned had she not been detained by the charterers. It is what the charterers must pay the owner for the time the vessel is kept by their conduct without earning anything else.

The defence of the charterers to this action for demurrage is that the lay-days did not begin to run when the master intimated to them that the ship was in Leith docks ready to take in her cargo, but only at a later date, viz., 3d May, when for the first time she could be brought to a berth where she could be loaded under a crane. The question, therefore, which we have to decide is whether the lay-days commenced to run when she was in the dock and reported as ready for her cargo, or whether they did not commence until she was brought under the crane.

There is no evidence of any practice of loading at Leith docks otherwise than by the hand or by cranes. There is no evidence of any practice of loading by lighters, though that may be occasionally done. But not only is loading by hand an old and well known method in constant use, but loading by crane is of comparatively recent introduction, and very far from universal. That being the case, the defenders say they were entitled to keep the vessel waiting without their paying demurrage until they, preferring to load by crane, arranged to get her alongside a crane berth. The Lord Ordinary's first impression was that that plea was not a good one, and that the pursuer was entitled to demurrage as sued for. But his Lordship came to be ultimately of opinion that, looking to the English decision in the case of Tapscott v. Balfour (L. R. 8 C. P. 46), his first impressions were erroneous, and he therefore decided in favour of the defenders.

I have come to be opinion that the first impressions of the Lord Ordinary were right. I think the case of Tapscott, though instructive, does not decide the point before us, and is not either in its terms or its spirit an authority for the defenders in the present case. When the master, on 16th April, intimated to the charterers that his vessel was lying in Leith docks ready to take in her cargo, it was the duty of the charterers to have lost no time in finding the vessel a berth where she could be rightly loaded. If she was detained without being loaded they must explain the cause of the delay, and unless the explanation relieves them they must pay demurrage. A reasonable explanation may possibly be given, but if no reasonable explanation is given they cannot be allowed to lay upon the owners the loss incurred by their delay. I do not think that any contrary proposition is to be found in the case of Tapscott. But were the defenders' contention to be sustained, I see no reason why they should not have kept the vessel for months instead of days without rendering themselves liable in demurrage. Such a result is manifestly unjust, and contrary to well recognised principles of mercantile law. The rule of honourable dealing between man and man is what chiefly makes the law in regard to mercantile transactions, and it must have its due effect in this case.

The Lord Ordinary thus describes the position taken by the parties to the case:—"The pursuer says that, once notice was given that the ship was ready for cargo, the defenders were bound to find the berth at which she was to be loaded; and if from any cause—even a cause resulting from harbour arrangements, over which the defenders had no control—the berth 'as ordered' could not be obtained at the time, they must be answerable for the consequences. The defenders, on the other hand, say that they had the selection of the berth, and that, till the ship entered that for which she was ordered, the time for loading had not arrived." That is, in plain terms, that the defenders had it in their power to detain the ship so long as they could not or would not find a berth to suit them. The Lord Ordinary's first impressions were in favour of the pursuer's view of the contract, and I am not suprised, for it seems to me to be in accordance with justice and common sense. I do not intend to go minutely into the case of Tapscott, which so materially influenced the Lord Ordinary's views; but I have read it carefully, and have come to the conclusion that it does not touch the proper question raised here.

Two extreme pleas were advocated in that case. The first was maintained by the owners to the effect that the lay-days commenced whenever the vessel was ready to enter the dock. That view was negatived by the Court, and it seems to me justly and rightly. The second was maintained by the charterers to the effect that the lay-days did not commence until the vessel was brought under the "spout" or "tip," a position similar to "under the crane" in the present case. This the Court held also to be untenable. Having thus negatived both extreme views, the Court fixed the lay-days to have begun when the vessel was not merely ready to enter, but was actually in the dock. In the present case the vessel was not outside the dock, and the owner is not claiming the lay-days to have begun when she was in the roads, and merely ready to be taken into the dock according to one of the extreme views advocated, but repelled in the case of Tapscott. That could not have been sustained. So, neither can the other extreme view, that the lay-days did not begin until she was, not only in the dock, but under the crane. The intermediate view, and I think the view taken in the case of Tapscott, when rightly understood, is the sound one, that the lay-days should be held to have begun from the day she was in the dock, and when notice was given that she was ready to take in her cargo; and demurrage must be awarded accordingly.

We have some attempt in the proof at leading evidence as to the practice at Leith in regard to loading and in regard to counting the running of lay-days. It is not satisfactory proof of practice, and I doubt whether any such practice, if proved, could, under the circumstances, have been held to rule this question. But I do find some of the witnesses saying,—"If I could not get a vessel to a crane berth in reasonable time it would be a question with me whether I should pay demurrage or load by hand, and the answer would depend upon how long I might expect to be kept waiting for a crane berth, as it is easy to calculate how much more loading by hand will cost than loading by crane." Now, that is reasonable; and if that reasonable view be adopted, then cadit quæstio. The charterers had from the date of the notice that the ship was in the dock this option of loading by hand or waiting to get her to the crane, thus occasioning delay and inferring liability to pay demurrage. They have chosen the latter alternative, and must therefore accept the consequences. I think that is a just and sound decision of this case, and I am sure that it is in accordance with the broad principles of equity which must always rule in questions between merchants. I am, therefore, for altering the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD MURE.—I concur with the Lord Ordinary in his first impression of this case. The terms of the charter-party are that the ship shall "proceed to a loading berth in Leith dock, as ordered, and there load in ten working days, as customary," &c. Taking these terms by themselves, it is, I think, plain that the charterers are to have the selection of the loading berth; but they must, I conceive, exercise that power of selection with due and reasonable consideration for the situation of the ship and the interests of the shipowners. The charterers' "order" must, in short, be one which the master may fairly and reasonably be expected to act upon and acquiesce in.

In defence against this action the charterers state that it is the custom at the port of Leith to load coal at a crane berth, and that according to this custom the lay-days do not begin to run until the vessel comes under the crane to be loaded. And the second and only specific plea in law maintained by the defenders in the record is rested expressly on this alleged custom. But I am of opinion that the defenders have failed to instruct any such custom, and that we must be guided in disposing of the case—and this was at the debate conceded by the defenders—by the terms of the charter-party alone.

The charter-party was signed on the 22d of March, and the vessel arrived at Leith early in the first week of April. Her arrival appears to have been known to the defenders, and they were also aware that she would be ready to take in her cargo by the middle of the month; for they had put in a considerable quantity of stiffening coal on the 12th or 13th of April at the berth where she was being discharged. On the 16th of April it was duly notified to them by the master in writing that he was ready to load; and as no attention was paid to this, he, on the 23d and 27th, writes complaining of the delay, when it turns out that the vessel had been entered for a crane berth to which access could not be had till the 3d of May.

Now, it is clear upon the evidence that although the vessel could not be got under a crane till that date she might have been loaded at the berth where the stiffening coal had been put in. And the question, accordingly, in these circumstances, comes to be—Was it reasonable that the vessel should be delayed for more than a fortnight because ordered to a crane berth? I am of opinion that it was not. She was lying at the time at a berth at which she could have been quite well loaded by hand within the lay-days. It was, therefore, for the charterers to choose, as deponed to by several of the witnesses, whether they would load by hand, or run the risk of incurring demurrage by waiting for a crane berth. They did not take the option of loading by hand, and must therefore, I think, be held liable in demurrage.

With reference to the case of Tapscott (L. R. 8 C. P., p. 46), relied on by the defenders, I have only to say that I should certainly be very averse, more especially in a question of this description, to come to any conclusion different from that arrived at in England. But I do not think that, in giving effect to the pursuer's claim, we are in any respect trenching upon that decision. That case was disposed of on a motion to enter up a verdict, where various questions of fact had been submitted to a jury, but where the plaintiff had omitted to raise any question before the jury as to the unreasonableness of the conduct of the defenders or their agent. In these circumstances, when it was pleaded on the part of the shipowners that they ought not to suffer from the unreasonable delay of the defenders' agent on the matter of loading, Chief-Justice Brett said, "If it were intended to rely on anything unreasonable and improper in the selection of the agent the counsel should have insisted on that question being left to the jury; but no such question having been submitted to them, and it being the usual course to employ an agent, we must now assume that there was nothing unreasonable or improper in the selection that was made." Here, however, we are dealing with the whole evidence in the case, and acting both as judge and jury, and are, therefore, entitled to say what was reasonable or not.

Lord Deas.—It is not disputed in point of fact that this vessel lay in Leith docks on the 16th April 1875 ready to receive a cargo, and that the charterers were made aware on that day that such was the case. Neither is it disputed in point of law that it was the duty of the charterers, on being made aware of that fact, to find her a berth. But it is contended, on the part of the charterers, that they had the choice of berths, and were therefore not bound to put the cargo on board until they had not merely selected a berth, but had obtained possession of that berth, and that if anything occurred to prevent them getting possession of the berth they had selected they were not to be liable for demurrage during the time they were kept out of it. No limitation is put on that contention of the charterers, and there is no reason why the principle, if admitted, should not apply to a very much longer delay than actually occurred here.

The Lord Ordinary has rightly said that no considerations of hardship on one side or the other can enter into this question. The true question is, what was the contract? But before we can give the charterers the benefit of their contention we must see that the contract was what they say it was. Now, the charter-party bears that the ship shall "proceed to a loading berth in Leith docks as ordered, and there load in ten working days, as customary." The argument of the charterers is founded mainly, if not entirely, on the words "as ordered." They say these words entitled them to order the ship to any berth they thought proper, and that until the ship got possession of that berth the lay-days did not begin to run.

That certainly does not appear to be a very reasonable construction of the charter-party, but if it is a sound one we cannot help its leading to consequences which may appear unreasonable. The Lord Ordinary would have construed the charter-party unfavourably for the charterers had it not been for the case of Tapscott v. Balfour (L. R. 8 C. P. 46), but he was of opinion that that case was decisive of the point, and led to an opposite conclusion. In that case, he says in his note, the charterers had a choice of "docks," as here they had of "loading berths," and "the Court held that the lay-days did not commence at the time when the ship was ready to enter the dock, but at the time when she got into the dock. If the words 'loading berth' be substituted for the word 'dock,' that case and the present, so far as the language of the charter-party is concerned, will be identical." And he goes on to add that he does not think there is any difference necessitating or warranting a different decision as to the meaning of the clause.

Now, the whole force of what the Lord Ordinary has thus said depends upon that word "if,"—if the words "loading berth" be substituted for the word "dock." But can the words "loading berth" be substituted for the word "dock"? Is it the same thing to hold when a choice of docks is given that the lay-days do not begin to run until the vessel is in the dock as to hold that where the choice of loading berths is given the lay-days do not commence until the particular berth which the charterer fixes upon becomes vacant? I humbly think not. I think the view that they are the same thing proceeds on an entire fallacy, which lies at the root of the Lord Ordinary's judgment. In truth, the decision in Tapscott v. Balfour has nothing to do with the present case. It was there held that the lay-days did not commence at the time when the ship was ready to enter the dock, but at the time when she got into the dock. But that is quite different from holding that after she got into the dock the lay-days were not to begin until she got under the crane in a particular berth. It appears that at Leith docks there are plenty of berths for loading by hand, to one of which the vessel might easily have got, and been loaded within the lay-days. Loading by crane is a method of recent introduction. No such practice of loading by crane has yet grown up as can affect the case; and if the defenders chose to wait till a crane berth was vacant they must just take the consequences and pay demurrage.

The LORD PRESIDENT was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the said interlocutor (of 12th July 1875): Find that the ten working days stipulated by the charter-party for loading the vessel in dispute commenced on Saturday, the 17th day of April 1875, and expired on the 29th of that month and year: Find that the vessel was not loaded between these dates, and that demurrage became due from and after the last of these dates: Find it admitted at the bar that the demurrage (if due at all) amounts to the sum libelled, with interest: Therefore decern against the defenders in terms of the conclusion of the libel: Find the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.

Process—Poors-Roll—A wife and her husband, pursuers of an action of reduction of a deed on the ground of inadequate consideration, circumvention, and forgery, applied for admission to the benefit of the poors-roll. It appeared that they had one child living in family with them who earned 6s. a-week, while the husband's wages were £1 a-week. Held, in consideration of the nature of the allegations in the summons, and after a report of probabilis causa, that they were entitled to be admitted.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Young.
I.

MRS M'GILL, with consent of her husband, raised an action against Bell's trustees for reduction of a disposition by Mrs M'Gill and others of certain house property to which Mrs M'Gill had had a right of eventual fee. The grounds of reduction alleged were inadequate consideration, that the transaction had been carried through when the pursuer was in a state of mental weakness and in ignorance of her true rights, and also that the signature bearing to be that of the pursuer appended to the deed was a forged signature.

While the action was pending in the Lord Ordinary's procedure-roll the pursuers applied to the Second Division to be admitted to the benefit of the poors-roll, and a remit was made to the minister and kirk-session of their parish, who reported that Mrs M'Gill was fifty-two years of age and her husband fifty, that they had no property, and were entirely dependent on the wages earned by M'Gill, who was a working engineer, making on an average £1 per week. The report also added that they had two daughters, one of whom, however, was married and independent of them, while the other, who was thirteen years old, lived in family with them, but earned 6s. a-week as a mill-worker. The pursuers, upon this report, moved their Lordships to remit the cause to the reporters on probabilis causa litigandi, but the defenders opposed the motion, on the ground that the circumstances of the pursuers were not such as to entitle them to sue in forma pauperis.

This interlocutor was pronounced:—"Before answer to the objection stated at the bar, remit to the lawyers and agents for the poor to inquire into the circumstances and to report whether the applicant has a probabilis causa litigandi, and is otherwise entitled to the benefit of the poors-roll."

The reporters reported as follows:—"Having, in virtue of the preceding remit, considered the application and heard counsel, and also met with the applicant and her husband, beg humbly to report that, in our opinion, the applicant has a probabilis causa litigandi, and is entitled to the benefit of the poors-roll."

The pursuers accordingly renewed their motion, but the defenders opposed it, and argued;—The pursuers were in receipt of a larger income than had been possessed by any one who had been admitted to the benefit of the poors-roll hitherto.[1]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—No doubt there have been conflicting decisions on this point, but these cases are always questions of circumstances, and for the consideration and discretion of the Court.

We have here a distinct allegation that this deed was forged, and that the value of the property in question is £2000. We sent the case to the reporters on probabilis causa, and they have reported that the pursuer has a probabilis causa. Without laying down any general rule, and expressly upon the ground of the gravity of the averments, I am for admitting this pursuer to the benefit of the poors-roll.

LORD NEAVES.—I am of the same opinion. The result of not admitting the pursuer to the poors-roll would apparently be that there would be no inquiry into this matter at all. The pursuer must of course be held to have a probabilis

LORD ORMIDALE.—I am unable, having regard to the precedents, to hold that every individual who has an income of 25s. a-week is entitled to the benefit of the poors-roll. But, in the special circumstances of this case, I do not dissent from your Lordships. A serious charge of forgery will, I understand, fall to be investigated, and yet, having this in view, the reporters have found that the pursuer has a probabilis causa. That gives a character to the present case which distinguishes it from those which usually occur.

LORD GIFFORD.—I agree upon the special ground of the nature of the litigation. I think that this is an element which may often be very material, and which must be kept in view, as well as the amount of wages or income which the applicant enjoys.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect of the foregoing report, find the applicant, in the special circumstances of this case, entitled to the benefit of the poors-roll, and remit to Messrs George Watson, advocate, J. H. Gillespie, writer to the signet, and Thomas Lawson, S.S.C., to conduct and carry on the cause."

Road—Possessory Judgment—Interdict—Sheriff.—In 1815 district road trustees shut up a public road, and the proprietor of the solum enclosed, planted, and cultivated it, but the public continued to use it as a public footpath by forcing through the fences and walking on the cultivated ground. In cross petitions in the Sheriff Court for interdict at the instance respectively of the proprietor and some members of the public, the latter of whom challenged the legality of the proceedings of the trustees in shutting up the road, held that, although the public had proved possession of the footpath for seven years prior to the date of the petitions, that possession was not sufficient to entitle them to a possessory judgment, in respect that the proceedings of the road trustees, as shewn by their minutes, were prima facie evidence that the possession of the public was unlawful (diss. Lord Gifford, on the ground that the legality of the possession by the public did not fall to be considered in determining the possessory question).

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Aberdeenshire. I.

ON 22d June 1872 Mr Gordon of Newton, in Aberdeenshire, presented petitions in the Sheriff Court of that county praying to have John M'Kerron, mason, residing in Insch, in the county of Aberdeen, and Robert Slorach and William Fraser, labourers, in the same neighbourhood, interdicted from trespassing on his lands of Ledikin and Bridge of Shevock. He averred that prior to 1815 a road leading from Insch to Old Rayne had passed through his lands, but that in 1813 a new turnpike road had been constructed by the district road trustees which afforded means of communication between these places, superseding the old road, and that by a resolution dated 29th May 1815 the trustees, in virtue of the powers conferred on them by 39 and 40 Geo. III. cap. 32,* the Act of Parliament at that time in force with respect to the roads in the county of Aberdeen, had shut up and suppressed the old road. It was further averred that in consequence of the old road being thus shut up and suppressed Mr Gordon's predecessor had proceeded to break up the solum of the road, and had planted and ploughed it and erected fences across it. Placards setting forth that there was no road that way and that trespassers would be prosecuted were also erected, and were still kept up, and the foresters and servants of the proprietor challenged all persons found on the line of the old road.

M'Kerron and the other respondents lodged defences to these petitions, and also presented a petition for interdict against Mr Gordon and his tenants, praying to have them interdicted from obstructing the old road, and to have them ordained to remove the obstacles already in existence. They averred in their answers that the road had been a public road betwixt the burghs of Old Rayne and Insch from time immemorial, that it had been narrowed to a footpath where it passed over Mr Gordon's estate, and that it had been used by the public for the whole of that period, and specially so during the seven years preceding the erection of the obstructions complained of. The obstacles principally objected to were certain fences across the line of the old road, which they averred were erected in May and June 1872 by Mr Gordon or his tenants.

The respondents also denied that the procedure by which the trustees were said to have suppressed and shut up the old road was regular, stating that there had been no advertisement as required by the statute, and that the minute of the trustees was informal and vitiated by the interpolation of the words relating to this road without due authentication.*

Mr Gordon pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The said old Insch road, and branches thereof, that formerly existed upon the petitioner's said lands of Ledingham or Ledikin, having been formally and legally shut up as above set forth, and the petitioner and his predecessors and authors having ever since exclusively possessed the ground on which the said

Sec. 77.—"Provided always that the proceedings of the trustees in the district meetings shall be subject to the direction and control of the general meeting, to whom any person or persons who think themselves aggrieved by said proceedings may appeal, and whose sentence shall be final. . . . ."

* The minutes relating to the road were as follows:—"Pitcaple Inn, 29th May 1815.—At the request of Mr Gordon of Newton a committee, to consist of Messrs Horn Elphinstone of Logie, &c., and Leslie of Warthill, with the heritors of the parish, was appointed for the purpose of inspecting certain roads and alterations thereof to be pointed by him—Mr Gordon, convener: And for shutting up the old road from Insch to Old Rain passing through his and Rothnay's lands, now useless—the same was ordered.

"April 1, 1816.—No reports. . . . . The clerk reported that the usual notice had been given at the parishes of Culsalmond and Insch for shutting the roads which formerly led from Insch to Old Rain, passing through the lands of Newton and Rothnay, as ordered by the district, upon the application of the proprietors."

road and others existed as their absolute property under their titles thereto, he is entitled to exclude all others from in any way interfering with or entering and trespassing upon the same. (4) In any view, the ground on which the respondents trespassed as above mentioned having been in the exclusive possession of the petitioner for upwards of seven years in virtue of his written titles he is entitled to a possessory judgment."

The respondents pleaded, inter alia;—(1) That the road used by them on the occasions complained of being a public road by immemorial usage, they were and are entitled, as members of the public, to use it in the way they did, without molestation by the petitioner and others foresaid, or any other person. (2) That the respondents, as members of the public, in respect of the use and possession by the public of the said road for at least seven years as a public road previous to the molestation by the petitioner and others foresaid, are entitled to the benefit of a possessory judgment. (3) That the alleged proceedings of the road trustees, even if competently proved, did not of themselves shut up the road in terms of the statute so as to make it a shut up road from the date thereof. (4) The alleged minute of 29th May 1815 is inadmissible as evidence that the road has been shut up, being vitiated in substantialibus by interpolation and want of due authentication. (5) The alleged minute, even if admissible, does not prove that the road was shut up in terms of the Aberdeenshire Road Acts, section 71, then in force. (9) The road trustees never gave legal sanction to the shutting up of said road, and the same was never legally shut up or closed to the public. (12) Separatim, Even assuming that the old road from Insch to Old Rayne, as it passes through the petitioner's (Mr Gordon's) lands and Rothney's lands, was shut up in 1815 as alleged, the public have since acquired a public road or right of way there, to the extent of a right of footpath over it, by constant use for forty years or upwards, and such use was had of it by the public for the seven years immediately preceding the placing of the obstructions across it by the petitioners, as mentioned in these proceedings.

The Sheriff-substitute (Dove Wilson) allowed a proof, in the course of which the respondents established that there had been a certain amount of use of the road by the public, but that that use had been always challenged and objected to, but ineffectually, by the proprietor and his tenants. The minutes given above (footnote) were excerpted from the minute-book of the road trustees, and the portion of the minute objected to was proved to have been in the handwriting of the clerk of the road trustees.

On 21st August 1875 the Sheriff-substitute found the proceedings of the road trustees irregular and defective, and that the road had remained open as a public footpath, and accordingly refused Mr Gordon's petition for interdict, and interdicted him and his tenants from closing or obstructing the road as a public footpath.*

Mr Gordon appealed, and on 26th October 1875 the Sheriff (Guthrie Smith) recalled his Substitute's interlocutor, finding "it proved that in 1815 the road in question was shut up by the road trustees in virtue of the powers contained in the statute 39 and 40 Geo. III. cap. 32, that it was then enclosed within his grounds by the petitioner, and ceased to be used for carts and horses; that although there is evidence of its continued use as a public footpath no such possession has been established on the part of the public subsequent to its suppression as would be sufficient to constitute a public right of way: Therefore in the petition at the instance of Mr Gordon repels the defences, grants interdict in terms of the prayer of the petition: Dismisses the counter-petition: Finds the petitioner, Mr Gordon, entitled to expenses."

* The principal ground of the Sheriff-substitute's finding as to the irregularity of the proceedings of the road trustees was that the committee appointed by the minute produced had never, so far as could be ascertained, and contrary to the usual practice of the trustees, as appeared from their conduct in connection with the shutting up of other roads, made any report, nor had any formal resolution upon such report been come to.

The respondents appealed to the Second Division of the Court of Session, and argued;—(1) In order to obtain a possessory judgment—which was all the Sheriff could give them—it was sufficient to shew that there had been possession for seven years, and this they had proved. The mere fact that attempts had been made to obstruct the footpath would not preclude the vindicators of a public right from getting a possessory judgment.[1] (2) If possession, prior to the seven years, could be referred to to explain the nature of the seven years' possession, that also was in favour of the public.[2] (3) Mr Gordon was not entitled, in this process, to found upon proceedings of doubtful validity which took place sixty years ago. He must establish the regularity of the proceedings of the road trustees in a declarator, not in a summary process.[3] (4) Even supposing reference to these proceedings to be competent in this process, they were irregular, and any irregularity was fatal to their validity.[4] Advertisements must be made,[5] and the fact of statutory notices having been given must be proved.[6] (5) The word "road" had also been held not to include a public footpath, which was all that was claimed here.[7] The case of the Glasgow and Carlisle Road Trustees v. Tennant had no analogy to this one, as there no notices or resolutions were required.[8]

Argued for Mr Gordon;—(1) Possession, such as would entitle the respondents to a possessory judgment, must have the quality of a right about it as distinguished from trespass or mere toleration. Even though the possession might have been peaceable for seven years it was competent to go back further to shew that there was a vice in the possession.[9] After a road had once been properly shut up contentious possession would not create a right in the public, although, if it had not been shut up, contentious possession would be sufficient to preserve the right in the public. All the rights of the public in this road were extinguished by the proceedings in 1815-16, which were quite regular. (2) If the public were aggrieved they had a right of appeal under the statute, which they had not exercised, and could not now avail themselves of.[10]

Lord Ormidale.—The question to be determined in this case is one of some nicety, and not unattended with difficulty. It relates to an alleged public right of footpath through the property of Mr Gordon of Newton, in Aberdeenshire, and has been raised in a summary application for interdict presented by Mr Gordon to the Sheriff of that county against the present appellants, to prevent their trespassing on his property. They have resisted Mr Gordon's application on the ground that in place of trespassing on his property they have merely used, as they were entitled to use, a public footpath which passes through his estate.

In support of their pleas the appellants presented a counter petition at their own instance, praying the Sheriff to interdict Mr Gordon and two other persons, farmers on his estate, from obstructing or interfering with the road in question, and this petition was conjoined with that at the instance of Mr Gordon, and a record was made up and closed in the conjoined process.

The Sheriff-principal, reversing the judgment of his Substitute, decided the case in favour of Mr Gordon, by granting the interdict craved by him and dismissing the counter petition. Against that decision the present appeal has been taken.

The plea chiefly relied on by the appellants was to the effect that in respect of their possession of the disputed road or footpath for seven years preceding Mr Gordon's application for interdict against them in the Sheriff Court, they were entitled to the benefit of a possessory judgment, and that beyond the seven years' possession the Sheriff could not competently inquire, it being left to both or either of the parties, if they desired it, to have any larger question tried and determined by instituting the appropriate action for that purpose in the Supreme Court.

As a general proposition, I am not to dispute that, beyond the possessory question, the right to a public way or road cannot be declared and determined in the Sheriff Court. But, in dealing with the possessory question, I take it to be clear that the Sheriff is entitled and bound to ascertain and consider the character of the possession which the party claiming the benefit of a possessory judgment has had; and that, for this purpose, the inquiry before him is not necessarily to be limited to the seven years preceding the institution of the action in which the question is raised. It may very well be that the party in possession, and who has had it for seven years, is entitled, in the absence of proof to the contrary, to have it presumed in his favour that his possession was lawful; but it does not follow from this that the contrary may not be proved to the effect of preventing a possessory judgment going out. So, accordingly, in the present, as in any other disputed right of way case, it is undoubted, and indeed it was not disputed at the debate, that it would be quite competent for the party resisting a possessory judgment to shew that the possession relied on in support of it had been the result of violence, intimidation, or other illegal acts; in short, that in place of it having been of a character to indicate that it took place in the exercise of a right, it was truly in persistence of a wrong.

In other words, to entitle a party to the benefit of a possessory judgment, his seven years' possession must be lawful, and not wrongful. And this principle can be illustrated and supported by various decided cases, some of them relating to roads, as will be afterwards shewn. But, first, let me briefly advert to the more material of the circumstances in which the question has arisen in the present case.

That the seven years' possession on which the appellants rely is of a very meagre and questionable description, can scarcely, I think, be disputed. The two last of their witnesses—and they may be taken as a specimen of them all—who speak to the road at all, Mr Patrick Cooper and the appellant M'Kerron, sufficiently shew this. The former states that he cannot positively say whether he had been on the road within the last ten years or not, except on one occasion professionally in connection with the present case. And the appellant M'Kerron says,—"I knew the road in dispute well, and walked it first about ten years ago;" and again,—"Till three years ago I had no difficulty in getting along the pathway, but obstructions were put three years ago in the wood." It is unnecessary, however, to pursue this matter further, as I am willing it should be assumed that on the appellants' proof, looked at by itself, they might be held, in the absence of all counter or rebutting evidence, to have made out such a prima facie case of possession as to entitle them to the benefit of a possessory judgment. And in regard to the title, in a technical sense, they required none, it being enough that they are some of the public having a right to use the public roads. In this respect the case is different from that of a servitude road, where no party can have a right to assert the use of it who is not, prima facie at least, in titulo of a dominant tenement. But to say that a party being one of the public, must have a title to insist on vindicating his right to use a public road, is to use language scarcely appropriate,—certainly not appropriate if by title is understood to be one of property in the technical meaning of that expression.

While, therefore, the appellants might have been entitled in virtue of their seven years' possession to the benefit of a possessory judgment, if nothing had been established on the part of the respondent Mr Gordon to shew that the possession was wrongful, a different result must follow if the appellants' possession has been shewn to have been of that character—to have been, in truth and reality, more of the nature of trespass than of right. That the road in dispute was prior to 1815-16 a public road, not only for foot-passengers, but also for horses and carriages, is unquestionable; but that it was about that time shut up by competent authority appears to me to be equally unquestionable on the facts as they are brought out in the proof, and correctly summarised by the Sheriff-principal in the note to his judgment. And in addition to what the learned Sheriff says on the subject of the shutting up of the road I have to refer to the cases of Crawford v. Lennox, 15th July 1852, 14 D. 1029, and the Glasgow and Carlisle Road Trustees v. Tennant and Others, afterwards cited for another purpose, where it was held that the proceedings of road trustees in shutting up a road cannot ex intervallo be objected to as informal and irregular, due notice having been given of them, as was done in the present instance, and no appeal against them taken to the Quarter Sessions, or, as provided for in the present case, to the Sheriff or his Substitute. Even supposing, then, that the proceedings of the road trustees in shutting up the road in question were exposed to the objections as regards their form and regularity urged against them by the appellants, it is clear, on the authority of the two cases referred to, that that would be no good or available objection in the present dispute.

Assuming, then, that the road in question was ordered and authorised by the road trustees to be shut up in 1815-16, and that in point of fact it was about that time shut up, as is, I think, very clearly shewn by the proof, it cannot, I think, be held that the attempts on the part of some persons thereafter to continue the use of it, constantly resisted and objected to as they were, have had the effect either of preserving the road as a public one, as it had previously been, or of constituting ot new a right of way in favour of the public. The resistance and objections on the part of Mr Gordon were of too marked and decided a description to admit of that. Without entering into details it is enough to remark that the ground over which the road had passed previous to its being shut up, was immediately or shortly afterwards in one part planted with trees, and in other parts ploughed up and obliterated, while dykes and fences were also erected, and from time to time renewed and kept up for the purpose of keeping out the public. It cannot therefore, I think, be taken from the appellants that the public had by prescriptive possession subsequent to the road being shut up in 1815-16 by the trustees acquired a new right of way for foot-passengers. They certainly had not that peaceable, lawful, and uninterrupted possession which would be necessary to enable them to do so.

If, indeed, the respondent had been unable to shew that there had been any shutting up of the road at all by competent authority, it might be presumed that the use of it by the public had a legal commencement, and it might in that case have been incumbent on Mr Gordon to have instructed, not merely that he had obstructed, but effectually prevented the use of it. But, as the case stands, it is to be presumed that any use there has been of the road by the public since it was shut up was illegal in its commencement, and, having regard to the respondent's resistance ever since, must be held to have been for the whole period downwards, including the seven years upon which the appellants found as giving them a claim to a possessory judgment, also of an illegal character, and so cannot entitle the appellants to the benefit of a possessory judgment. There is ample authority in support of this view. Thus, in the case of Maxwell v. Ferguson, 24th January 1673, Mor. 10,628, it was found in an action for intrusion, in reference to a claim to the benefit of a possessory judgment, that there can be none where the entry to possession, although long anterior to the seven years, was by intrusion. And in the case of the Countess of Dunfermline v. Lord Pitmedden, 15th December 1698, Mor. 10,630, it was held that to acquire the benefit of a possessory judgment there must have been bona fides in the beginning of the possession.

These cases, it is true, did not relate to a road or right of way, but that cannot affect the principle itself. So, accordingly, I find it has been applied in road cases. Thus, in the Glasgow and Carlisle Road Trustees v. Tennant and Others, 9th February 1854, 16 D. 521, where in an application for interdict at the instance of the trustees against certain parties who persisted in using a road which had been shut up in virtue of statutory powers, and removing obstructions which had been placed on it by the road trustees, the Court held, notwithstanding the respondents' allegation of immemorial possession, that as the road had been shut up by the trustees in the exercise of their statutory powers, the respondents could not found on their illegal acts of subsequent possession to the effect of entitling them to the benefit of a possessory judgment. And so also in Shearer and Others v. Hamilton, 24th January 1871, 9 Macph. 456, it was held that a road having been shut up, or declared to be shut up, by road trustees under their statutory powers, the public were not, by subsequent seven years' use of it, entitled to a possessory judgment. It is true that in the latter case the road belonged to the road trustees, while here it reverted to the private owner of the solum after it had been declared to be shut up, but I cannot see how this can affect the question of possessory judgment. There, as here, it was pleaded by the party claiming the benefit of a possessory judgment that it was enough that as one of the public he had been allowed to use the road uninterruptedly for seven years; but the answer to this, that the road had been declared to be shut up by lawful authority, which rendered any subsequent use of it by the public wrongous and illegal, was held to be good and sufficient.

The important point to be deduced from the cases which have been now referred to is, that it was held in them to be quite competent to look beyond the seven years' possession of the public in order to ascertain the character of the possession, or, in other words, to see whether it was lawful or not; and if competent to do so at all, I do not very well see how anything can depend on the number of years that may have elapsed since the road had been shut up, provided always that the subsequent use of it, from its commencement downwards, had been objected to and resisted. That being so, it cannot be said that the use of the road has been lawful, peaceable, and undisturbed; its character having, on the contrary, been wrongful and contentious from the beginning and throughout.

The case of Calder v. Adam, 2d March 1870, 8 Macph. 645, appealed to in the course of the discussion by both parties, brings out, I think, very well the distinction between cases where there has been seven years' uninterrupted possession without anything to shew that it was wrongful, and cases where the wrongful character of the possession has been shewn or offered to be instructed, in answer to a claim to the benefit of a possessory judgment. Thus, in that case Lord Benholme remarked—"It is true that seven years' possession will not always give a possessory title, for the possession may have been precarious or violent, or there may have been some vice in it. Here there is no such peculiarity, and the evidence is conclusive. There can be no doubt that the possession was possession as of a public road." And Lord Neaves concurred, observing that—"It is not every sort of possession that would be enough; and any possession proved might be rebutted or explained away." So I say that in the present case the possession relied upon by the appellants in support of their claim to a possessory judgment has been explained away and rebutted; or, in other words, has been shewn, and this quite competently, without the necessity of resorting to a process of reduction or declarator, which of course could be instituted only in the Supreme Court, to be of an unlawful character, and not such as to entitle the appellants to the benefit of a possessory judgment.

For these reasons, I am of opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff-principal is right, and ought to be affirmed.

Lord Neaves concurred.

Lord Gifford.—After the fullest and most careful consideration, I am sorry to find myself obliged to differ from the view and result now expressed by your Lordships, and although at one time I felt the case to be attended with a good deal of difficulty, I have ultimately come to be clearly of opinion that the respondents, M'Kerron and Others, are entitled to a possessory judgment, and to the continued use of the road in question, until the rights of parties therein are finally determined in an action of declarator or otherwise. I therefore concur in the result reached by the Sheriff-substitute, although not quite upon the same grounds as those upon which he has proceeded.

The question raised in these three separate processes of interdict is a purely possessory question. The Sheriff could only decide what is to be the interim state of possession of the footpath in question until the question of right be finally settled elsewhere. The Sheriff could not decide the question of permanent right; he could not determine whether there is or is not a right of footpath as claimed by the respondents, but he could only fix whether the footpath is in the interim to be shut up or not,—that is, whether the petitioner is to exclude the respondents from using the path till they make good their right in a declarator.

No. 73.

M'Kerron, &c. v. Gordon.

In like manner this Court in an appeal from the Sheriff has no greater power or no greater jurisdiction than the Sheriff had. We cannot now decide the question of right, however desirable it might be to do so. Even if we had jurisdiction to determine whether or not there is a right of way (which in this process we have not, for we are merely reviewing the Sheriff's judgment) we have not the materials to decide any such question, for the only proof which has been allowed, or which could have been allowed, by the Sheriff, was a proof of possession,—and of the possessory question alone we are in a position to judge.

In my view, therefore, the only question to be determined is, what has been the state of possession of the footpath in question for the last seven years preceding the present actions, or preceding the dispute which led thereto. Whatever that possession was it must be maintained and continued until the question of right be finally determined; for this is the very meaning of a possessory judgment. It means that the status quo shall be maintained ad interim until it be finally settled which party is in the permanent right, and hence the question for the Sheriff always is, not whether there exists right of way, but whether there has been a possession of way for the last seven years or not. If there has been possession—uninterrupted possession—for the last seven years, then that possession must be continued until the proprietor, by means of a declarator, shews that there is no right of way, and by this means stops farther possession.

It is true that in determining as to the proof of possession it is competent for the parties, and competent for the Court, to go farther back than seven years,—indeed to go back as far as is necessary. But the object of so going back is not to ascertain the question of right, but merely to ascertain the character of the possession,—that is, to ascertain whether the possessors claimed to possess as matter of right, or whether they did so by special permission or sufferance. If the possession was claimed and enjoyed as of right,—that is, if the possessors asserted a right and enjoyed it for seven years,—then that possession must be continued whether they had really a right or not. It is enough that the public claimed the right and enjoyed it. The Sheriff cannot ask, and cannot decide, whether they were right or wrong in making the claim. To go back beyond the seven years, in order to ascertain whether there actually existed a permanent right or not, would be to obliterate the distinction between a possessory question and a question of permanent heritable right. It would be to make the question of interim possession incidental to the larger question of permanent right, and it would practically give the Sheriff the right, and impose upon him the duty, of deciding the heritable question of right, in order that he might settle the mere question of interim possession. But this would be just inverting the law, and practically denying a possessory judgment, unless the party could establish at the same time a permanent right.

The only question, therefore, is, What has been the state of possession of the footpath in question for seven years preceding the present dispute? Whatever the state of possession has been, that state must be continued till other measures are taken, and in another Court than that of the Sheriff. All that the Sheriff has to do is to preserve the status quo—to keep matters in their present condition, that is, in the condition in which they have been for seven years, until the matter of right be finally ascertained.

I at first felt, with some of your Lordships, that the proof of possession for the last seven years was somewhat narrow; but on a more careful perusal of the proof, I am satisfied that it is quite sufficient to entitle the appellants to a possessory judgment. Indeed upon this point both the Sheriffs are at one. The Sheriff-substitute expressly finds, and I think he is borne out by the evidence, that the road has remained open and been used as a public footpath, and the Sheriff-principal, while admitting the possession, rests his judgment on the ground that it was "only a possession of a supposed road—a road which a public statute has declared" closed by virtue of proceedings taken sixty years ago. But, in my humble opinion, this is just to decide the question of right, and not to limit himself to a question of possession.

Turning to the evidence, I really can have no doubt that actual possession has been fully proved. Even the witnesses for the respondent, Mr Gordon, fully establish the possession. The tenants of the farms tell us that they could not stop the public, though they tried to do so. They were obliged to leave the path unploughed, otherwise the public would have trodden down the crop. It was in vain to put up fences, for the public always tore them down and passed freely through, and so on, the evidence embracing almost every incident which is available in establishing a right of way. John Jessiman, the existing tenant of North Ledikin, whose steading is close to the path in question, and who has been on the farm since 1823, says that "some people have used the road since 1823, and some have not. It has been in daily use all the time." And he explains that though he and his father tried to stop the people, they never were able to do so. This evidence is abundantly confirmed by the appellants' witnesses, and although it may be true that the number of persons using or requiring to use the road was limited, it seems perfectly clear that, at least by a considerable number of persons, it was claimed and enjoyed as a public footpath. Going back beyond the seven years, the evidence of the possession and its character, at least as a claimed public right, becomes all the clearer. Indeed, it appears that for more than forty years the right has been both asserted and enjoyed.

The only contradictory proof is a proof of complaint and protest on the part of the proprietors of the ground. It seems to be true that they always complained and protested that there was no public right of pathway; but so far from this being in favour of Mr Gordon I think it is very strong evidence against him, for it proves beyond the possibility of dispute the character of the possession—that the possession by the public was possession not by permission, but as a right; that is, the public claimed the right, and took it as their right—took it in spite of the proprietor's complaints and in defiance of his objections, and this is just the kind of possession which makes a public right, and that of the strongest kind. It is a mistake to say that the possession was interrupted. It was not interrupted; it was never stopped; it was merely challenged, and a challenge which is defied and disregarded is so far from being an interruption, that it is the best proof of uninterrupted possession as of right. The proprietor, when he found that his objections were unheeded, and his fences broken, and his fields trampled, should have resorted to interdict forty, or fifty, or sixty years ago. Having never done so till now, he cannot complain that in a mere possessory question the possession which the public have hitherto and for so long a period vindicated, or at least actually enjoyed, shall be continued till the matter of right be decided against them.

This is the ground upon which I am of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute's judgment is right, and that the possession of the public, such as it is proved to have been in time past, should be continued until the right to invert it shall be competently established. But one or two questions have been raised and very ably discussed in argument on which I should like to say a single word.

It was keenly and ably maintained that the road was duly and formally shut up in 1815, in virtue of the Act 39 and 40 Geo. III. cap. 32, being the Road Act applicable to the district. Now, I am not satisfied that this was so, or at least that the actual shutting up—I mean the shutting up via facti—ever went farther than its shutting up as a road for carriages or carts, and as to this the present appellants raise no question. So far as tolls were concerned, the road trustees had no interest except to secure the carriage traffic upon the new road, and if the proprietor did not take steps effectually to prevent foot-passengers using it, by resorting to interdict if necessary to prevent trespass and breaking of fences, he has himself to blame. But then, as already explained, I think the question as to the shutting up in 1815, and its legal effect, is not a question for the Sheriff or for this Court in actions to regulate interim possession in 1876.

But still farther, I am very clearly of opinion that even although it were absolutely and completely established that the road was well and effectually shut up in 1815, so as to make the solum of the road the unburdened property of Mr Gordon and his authors, this would not prevent the public from acquiring a right of way over it or over any other portion of his estate by possession claimed as of right and actually enjoyed for any period of forty years subsequent to 1815.

Sixty years have elapsed since 1815, and possession as of right for forty years constitutes a right of way. Such possession is alleged, and if in a proper action such possession is proved it seems to me to be quite in vain to allege a shutting up by road trustees at any time previous to the commencement of such possession. As well might the proprietor go back 100 years or 500 years,—it would be useless to do so if a right has been acquired during the last forty years. The shut-up road cannot be in a better position than any other part of the estate over which there never was a road at all. The statute cannot do more than give the solum to the proprietor unburdened. The proprietor may then do what he likes with it. He might undoubtedly make a grant of public road, and the law declares that forty years' possession as of right is equivalent to a grant. On this ground alone it seems to me unnecessary to inquire whether there was an effectual shutting up or not so far back as 1815.

As to whether there has been possession as of right for forty years or not, of course I give no opinion. That point has not been remitted to probation, and neither in form nor in substance have we any proof on the subject. That question would be the issue in the action of declarator, and it would be for a jury to answer it. But I am free to add, in point of law, that the kind of possession which, if continued for seven years, will warrant a possessory judgment, will, in such cases as the present, if continued for forty years, warrant a judgment affirming the permanent right.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I agree with Lord Ormidale.

This is a possessory question, and depends on whether, if the possession proved for the last seven years had existed for forty years, it would have been sufficient in character and amount to establish the right claimed for the public. I do not agree with Lord Gifford that the only question for inquiry in such a case, where the benefit of a possessory judgment is claimed, is what was the actual state of possession, or that the Sheriff can only maintain the status quo, however violent or clandestine the possession may be. The possession must be of the character I have stated.

The possession proved in this case has been divided and contested during the seven years in question. The appellants have proved, on the part of the public, a certain amount of continuous use of this line of footpath, but a use opposed, resisted, and obstructed by the proprietor. The respondent, on the other hand, has proved possession of the solum of the road as private property by planting, enclosing, and cultivating it, and by acts of direct obstruction, attempted but not successful.

We have not to consider in this case how far such possession, continued for forty years, would have been sufficient to prove the public character of this footpath, without further light in regard to the nature of the mutual possession; for it is certain that in 1815 the road was not only public, but was under the management of the road trustees as a cart-road as well as a foot-road. The question is, whether it was shut up in that year. If it was not, then the respondent could only acquire an immunity from the public right by excluding the public for forty years, and proof by the public of such possession as has been proved in this case, would be amply sufficient to maintain the right. If, on the other hand, it was shut up in that year, then the public could only acquire the right claimed, by the consent, expressed or implied, of the proprietor; and such resistance on his part to the public use of the road, and assertion of his own private right as he has here proved, would be clearly sufficient to exclude any presumption of acquiescence or consent.

Holding, therefore, the question to be whether in the circumstances of this case the possession proved for the possessory period was of such an amount and character as would, if continued for forty years, have established the public right, I am of opinion that this question entirely depends on whether the road was or was not shut up by statutory authority in 1815.

That question we can only consider in its bearing on the possessory right. It is a question on the title, and I regard it only in its prima facie aspect, leaving the absolute right to be tried in any appropriate process. But, prima facie, I think we must hold that the road was shut up. The original resolution of the trustees was no doubt ambiguously expressed and irregularly entered on the minutes. But it was clearly adopted afterwards. We must give faith to the minutes when they bear that the clerk reported that due advertisement had been made; and as no appeal was taken, and the road was in point of fact shut, as far as it reasonably could be so, I think the burden of establishing the reverse in a declarator is thrown on those who maintain the public right, and that the possessory right must remain with the respondent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the parties on the appeal, find, in point of fact, that in and prior to the year 1815 there existed on the line in question a public road for carts and foot-passengers, under the charge of the district road trustees: Find that it appears from the minutes of the trustees that in the year 1815 they resolved to substitute, and did substitute, a new road for that which had previously existed, and that thereupon the trustees resolved that the old road should be shut up, and this, after due advertisement, was done: Find that since that time, and during the last seven years, the respondent has used the solum of the road claimed, by planting, enclosing, and cultivating the same: Find that during the same period of seven years the public have used the line in question as a public road, obtaining access thereto by climbing over the fences, or forcing a passage through them, and by walking over the cultivated ground: Find that the possession so proved by the appellants is not sufficient to entitle them to the benefit of a possessory judgment: Therefore dismiss the appeal, affirm the judgment of the Sheriff appealed against, and decern: Find the respondent entitled to expenses, and remit to the Auditor to tax the same and to report."

Reparation—Probable Cause—Relevancy.—A pursuer will not be allowed an issue of malice and want of probable cause when the Court are satisfied from the pursuer's own statements that the defender had probable cause.

Reparation—Public Prosecutor—Probable Cause.—A Justice of Peace Court convicted a person, who held a public house certificate, of selling spirits without a certificate, in respect of his continuing to sell spirits within the licensed premises eight days after they had been rendered uninhabitable by fire. The conviction was afterwards suspended by the Court of Justiciary on the ground that the Justices had mistaken the law.

In an action of damages raised by the suspender against the procurator-fiscal on the ground that he had presented the complaint maliciously and without probable cause, held that the above facts, as disclosed in the pursuer's statement, shewed that the case was a fair one for trial, and negatived the pursuer's averment of want of probable cause, and that the defender was entitled to absolvitor.

SEE Craig v. Peebles, June 16, 1875, ante, vol. ii., Justiciary Cases, p. 30.

2D DIVISION. Lord Young. I.

This was an action by James Craig, spirit dealer, against John Kidd Peebles, procurator-fiscal at Airdrie, concluding for £500 of damages on account of proceedings taken against the pursuer under the Public-House Acts.

The pursuer set forth in his condescendence that in April 1874 and again in April 1875 he obtained a certificate from the Justices to keep a public-house at West Merryston, in the parish of Old Monkland and county of Lanark, for the sale of spirits, wine, porter, ale, beer, cider, and other exciseable liquors, the first certificate being in force for a year from and after 15th May 1874, and the second for a year from and after 15th May 1875, and that for each year he obtained an excise license.

The condescendence proceeded,—"The house which the pursuer was licensed to keep as a public-house, and in which he was licensed to sell the said spirits, wine, porter, ale, beer, cider, perry, and other exciseable liquors as aforesaid, was in or about the month of May 1875 partially destroyed by fire, during the period for which his certificate granted in April 1874, and license from excise obtained in virtue thereof, were in force." . . . "The pursuer, immediately after the said fire, put the said public-house, so far as then possible, into a habitable condition, and resumed his business therein under and in terms of his said license; and after having made an arrangement with the Excise department for leave to carry on the said business in the said premises until the same should be put in a thorough state of repair, or the said stock in hand disposed of." (Cond. 2) "Notwithstanding the said license and the said steps and proceedings taken by the pursuer, and also notwithstanding the fact that the defender was in the full knowledge of the said license, and the said steps and proceedings taken by the pursuer, the pursuer was on 13th May 1875 served with a complaint at the instance of the defender, charging him with 'an offence within the meaning of the "Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862," section 17th; in so far as on or about the 8th day of May 1875 the said James Craig, defender, did, within the broken walls of an old public-house which was burnt down, situated in West Merryston in the parish of Old Monkland and county of Lanark, unlawfully traffic in whisky or other exciseable liquors, without having obtained a certificate in that behalf in terms of said Act.'" . . . "At the time when this complaint was made the defender well knew that the pursuer was carrying on business in terms of his certificate and license in the said public-house, and that he was legally authorised to do so."

Upon this complaint the pursuer was convicted of the offence libelled, and sentenced to pay a fine of £7, with £2 of expenses, and failing payment to be imprisoned for six weeks.

A suspension having been brought in the Court of Justiciary, the Court on 16th June 1875, suspended the conviction and sentence.[1]

The pursuer alleged;—(Cond. 8) "It was well known to the said defender that the said complaint itself did not charge the pursuer with any offence known to or punishable either by the common law of Scotland or the statutes libelled in the said complaint, and that the pursuer was perfectly innocent of such offence. But notwithstanding, the defender caused him to be tried, convicted, and imprisoned, all as more fully above set forth. The said whole proceedings were undertaken, done, and carried out by the defender from the beginning to the end thereof illegally, wrongously, oppressively, maliciously, without probable cause, and brought by said defender before a Court, which in the circumstances was not empowered or entitled by law to deal with the same, the Justices of the Peace having no power to adjudicate therein by statute or otherwise, the subject-matter whereof fell to be disposed of by the Excise under Act 6 Geo. IV. c. 81, sec. 11, and with the intention and design to injure the pursuer in his moral character, prospects in life, and reputation in his trade."

The pursuer further alleged certain facts tending to instruct malice on the part of the defender both in the course of the proceedings complained of and subsequently.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The whole proceedings complained of being wrongous, malicious, oppressive, without probable cause, and ultra vires of the said Justices of the Peace Court and of their officials, including the defender, and the same having been suspended, the pursuer is entitled to reparation for the wrong done to him. (2) The pursuer not having been charged with, nor guilty of any crime known to the law of Scotland, and the said conviction having been set aside, the defender, as instituting the said proceedings, and illegally, oppressively, wrongously, and maliciously procuring the pursuer's conviction and imprisonment, is liable in damages to the pursuer.

Craig v. Peebles.

The defender founded on the 30th section of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, and tendered £5, and the expenses of the present action down to the date of the tender.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's statements are not relevant or sufficient in law to support the conclusions of the summons. (3) The proceedings complained of not having been taken by the defender maliciously and without probable cause, but, on the contrary, in the bona fide belief that it was his duty to institute and follow forth the said proceedings, and with probable cause, the pursuer cannot in any view recover more than £5 as damages; and, separatim, in respect of the tender of £5 of damages, and the expenses of the action to the date of lodging defences, above made, the defender is entitled to put an end to the action, and to have decree of absolvitor upon payment of the said £5 and expenses.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Sustains the first plea in law for the defender: Assoilzies him from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses," &c.*

* "OPINION.—This case, although the facts are novel, presents a question of general interest and importance.

"The defender prosecuted the pursuer before the Justices, on the Public-Houses Act, 1862, for selling spirits without a license, and obtained a conviction, which was subsequently set aside by the Court of Justiciary. Neither before the Justices nor in the Court of Justiciary was there any dispute about the facts, and the only controversy regarded the legal question, on which the Court of Justiciary, differing from the Justices, set aside the conviction. The accused party (the pursuer) acknowledged the sale within the specified premises as alleged, and relied in defence upon a current certificate, which undoubtedly applied to the premises at one time. The question was whether the premises having been burnt down to such an extent as to be quite uninhabitable (as they were in fact uninhabited), the certificate remained available to warrant the sale of spirits within the roofless walls. The Justices determined this question in the negative, and imposed the penalty. The Court of Justiciary, having another opinion of the law, quashed the conviction, and ordered the penalty (and expenses) to be repaid.

"The pursuer now sues the fiscal for damages, averring malice and want of probable cause in general terms. It is not alleged that the fiscal misrepresented or withheld any fact from the Justices; that he practised any artifice to mislead or prejudice them; or, in short, that he misconducted himself in any way, or presented the case otherwise than fairly to the consideration of the Justices, on the proved and indeed undisputed facts of it. Nothing capable of being characterised as malicious or without probable cause is imputed to the fiscal, except only the fact of instituting and prosecuting the complaint before a Court of competent jurisdiction. But the only objection to the prosecution is on the legal question which I have noticed, and this question was presented to the Justices upon the true and undisputed facts which raised it, and was decided by them to the best of their judgment. According to this judgment the pursuer had no defence on the facts, and was undoubtedly subject to the penalty which the Justices imposed. The prosecutor was competent, the complaint was relevant, the Court had jurisdiction, the procedure was regular, and the facts were fully and fairly presented by unobjectionable evidence. But the facts raised a novel question of law, which it was the province of the Justices to decide. After the judgment of the Court of Justiciary, it must of course be assumed that they decided it erroneously; but having taken part in the judgment of the Court of Justiciary and concurred in it, I must say for myself that I did not and do not regard the judgment of the Justices as of a character to warrant any strong expressions of disapprobation or surprise. I think the Judges all felt that it was a novel and important question, and we certainly heard a full argument before deciding it. The expression 'probable cause' is not a happy one to use with respect to an opinion or judgment on a question of law, but using it here to

The pursuer reclaimed, and tendered a condescendence of res noviter, setting forth various alleged facts indicating malice on the part of the defender, which he stated had come to his knowledge since the record was closed.

Argued for the pursuer;—The rule in cases like the present was that where the fiscal had acted without warrant the pursuer was not obliged to put malice and want of probable cause in issue, but where the fiscal's proceedings were ex facie regular and under cover of law, the pursuer was only entitled to an issue if he undertook to prove malice and want of probable cause. There was no instance of a pursuer being refused an issue altogether, where, as in the present case, he was willing to take an issue with the words "maliciously, and without probable cause." While it was for the Judge to direct the jury as to what facts were necessary to prove signify that the view of the law which the fiscal maintained and the Justices upheld was not irrational, and was such as reasonable men in their position (or indeed in any position) might excusably entertain and act upon, I cannot hesitate to say that there was probable cause for it. It was certainly unusual, if not unprecedented, to sell spirits within the bare and roofless walls of a burnt-down house, and I cannot say it was unreasonable to take the opinion of the Justices on the question, whether the certificate continued available, notwithstanding of the change on the character of the premises for which it had been granted.

"I am therefore of opinion that this record presents no relevant case against the defender. I have already observed that no misconduct or unfairness in the management of the case is imputed to him; and notwithstanding the averment of malice, I must decline to entertain the action, in respect there was probable cause for the prosecution. The question of probable cause regards, and can only regard, the matter of law on which the guilt or innocence of the pursuer turned; and this it is, I think, for the Court to decide.

"I attach no significance to the averment that the defender 'knew' the law when he instituted the prosecution; and could not for a moment entertain the proposal to send it for trial by a jury as a question of fact. The Justices decided the point of law in one way, and the High Court in another; and although the Judges of the High Court were unanimous, no one, I suppose, would have greatly wondered had they differed in opinion. It must come to the question of probable cause, in the sense which I have explained, and which itself is a question of law for the Court. Assuming the law to be as decided by the Justices, there was undoubtedly probable cause for the prosecution, for on that assumption the accused was confessedly guilty. I cannot of course make that assumption except for the argument leading to the result which I have reached and dealt with, viz., that want of probable cause can only be alleged and maintained upon the character of the legal error.

"Had the question of probable cause depended on any disputed matter of fact, it would have been improper to decide it without taking the opinion of a jury on the fact, or without inquiry in some form; but it being clear that it entirely depends on the character of the legal error which was committed, I see no room for inquiry, or good reason for sending the case to trial.

"I regard the case as important because of its bearing on the liability of prosecutors to actions of damages for mistaking the law. Regularity of procedure is exacted of them under pain of damages, but a mistake on a point of law, as to which Judges may not unreasonably differ in opinion, is another matter, and to extend their liability to this extent, would, I think, prejudicially interfere with the administration of justice.

"I have only further to observe that sec. 30 of the Summary Procedure Act is in my opinion inapplicable. It relates only to the amount of damages recoverable in cases where malice and want of probable cause are not, as here, essential to liability. In such cases the clause provides that the damages shall not exceed £5, unless the pursuer shall aver and prove that the proceeding inferring liability was taken or done maliciously and without probable cause."

want of probable cause, it was the province of the jury to determine whether these facts were proved.[1] It was impossible for the Court, without any investigation, to determine that question of fact against the pursuer. [Being asked by the Court where there was any fact stated on record tending to shew want of probable cause, which required to be investigated]—The pursuer undertook to prove that the destruction of his house was only very partial, that the change was not sufficient to give the fiscal probable cause for believing that it operated as a legal disqualification of the house as a licensed house. Even admitting that the existence or non-existence of probable cause was in this case to a large extent a question of law, that point had been raised in the case of Mains v. M'Lullich. The question of probable cause in that case was even more purely a question of law, yet an issue was granted.[2]

Counsel for the defender were not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The case which we have here, when divested of the technical and formal words which are set out on record, is this:—This public officer, the procurator-fiscal, presented a complaint against the pursuer of the present action for having contravened the licensing statute, in respect that he had sold spirits in premises for which he had not obtained the statutory certificate. It turned out that the ground on which the complaint was presented was that the house in respect of which the pursuer had obtained a certificate had been partially burnt down. The Justices sustained this as a sufficient ground for preventing the pursuer from selling spirits on the solum formerly occupied by the house, and within the broken walls. In a suspension, the Court of Justiciary, looking to the circumstances in which the complaint was presented, the sale complained of having taken place within a week of the fire, and to the fact that the pursuer held a certificate for the house, and that it did not appear that he did not intend to repair the house, held that the conviction could not stand, and that the license did not fall merely in respect of the injury to the premises. The pursuer now brings an action of damages against the fiscal, alleging no doubt in words, malice and want of probable cause. The question is whether he is entitled to an issue. The Lord Ordinary has held that he is not, because, admitting that the fiscal was actuated by malice, of which there is a sufficient allegation, there is no sufficient allegation of want of probable cause, which is also an essential element in such cases.

I am very far from saying that in ordinary circumstances, where an allegation of want of probable cause is necessary, a general allegation to that effect is not sufficient. Although it rests upon the pursuer of such an action to prove want of probable cause, it may be partly proved by the defender's inability to shew probable cause. But it would be of the worst example to allow mere words to become the foundation for a trial, where there is manifestly no substance in the allegation. In cases of alleged fraud the Court has often refused an issue, although the record was plentifully besprinkled with the words "fraud" and "fraudulently," where there was clearly no such statement of facts as would, if proved, amount to fraud. In the circumstances set forth by the present pursuer it is clearly impossible for him to prove want of probable cause. The question whether there was probable cause for presenting the complaint was one partly of law, upon the construction of the licensing statutes, and partly of fact, partly also of legal inference from facts, on which persons, whether skilled or not, might reasonably differ. I was one of the Judges who decided the case in the Court of Justiciary, and I was far from thinking the question one free from doubt. Our judgment turned a good deal on the short time which had elapsed between the occurrence of the fire and the presenting the complaint. If the state of matters had been allowed to continue any length of time it is by no means clear that our judgment might not have been different.

I do not think it necessary to go into the other matters argued, how far want of probable cause is for the Judge to decide, and how far for the jury. I go upon the broad ground that, although the pursuer avers in words that the defender acted "without probable cause," it is manifest from the pursuer's whole statements that there is no substance in these averments.

LORD NEAVES.—I concur. It is important to observe the circumstances in which this action is raised. The suspension in the Court of Justiciary came before your Lordship in the chair, sitting along with Lord Young and myself. We set aside the conviction, but we indicated no opinion that the question raised by the complaint was not a fair one to try. An action of damages is now brought against the procurator-fiscal for bringing this judicial question before a competent tribunal, who decided it in one way, and the ground of the action is that their decision was overturned by another and higher tribunal. It is a rule, necessary for the protection of officials, and, indeed, of litigants in general, that a person instituting regular judicial proceedings is not liable in damages, unless it be averred and proved that he acted maliciously and without probable cause. I agree with your Lordship that upon this case, as disclosed by the pursuer himself, it is impossible that he can make out a case of want of probable cause. The pursuer admits, and was obliged to admit, that very material circumstances founded on in the complaint in question had emerged since he got his certificate. The house was burnt to a very considerable extent, to what precise extent is unnecessary to inquire. It was so damaged and changed in its condition that it became necessary for the pursuer to go to the Excise department for leave to do what it would have been at least doubtful whether he could do without that leave, viz., to be allowed to carry on his business in the premises as in a question with the Excise. This matter of selling spirits, however, is under a twofold jurisdiction, the Excise and the Justices. The Justices took the view that the change in the character of the premises was enough to compel the pursuer to desist from selling exciseable liquors therein until he should put the house in a condition approaching to the condition in which it was when the certificate was granted. That view involved matter of fact and matter of law,—matter of fact whether the house was materially destroyed, and matter of law whether, in consequence of that extent of destruction it was legally rendered unsuitable as a place for selling exciseable liquors.

As a general rule it may be enough for a person suing an action of damages of this kind against a procurator-fiscal to aver that what was done was done maliciously and without probable cause. But want of probable cause may mean want of probable cause in fact or want of probable cause in law. It is plain that the doubt or question here arises on the point of law. The complaint does not say that the house was levelled to the ground. On the contrary, it implies that the walls were still standing. There is nothing in the pursuer's statements materially different from this. His conduct in applying to the Excise shews that he considered it doubtful whether he was entitled to go on selling excisable liquors in the premises. The question was whether the pursuer was not bound first to put his premises in repair as a condition of carrying on his trade as in a question with the licensing Justices. In the Court of Justiciary we considered that a cessation of traffic should not be enforced, but we did not say there was no probabilis causa for the complaint.

Craig v. Peebles.

There being, then, no dispute as to the facts, or, at least, there being sufficient undisputed facts to enable us to arrive at a conclusion, we are in a position to negative want of probable cause. The alteration on the state of the building made it not unnatural and not unreasonable for the public prosecutor in the discharge of his duty to try the question, which he did, before a competent tribunal and in competent form, though he did not ultimately succeed. It would be a strong and a harsh thing to say to a procurator-fiscal in such circumstances, that there was not a probable cause where the Justices found there was a good cause. The superior Court having found it insufficient does not infer that it was not probable.

With regard to malice, I do not much differ from the Lord Ordinary's view that if that had been all which it was necessary for the pursuer to aver the allegation is sufficient to allow him to go to trial. But want of probable cause is also essential. I may add, however, that the animus injuriandi, if meaning merely a wish to punish a man, who he thinks is breaking the law, is not wrong in a procurator-fiscal, for it is his duty to be a terror to evildoers.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I agree with both your Lordships. The pursuer would require to establish, if the case went to trial, both malice and want of probable cause. The allegations in support of the charge of malice in the record seem to be sufficient. Whether they could be established is a different matter. But in regard to the charge of want of probable cause, I think I am correct in saying that Mr Lang, in his able argument for the pursuer, was unable to point out in the record any substantial or material allegation of facts which requires to be investigated. If, then, nothing in support of want of probable cause is alleged, why should the case go further? In one of the cases cited in argument (Urquhart v. Dick) it seems to have been held that what constitutes probable cause is a question for the Judge, and not the jury, and that that is so cannot, I should think, be disputed, subject always to the remark that it may be for the jury first to ascertain and find the facts where they are disputed. But here, as there are no material facts to be ascertained, the question whether the pursuer acted without probable cause is one which can, and ought to be, determined now and at once by the Court. In short, I entirely concur with the Lord Ordinary when he says that,—"The question of probable cause regards, and can only regard, the matters of law on which the guilt or innocence of the pursuer turned; and this it is, I think, for the Court to decide." I have only to add that, in so deciding it, I have no difficulty in holding that the pursuer's charge against the defender of want of probable cause is untenable.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion. The question whether the prosecutor had or had not "probable cause" for raising and insisting in the proceedings complained of is, in this particular case, a pure question of law. The Lord Ordinary says,—"Neither before the Justices nor in the Court of Justiciary was there any dispute about the facts," and the same remark is true in the present litigation. There is no dispute as to the facts, or the material facts, upon which the complaint was rested, and it being admitted that the pursuer, in order to recover damages, must instruct, not only malice, but want of probable cause, the question is, can we not now decide the question of law, whether or not the prosecutor had probable cause for the prosecution? We are in just as good a position to decide this question of law as after a long proof, in which the undisputed facts would be disclosed, and it is highly expedient, if we can as safely and conclusively determine the question of law now, that we should do so, instead of waiting until there has been a jury trial. Now, I agree with your Lordships that, in point of law, the public prosecutor must be held to have had probable cause for raising and insisting in the complaint. The very fact that the inferior Court and the Court of review took different views affords of itself the strongest presumption that the law was doubtful, and that therefore the prosecutor did not proceed without probable cause. His cause was so probable that he actually succeeded in it before the Court of the first instance, and although the Court of review, the Court of Justiciary, held that he was wrong in law and quashed the conviction, this does not in the least shew that he had no probable cause to institute the prosecution. But, apart from this, I am very clearly of opinion, and in this I agree with all your Lordships and with all the Judges of Justiciary who quashed the conviction, that, although ill-founded, the prosecution was brought with probable and reasonable cause, and this by itself excludes the present action of damages.

Proof—Oath of Party—Retractation of Reference.—It is competent for the Court to allow a minute of reference to oath to be withdrawn, but it is a question for the discretion of the Court, and leave will be refused, not only in cases where the party has made the reference from improper motives, but also where, in consequence of the reference (through delay or otherwise), the opposite party has been put to a disadvantage.

1st DIVISION. Sheriff of Mid-Lothian, &c.

M. W. DICK, spirit merchant, Edinburgh, sued John Hutton, Leith, in the Sheriff Court of Mid-Lothian, for payment of £33, advanced by the pursuer on the security and in part discount of a bill for £100, accepted by the defender, and indorsed to and held by the pursuer. The defence was in substance that the pursuer was not an onerous holder of the bill. The Sheriff-substitute (Gebbie), on 16th April 1875, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the defender can prove only by the writ or oath of the pursuer that he is not an onerous bona fide holder of the bill sued on, and allows the defender a proof accordingly."

On 4th May the defender lodged a minute referring the whole cause to the pursuer's oath, which the Sheriff-substitute sustained, and appointed the pursuer to appear and depone on the 21st. On that day, the pursuer being present, the diet was adjourned on the defender's motion till the 28th. On the 28th the defender lodged a minute of retractation of the minute of reference. On 2d June the Sheriff-substitute pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds it in the circumstances incompetent to withdraw the said reference, and in respect the defender did not desire any other or further opportunity for taking the deposition of the pursuer, holds him as confessed, and decerns against the defender, in terms of the conclusions of the libel."

The defender appealed to the Sheriff (Davidson) who on 6th July pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that, by interlocutor of 16th April 1875, it was found that the defender can prove that the pursuer is not an onerous bona fide holder of the bill sued on only by the writ or oath of the pursuer; that the defender acquiesced in the said judgment, and it is now final; that accordingly he thereafter referred the whole cause to the oath of the pursuer, and the reference was sustained, and two several days were successively appointed for taking the oath of the pursuer, at both of which diets the pursuer attended for the purpose of deponing; that the defender then put in a minute retracting the aforesaid minute of reference, and in respect the defender does not now offer to prove his defence by the oath of the pursuer, or by his writ, repels the defences: Decerns against the defender in terms of the conclusions of the libel: Finds the defender liable in expenses."

The defender appealed to the Court of Session.

He argued;—Although the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor of 16th April was final in the Sheriff Court, not having been appealed within seven days, it could be reviewed in the Court of Session. The defender, accordingly, maintained that he was entitled to a proof prout de jure. But, in the first place, he ought to be allowed to retract his minute of reference. That was always allowed to a party before the oath was emitted, unless some improper motive could be imputed to him,[1] such as that he had made the reference only for the purpose of causing delay. Here there was no colour for such an imputation. In the Act of Sederunt regulating Sheriff Court procedure the right of the party to withdraw a minute of reference was assumed as a matter of course.[2]

The pursuer argued;—It would not be fair to him to re-open this matter after ten months. The defender had his opportunity of appealing against the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor, but he elected to acquiesce in it, and entered into a judicial contract with the pursuer referring the whole cause to his oath.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question in this case is whether the appellant should be allowed to withdraw his minute of reference to the pursuer's oath. The result of the authorities is that it is competent to allow a party to withdraw a minute of reference, and it is also in the discretion of the Court to refuse such permission. It depends upon the circumstances of each case, and therefore we must look at the circumstances here.

On 16th April 1875, immediately after the record was closed, the Sheriff-substitute found that the defender could prove only by the writ or oath of the pursuer that he was not an onerous bona fide holder of the bill sued on. The action was to recover the balance of the contents of a bill for £100, and the chief defence undoubtedly was that the pursuer was not an onerous bona fide holder. Therefore the substance of the case, as regards the mode of proof, was dealt with by that interlocutor. The defender was entitled to appeal to the Sheriff under sec. 19 of the Sheriff Court Act. I think there is a great deal of force in the view maintained by the defender's counsel that the 16th section must be read along with the 19th, and the result is that the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor became final if not appealed within seven days, and that it was not brought under the review of the Sheriff by a subsequent appeal on the merits. Accordingly the alternative presented to the defender was quite distinct. He must either dispute the Sheriff-substitute's law or acquiesce in the mode of proof prescribed. If he resolved to dispute the judgment in point of law his only remedy was to appeal at once. If not, he must either undertake to prove the non-onerosity by writing or refer the matter to the pursuer's oath. He did adopt the latter course, and after due consideration—for it was not till more than a fortnight afterwards, on 4th May, that he lodged a minute referring the whole cause to the pursuer's oath. On the same day the Sheriff-substitute sustained the reference, and appointed the pursuer to appear and depone on 21st May. When that day arrived the Sheriff-substitute, on the motion of the defender, and of consent, adjourned the diet till the 28th. On the 28th the Sheriff-substitute was informed that it was the purpose of the defender to withdraw or retract the reference, and accordingly he was allowed to lodge a minute to that effect. But that having been done, the Sheriff-substitute found that it was in the circumstances incompetent to withdraw the reference, and in respect the defender did not desire any further opportunity of taking the pursuer's deposition, held him as confessed. The defender then appealed to the Sheriff, who held, as I think quite rightly, that the interlocutor of 16th April was final in the Sheriff Court; and in respect the defender did not offer to prove his defence by the oath of the pursuer or by his writ, he had nothing for it but to decern.

The defender now comes here by appeal. He desires to get behind all these proceedings, and asks the Court to consider and recall the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor of 16th April.

But in order to reach this point we have to consider the question of this defender's right to withdraw his minute of reference. The right of a party to withdraw a reference depends not merely on his motives in making the reference but also to a great extent upon the consequences of his having done so. Now, suppose we were satisfied that the Sheriff-substitute had gone wrong and that the defender was entitled to prove by witnesses the non-onerosity of the bill, what would the result be? We should have to recall the whole interlocutors from 16th April downwards, and the case would begin again simply as it stood at the closing of the record. That would be a serious result, placing the payment of the balance of this bill under suspension during all this period. I think that cannot be permitted, and if the defender thinks he will suffer any hardship in the result he has himself entirely to blame for the course he took when the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor was pronounced. I do not think a party is entitled to redress against his own folly and error at such cost to his opponent. Even if we allowed the pursuer his whole expenses it would not restore him to the position he occupied in April, because he was then entitled to decree, unless the non-onerosity was proved by his writ or oath.

In these circumstances we have a case in which we ought not to exercise the discretion of allowing the reference to be retracted. The defender ought not, in my opinion, to be allowed to withdraw from the judicial contract between the parties fixing the evidence on which the case was to be decided.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred. No. 75.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that the appellant (defender) is not, in the circumstances of the case, entitled to retract the reference to the oath of the respondent (pursuer), contained in his minute of 4th May 1875; but in respect he now offers to proceed to take the deposition of the respondent on the said reference, appoint Saturday next, the 19th inst., at 12 o'clock noon, as a diet for the respondent to appear and depone on the said reference: Grant commission," &c. Burgh Election—Statute—Casus Improvisus.—The Royal Burghs Reform Act (3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 76), after giving directions for the election in royal burghs of new town-councils in November 1833 by the votes of electors, enacted that upon the first Tuesday in November 1834, and in every succeeding year, "one-third, or a number as near as may be to one third," of the whole council "shall go out of office," and that the third to go out of office in November 1834 should consist of the third who had the smallest number of votes at the election of 1833, and the third who should go out in November 1835 should consist of the third who had the next lowest number of votes at the election of 1833 (the majority of the council always determining, where the votes for any such persons shall have been equal, who shall be the persons to retire), and thereafter the third of the councillors so annually going out of office shall always consist of the councillors who have been longest in office." The Act contained no provision for the case of elections subsequent to 1835, where, in consequence of deaths or resignations in previous years, those longest in office at the end of the year should be less in number than a third of the council, and furnished no criterion for selecting the required number from the class next longest in office.

The Municipal Elections (Scotland) Act, 1870, 33 and 34 Vict. c. 92, dispensed with voting for town-councillors when the number of candidates did not exceed the number of vacancies, and enacted, sec. 5,—"That where in any burgh or ward two or more councillors have been elected on the same day under the provisions of this Act, or have been elected by an equality of votes under the provisions of the Election Acts, the majority of the town-council" "shall determine the order in which the councillors so elected shall retire."

In a question as to the compulsory retirement in 1875 of a town-councillor who had held office for two years only in a burgh where the number of councillors was eighteen, held (1) that the retirement annually of six councillors was imperative, although the number of those bound to retire in respect of their being longest in office was less than six, and that the deficiency fell to be made up from the class next longest in office; (2) that the Municipal Elections Act of 1870, in providing for town-councils fixing the order in which councillors should retire only in cases where councillors had been elected on the same day, without being voted for, or "by an equality of votes," had by implication recognised the rule of retirement founded on disparity of votes prescribed by the Royal Burghs Reform Act for the elections of 1834 and 1835 as applicable to subsequent elections; (3) that a vacancy caused by the death or resignation of a councillor who was not one bound to retire at the next annual election could not be reckoned among the vacancies required by the statute.

THE Royal Burgh of Rutherglen had, by the set of the burgh, and the Act 3 and 4 William IV., c. 76, eighteen councillors. By section 16 of the Act,* one-third of this number were required to retire annually. 1ST DIVISION. Lord Young. B.

In November 1874 five of the six councillors who had been elected in 1871 retired, John Scouler, who was the sixth, remaining in the council, in consequence of his having been appointed provost in November 1873.* Six new councillors were elected, five to fill the place of the five who retired, and one to fill the vacancy caused by the death of James Wallace, a councillor elected in 1872, who had died during the year 1874, before November.

Between November 1874 and November 1875 William Davidson, one of the councillors elected in 1872, died; also Robert Alexander, one of the councillors elected in 1873, resigned office. Neither of the vacancies thus caused by death and resignation was filled up ad interim in terms of the 25th section of the Act 3 and 4 William IV., c. 76.†

In November 1875 the four surviving councillors who had been elected in 1872, and who therefore had been three years in office, retired, John Scouler, who had now been four years in the council, remaining on for another year in virtue of his office as provost. Six new councillors only were elected, four to fill the place of the four councillors retiring, the fifth to fill the vacancy caused by the death of William Davidson, who had been elected in 1872 and had died in 1875, and the sixth to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Robert Alexander, who had been elected in 1873.

In November 1875 Robert Hamilton, who was the councillor having the fewest number of votes at election of those who were elected in November 1873, and who therefore had been two years in office, was elected a bailie of the burgh.

To set aside this appointment the present action was raised.

The summons concluded for reduction of the minute of the town-council of 5th November 1875, which set forth the election of Robert may be to one-third, of the whole council of each such burgh shall go out of office; and in the said year 1834 the third who shall go out shall consist of the councillors who had the smallest number of votes at the election of councillors in this present year. And in the succeeding year, 1835, the third of the councillors first elected under this Act who shall go out shall consist of the councillors who at such first election under this Act had the next smallest number of votes (the majority of the council always determining, where the votes for any such person shall have been equal, who shall be the persons to retire), and thereafter the third of the councillors so annually going out of office shall always consist of the councillors who have been longest in office, provided always that any councillors so going out of office shall be capable of being immediately re-elected."

* 3 and 4 Will. IV., c. 76, sec. 24, contains a provision "that the provost or chief magistrate, and the treasurer, shall always remain in office for the period of three years."

† Sec. 25 enacts:—"That if any vacancy shall in the course of the year occur in the council or magistracy or office-bearers of any such burgh by death, disability, or resignation, the same shall be filled up ad interim by the remaining members of the council by election, as hereinbefore provided, at a meeting to be called on five days' notice by the town-clerk, by intimation in writing to each of such remaining members of the council; but any councillor, magistrate, or office-bearer so elected ad interim shall go out of office on the first Tuesday of November next ensuing his election, and the vacancy thereby occurring shall be supplied at the next annual election of councillors and magistrates or office-bearers in such burgh, provided that if the vacancy shall have occurred in any burgh contained in the said schedule (C), such vacancy shall, at such annual election, be supplied by the ward of such burgh, by which the councillor who had died, or resigned, or been disabled, had been elected, and which shall, in this case, elect an additional councillor, unless the party so dying or disabled would then have gone out of office as one of the third hereby directed to retire."

Hamilton as one of the bailies of the burgh, and for declarator that "the said Robert Hamilton was not duly and lawfully elected a bailie of the burgh of Rutherglen, and that the said Robert Hamilton, prior to the said 5th day of November 1875, had ceased to be a councillor of the said burgh, and that upon the foresaid date of his said pretended election as a bailie he was not then and that he is not at present one of the councillors of the said burgh."

The summons also concluded against Robert Hamilton and the other defenders in terms of the Act 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 76, for penalties for having wilfully acted in violation of the provisions of that Act.

The pursuers maintained that both in November 1874 and November 1875 one more councillor than those who actually retired should have retired, that a full third of the council should have retired on each of these occasions, and six vacancies have been occasioned over and above the vacancy caused in 1874 by the death of Mr Wallace, and in 1875 by the resignation of Mr Alexander; that as there were not, either in 1874 or 1875 six councillors who had been three years in office, but only five in 1874 and four in 1875, besides Mr Davidson, it fell to the councillor who had fewest votes at election of those who had been two years in office to retire in each case; that in November 1875 Robert Hamilton was the councillor who had fewest votes at election of those who had been two years in office, and that he, therefore, should have retired, and was no longer legally a councillor when he was elected a bailie.

The defenders pleaded;—(4) On a true construction of section 16 of the Act 3 and 4 Will. IV., cap. 76, it is not necessary that more than one-third, or a number as near as may be to one-third, of the whole council of a burgh shall go out of office in each year. (5) There is no warrant in the statutes, or any of them, for compelling a councillor to retire merely because he has been elected by the smallest number of votes of his year. (6) Assuming it to be necessary that there should be a vacancy in the council in order to permit of the provost remaining in office beyond his natural term as a councillor, the magistrates and council are entitled to accept a vacancy caused by death or resignation as sufficient to meet that requirement.

The Lord Ordinary, on 12th January 1876, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the defences, assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the pursuers liable in expenses," &c.*

* "NOTE.—The leading conclusion is for reduction of the defender Robert Hamilton's election as a bailie of the royal burgh of Rutherglen in November 1875, on the ground that he was ineligible, not being a councillor of the burgh. He was elected a councillor in November 1873; and the question whether or not he was a councillor when elected a bailie in November 1875 depends on the soundness or unsoundness of the pursuers' contention that he ought to have gone out of office prior to the election of that year, under section 16 of the Act 3 and 4 William IV., cap. 76. This again depends on the construction of the statute as applicable to the facts averred by the pursuers.

"To take the facts first: These, as averred by the pursuers, and so far as material, appear to be, 1st, that by the set or usage of the burgh the full number of councillors is eighteen; 2d, that Hamilton was duly elected a councillor in November 1873, as one of the six then elected to fill the places of the third of the council who then went out as having been longest in office, he having the smallest number of votes of the six elected; 3d, that Scouler, a councillor elected in November 1871, was in November 1873 elected provost; 4th, that neither in 1874 nor 1875 did a full third of the council go out, under section 16 of the Act, but in 1874 only five, and in 1875 only four. The other facts will be most intelligibly stated after noticing the provisions of the

Act as explanatory of how it happened that six councillors did not go out under the Act in 1874 and 1875, but only five in the one year and four in the other.

"The most important clause of the Act, with reference to the present question, is clause 16, quoted in condescendence 5. It enacts generally that in November 1834, and in every subsequent year, 'one-third, or a number as near as may be to one-third, of the council' of each burgh shall go out of office. In 1834 the selection of councillors to go out was necessarily made from those elected in 1833, for there were no others, except, it may be, persons who had been appointed ad interim to fill vacancies under section 25, and who, if there were such, went out under the provisions of that clause. In 1835 the case was, to a certain extent, different; and it is to be observed that only councillors elected in 1833 are required to go out in 1835.

"The criterion in both years is 'number of votes,' the third having the smallest number being appointed to go out in 1834, and the third having the next smallest number being appointed to go out in 1835. There is no provision for the very unlikely, but still possible, event of the number of councillors who had been elected in 1833 being, before the election of 1834 or 1835, reduced by 'death, disability, or resignation,' below one-third of the whole number of councillors, according to the set or usage of the burgh, other than the words 'one-third, or a number as near as may be to one-third.' I should myself think these words sufficient to meet the case, and, had it occurred, I should think that it would have been so held rather than that any deficiency of a full third should be made up of councillors elected in 1834. It is necessary to consider this point in construing the words which I have quoted, which, according to the contention of the pursuers (with which I do not agree), refer only to the case of a burgh in which the whole number of councillors, according to the set or usage, is not exactly divisible by three.

"The part of the clause which has governed the matter since 1835 is in these words:—'And thereafter the third of councillors so annually going out of office shall always consist of the councillors who have been longest in office.'

"Taking the clause as a whole, I think the provision applicable to the first three years may be regarded as of the nature of a temporary expedient necessary to be resorted to, prior to the complete development in operation of the scheme of the Act, which scheme is, I think, clearly that every councillor shall have three years of office and no more, the machinery by which this is secured being, that in every year after 1835 'one-third, or a number as near as may be to one-third of the whole council,' and which 'shall always consist of the councillors who have been longest in office,' shall go out.

"After the scheme of the Act came into full operation, on the expiry of the first three years, the comparative number of votes by which any councillor was originally elected is no criterion for going out. This criterion, which is by the Act limited to councillors elected in 1833, has no application to councillors subsequently elected, for there is no rule of the common law that I know of which would warrant the Court in resorting to it.

"The next important clause of the Act is the 24th, which enacts that a provost or treasurer 'shall always remain in office for the period of three years.' This is in truth a qualification of section 16, for the admitted effect of it is to extend the duration of the office of councillor in the case of any person who may be elected provost or treasurer in his second or third year.

"Accordingly, Mr Scouler (a councillor elected in 1871) being elected provost in November 1873, his term of office as councillor was lengthened by two years, in terms of the foresaid statute, beyond 2d November 1874, at which date, had he not been elected provost, he would have fallen to retire' (condescendence 12).

"But the pursuers, while thus admitting that Mr Scouler was not required to go out in November 1874, although he was then one of the six councillors the election of Mr Robert Hamilton as a bailie of the burgh following upon that election of councillors, and to have it declared that Mr Hamilton was not (a full third of the council), who had been longest in office, contend that the full third ought to have been made up by putting out in his stead a councillor elected in 1872, and who was therefore not of those 'who have been longest in office,' and, in the absence of any other criterion of selection, suggest that of number of votes which had been enacted as the criterion for the elections of 1834 and 1835. The pursuers do not indeed seek any remedy for what was done in 1874, but only refer to it as an irregularity, and as 'the beginning of the system against which the pursuers have protested' (condescendence 14). In my opinion there was no irregularity. I think not only that the provost properly remained in the council, but that the statute was satisfied by the going out of the five councillors who were elected at the same time with him (November 1871), and were the whole councillors who had been longest in office, although less by one than a third of the council, that one being enabled to remain by section 24, which to this extent qualifies section 16.

"The point is only unnecessarily confused by referring to the death of Mr Wallace before November 1874. If his death occurred long before November the council may have erred in not making an interim appointment. But his place was filled at the election in November, just as it must have been had there been an interim appointment, and his death in no way affects the present question. The resignation of Mr Alexander before November 1875 (he having been elected in 1873) is an equally uninteresting and unimportant incident, and I pass it by accordingly.

"The pursuers' case really turns on the election of 1875—the question being whether or not the defender, Robert Hamilton (who was elected in November 1873), ought then to have gone out under section 16 of the Act.

"Now, leaving out of view the case of the provost (elected councillor in 1871), the councillors who had been longest in office were those (six in number) who had been elected in November 1872, and whose names are given in condescendence 10. Had these councillors all been alive and in office in November 1875 it is clear that they must all have gone out under section 16 of the Act. But two of them died before November 1875, that is, between November 1874 and November 1875. There were, therefore, only four in life to go out under the Act, and they went out. The other two having gone out by death, the question is, whether their turn to go out, under the Act, ought to have been supplied by selecting (on the criterion of number of votes) councillors who had been elected in 1873, and who were therefore not of the number of the council who had been longest in office. If my conception of the case and of the Act of Parliament is not fundamentally erroneous, the pursuers' contention here is so obviously untenable that I should waste words and consume time unprofitably by arguing the matter at large. Clause 25 was especially relied on in argument by the pursuers' counsel, but why, he failed to convey to my mind. In the case of death or disability the clause distinguishes between the case of a party who would at the next election have gone out under the Act and one who would not,—but to this extent only, that the person elected in room of the dead or disabled councillor shall in the latter case be elected as 'an additional councillor,' and in the other not. The language is inaccurate, but the meaning, which need hardly be expressed, is simply this, that where the party dying, resigning, or disabled, would not have gone out under the Act prior to the election of his successor, the election of his successor shall be deemed the election of an additional councillor—i.e., additional to those required to fill vacancies caused by councillors going out under the Act, but, if otherwise, that no councillor shall be elected 'additional' to those required by such going out; or, in other words, that the circumstance of the going out of a councillor being anticipated by his death or resignation before the election shall make no difference with respect to the rights of his constituents to elect a successor.

"I have already sufficiently indicated my opinion that the death or resignation of a councillor not of the number of those who, as having been longest in lawfully elected a bailie, and that, prior to the date of his pretended election as bailie, he had ceased to be one of the councillors of the burgh.

The whole question turns on the regularity of the election of councillors in November 1875. There has been a good deal of reference back to the proceedings at the election of 1874, but it appears to me that we have nothing to do with them in dealing with the case.

The burgh of Rutherglen had by the set of the burgh eighteen councillors, and this number was not altered but confirmed by the Act 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 76. After providing for the first election of councillors, which was to take place in 1833, the statute enacts that a certain portion of the councillors shall go out of office in each subsequent year, and their place be filled by election. It provides specially in section 16 for the first two years after the Act came into force, viz., 1834 and 1835, and then it provides generally that in every succeeding year one-third, or a number as near as may be to one-third, of the whole council shall go out of office. Now, the number of councillors in this particular burgh being eighteen, the practical application of this rule in the present case is that six councillors go out yearly and six new ones are elected in their place. Accordingly, we find that in the three years, 1871, 1872, and 1873, that course was precisely followed—six councillors went out and six were elected. But in 1874, when the time for the election came round, it turned out that, in the interval between that and the previous election, a gentleman had been elected provost who would have been one of the six to go out in November 1874. Now, the 24th section of the statute provides that the provost shall always remain in office for the period of three years, and that has been construed by universal practice, and very reasonably so, to mean that the provost is to have three years' tenure of office after his appointment to that particular office, irrespective of the date at which he was elected to the council and of the date at which he should have gone out of the council. Conse-office, are required to go out in the following November, is immaterial to the question. The place of such a councillor dying or resigning must, whether or not it shall have been filled by an interim appointment, be supplied by a new election in the following November, under section 25 of the Act, without reference to section 16. But the death or resignation of a councillor who, had he not died or resigned, would have gone out, under section 16, in the following November, is another matter. In that case also, an interim appointment may be made, but whether made or not, there is only one place to be filled when the November election arrives—thus, when in November 1875 it appeared that of the six councillors who, had they all lived, would have gone out, two were dead, I am very clearly of opinion that the vacancies to be filled were not raised to eight, but remained at six. Upon this view the election of 1875 proceeded. Six councillors were then elected in room of the six who had been elected in 1872, and who were then all removed from the council, two of them by death immediately before the election, and the remaining four by going out under section 16 of the Act. The case would not have been varied (although the pursuers seem to think otherwise) had the places vacated by death been supplied by interim appointments.

"The primary conclusion thus failing, the subsidiary conclusion must fail also. I must say, however, that in my opinion the subsidiary conclusion must fail in any view—there being no ground whatever that I can see for attributing to the defenders a wilful violation of the Act. My opinion that they have acted in accordance with the Act would probably be an answer to the imputation of wilful violation, even in the judgment of those who may think that I and they are in error."

Thomson, &c. v. Magistrates of Ruthergen, &c.

quently, Mr Scouler, the gentleman who was elected provost in November 1873, must remain in the council till November 1876. He had been elected to the council in November 1871, and therefore, in the ordinary course of events, he would have been one of the six councillors who fell to go out in November 1874, but, having been elected provost, he remained in, and, instead of six, only five councillors went out in November 1874. It was contended for the pursuers that another councillor ought to have gone out in his place. On the other hand, it was maintained for the defenders that the effect of the clause was simply this, that when the period arrived at which the provost ought to have gone out, one fewer than the usual number of councillors fell to go out, and one fewer to be elected.

This question was pressed upon our attention in the argument as being at the root of the irregularities alleged, but I really do not think that it is necessary to determine it, for whether the pursuers are right or wrong in their contention on this point, and whether the election of 1874 was regular and valid, or irregular and invalid, does not affect the validity of the election of 1875.

In 1874, as matter of fact, the defenders' construction of the statute was adopted, and five of the council went out instead of six. I give no opinion on the validity of the consequent election, but, for the purpose of deciding the case before us, I assume that the election of 1874 was in regular course. Now, in November 1875, the councillors who would naturally fall to go out were those elected in 1872, and if there had been six elected in 1872 still in the council, no difficulty would have arisen. But that was not the fact. The state of the facts was this, that of six who had been elected in 1872, one, a Mr Wallace, had died in 1874, and before November of that year, and another, Mr Davidson, had died in 1875, and before November of that year. Now, it appears to me that, according to the true construction of the statute, the gentleman who died in 1875 fell to be counted as one of the councillors going out of office in that year, just as if he had survived until November; but, on the other hand, that the gentleman who died in 1874 cannot be counted as one of those going out in November 1875, though his three years of office would have expired then if he had survived. I can find nothing to the contrary in the statute. For when he died in 1874 his place fell to be filled up, and was filled up, in November 1874, in addition to those of the five retiring councillors; and therefore it is impossible that he can be counted as one of those going out in 1875. His place was already filled up by a councillor, who was entitled to retain office until 1877.

The view which the Lord Ordinary has taken as to the election of 1875 is perfectly logical, and his reasoning would be irresistible, but unfortunately he has proceeded upon an error in fact, which vitiates his judgment, in not distinguishing between these two death vacancies. He takes them as both occurring in 1875, and draws his legal conclusion accordingly.

Now, this brings the matter to a very simple issue. Was it necessary or was it not, that six councillors should go out in November 1875, or was the statute satisfied with only five? To determine this question it is necessary to give particular consideration to the 16th clause, which provides for the retirement of councillors. It says,—"That upon the first Tuesday in November 1834, and in every succeeding year, one-third, or a number as near as may be to one-third, of the whole council" shall go out of office; and it is contended for the defenders that the meaning of these words, "a number as near as may be to one-third," is, that if there are not as many as one-third of the council who have been three years in office, you must take as nearly one-third as there are councillors who have been three years in office. Now, I cannot adopt that construction. No doubt the normal condition of the council, as contended for by the defenders, is this, that every member should have three years of office, and no member more than three years of office. But it is quite impossible in practice that that position of affairs should be maintained. It may happen that of those elected, say in 1872, not one remains in office in 1875, and yet the statute provides that one-third of the council shall go out in each year. According to the defenders' contention, there would be no one to go out then at all. That, certainly, cannot be the true construction of the statute, for it would leave the council unchanged for a whole year. But without going the length of supposing that all those elected in any one year have disappeared before their three years have elapsed, we may at least suppose that some two or three of them have done so. There would then remain only three or four to go out. Now, could three or four out of six be brought under the terms of the statute as "one-third, or a number as nearly as may be to one-third?" Moreover, it is just as clear that you will have, at some subsequent election, a much larger number than one-third who have been three years in office. For if at one election you have only two or three to go out, you will find a corresponding surplus in some following year; and so, instead of one-third to go out, you will have three or four more than one-third who would, according to the theory of the defenders, all have to go out at once. Therefore it is, I think, plain that this theory of the normal condition of the council cannot be perfectly carried out. It is impossible to arrange so that every councillor shall have three years of office, neither more nor less. Then, if you have more than one-third who have been three years in office, you must select who is to go out and who to remain. One way in which the difficulty might be avoided is this, namely, to hold that, when any councillor dies or retires during the currency of his term of office, the person elected in his stead only comes in to serve out his period of office. If that were acted upon it would obviate any difficulty. But that view has been authoritatively negatived in the case of Scott v. the Magistrates of Edinburgh,[1] and that decision has been acted on ever since, and it is impossible to go back upon it. It seems to me, therefore, that when the statute talks of one-third, or as near as may be to one-third, what it means is this, one-third, or as near to one-third as the number of councillors fixed by the set of the burgh permits. If the number is, as here, divisible by three, there is no alternative but that one-third must go out each year.

No. 76.

Thomson, &c. v. Magistrates of Rutherglen, &c.

That being so, the proceedings at the election of councillors in November 1875 was plainly irregular. Only five went out, including Mr Davidson, who died in that year. It is true six new councillors were made, but one was elected to supply a vacancy caused by the resignation, in the course of the year 1875, of Mr Alexander, a councillor who had not been elected in 1872, and whose place, therefore, required to be supplied, in terms of the 25th section of the Act 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 76, over and above those of the one-third retiring in ordinary rotation. The proceedings at the election of November 1875 were therefore irregular, as one more councillor ought to have gone out, and one more to have been elected.

But then the pursuers have also to make out that the councillor who ought to have gone out was Mr Hamilton. That is the very basis of the whole action. Now, that raises a question, to my mind, of much greater difficulty than the other. It is a question of construction of the statute, and, if it were not that we are aided by light from subsequent legislation, I should have had great difficulty in sustaining the contention of the pursuers.

v. Magistrat

The 16th section of the statute provided that in 1834 (the first year after the Act came into operation) the third to go out should "consist of the councillors who had the smallest number of votes at the election of councillors" in 1833. And, farther, that in the following year (1835) "the third of the councillors first elected under the Act who shall go out shall consist of the councillors who, at such first election under this Act, had the next smallest number of votes, the majority of the council always determining, where the votes for any such person shall have been equal, who shall be the person to retire;" and thereafter, that is, in 1836 and subsequent years, "the third of the councillors so annually going out of office shall always consist of the councillors who have been longest in office." Now, all this is plain enough so far. At the second election, in 1834, the one-third going out were those who had the smallest number of votes at the first election in 1833. At the third election, in 1835, the one-third going out were those who had the next smallest number of votes at the first election in 1833. Then, if everything kept its normal course, according to the defenders' theory, it would follow that in 1836 the remaining one-third would go out. But that is not what the statute provides. It includes the remaining one-third in its general provision for the future, that "the one-third so annually going out of office shall consist of the councillors who have been longest in office." Now, it might very well happen that in 1836 the remaining one-third of those elected in 1833 were no longer all in office. Deaths or resignations might have occurred which could not be counted as equivalent to going out of office in 1836. Supposing that to have been the state of matters in 1836, what would have been the proper course to take then? If only three remained to go out of the six who had been elected in 1833, where would you have found the other three? Evidently they could only be found in the remainder of the council who had not been so long as three years in office. The question is, how are you to select among them who are to be, so to speak, the victims? Nothing is suggested in the statute as a criterion, except the number of votes at election. And yet, in the statute itself, that criterion is expressly applied only in the case of the elections of 1834 and 1835, and nothing is said about it with reference to any future year. But it is argued that the terms of the statute are "the third of the councillors so going out," and that the word "so" implies that the mode of selecting who shall go out, if selection is necessary, shall be as provided with reference to the years 1834 and 1835, in accordance with the number of votes.

Now, I should have had great difficulty in adopting that interpretation if it were not for subsequent legislation. But the statute passed in 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. c. 92), to amend the law as to municipal elections, throws light on the subject. It must be kept in view, in the first place, that under the Act 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 76, no one could be elected without being voted for, either by means of signed lists or by a poll being taken. Even where there was no contest the councillors elected still came into office with a certain number of votes. The intermediate statute (the Municipal Elections (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 108) can hardly be said to touch the question, except that it provides for notice being given of the names of those who are to be put in nomination. But the Act of 1870, by section 3, makes a provision that when the number of persons nominated does not exceed the number of vacancies to be filled up there is to be no poll, and the persons nominated are simply to be declared duly elected. Consequently, in such cases there will be no voting, and the persons thus elected will come in, not in virtue of the votes they have received, but by reason of there being no opposition. This being a novel situation in the history of municipal elections, it is provided for by section 5 of the Act, which declares "that, where in any burgh or ward two or more councillors have been elected on the same day under the provisions of this Act, or have been elected by an equality of votes under the provisions of the Election Acts, the majority of the town-council (including the councillors so elected) shall determine the order in which the councillors so elected shall retire." Now, that is a very important enactment in reference to the matter before us, because it assumes, in the first place, that persons elected on the same day may go out at different times; and, in the second place, that if the persons so elected on the same day came in with unequal votes there is no difficulty as to the order in which they shall go out. For it is only in the case of no contest or of equality of votes that the majority of the council is to determine. Suppose, for instance, that of two councillors elected in November 1873 one had a larger number of votes than the other, and one is wanted to retire in 1875 to make up the proper number of retiring councillors, the section does not provide for that case, because it plainly assumes that it is provided for already. Where, therefore, there has been an election by votes, and the number of votes by which the different councillors have been elected is unequal, then the test of number of votes is the test to be applied to determine the order in which they are to retire.

I come, therefore, to the conclusion that section 16 of the Act 3 and 4 Will. IV. c. 76, is to receive this effect, that where, as in the present case, there is not a sufficient number of councillors three years in office to constitute the one-third of the council to go out, you must make up the deficiency by selecting from the next younger class of councillors; and that the principle of selection is to be this, that you are to take the member or members from that younger class who had the smallest number of votes, and, in a case of equality of votes or no contest, if only one is wanted, the majority of the council are to decide.

Applying this to the present case, it follows that the defender, Mr Hamilton, being of that younger class—that is, of those who were elected in 1873—the one who had the smallest number of votes, was the one who ought to have gone out; and, therefore, I am prepared to grant decree of reduction and declarator in favour of the pursuers, the conclusion for statutory penalties having been abandoned.

Lord Deas, Lord Ardmillan, and Lord Mure concurred.

The Court pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Reduce, decern, and declare, in terms of the reductive conclusions of the summons: Farther, find and declare that the defender, Robert Hamilton, had ceased to be a member of the town-council of Rutherglen prior to 5th November 1875, and was therefore on the said 5th November 1875 ineligible to the office of a bailie of the said burgh, and was not lawfully and duly elected a bailie of the said burgh, and decern: Further, decern and ordain the said Robert Hamilton to desist and cease from exercising any of the functions of a bailie or of a councillor of the said burgh: Quoad ultra of consent assoilzie the defenders, and decern: Find the pursuers entitled to expenses of process," &c.

Chalmers v. Dixon.

Reparation—Culpa—Opus Manufactum—Nuisance.—A company of iron-masters in the course of their trade accummulated on their premises an enormous bing of refuse from an ironstone pit, composed of combustible materials, which, from some unexplained cause, took fire. In an action by a neighbouring farmer against the ironmasters to recover damages for injury caused by noxious vapours emitted from the burning bing, held (1) that the defenders by forming such an opus manufactum had rendered themselves liable for the consequences without proof of specific fault; and (2) that fault had been proved.

2D DIVISION
Ld. Craighill
I.

THIS action was raised on 2d February 1875 by John Chalmers, tenant of the farm of Heads, in the parish of Whitburn and county of Linlithgow, against William Dixon (Limited), iron-masters.

The defenders had for many years previous to the raising of this action been engaged in calcining ironstone at their pits at Fauldhouse, in the county of Linlithgow.

The pursuer alleged;—"In the course of these operations they have improperly and illegally accumulated in the neighbourhood of the pits an immense bing of blaes, or of other waste material drawn from their pits. The materials composing this bing are very inflammable, and through the carelessness and fault of the defenders, or of those for whom they are responsible, it was set on fire in the course of the year 1872, and has since been burning, and will continue to burn for a long time to come. The defenders made no attempt to extinguish the fire when the bing was first ignited."

He stated that whenever the wind was from the south-west, the prevailing current in that district, noxious smoke and vapours given out by the burning bing reached his farm of Heads, which was about a mile off, and were a cause of discomfort and ill-health to himself and his family, as well as of serious injury to his crops. The conclusions of the summons were for damages and interdict against a repetition of the nuisance.

The pursuer pleaded;—The pursuer having suffered loss, injury, and damage by and through the wrongful, illegal, and injurious acts of the defenders condescended on, is entitled to reparation as concluded for.

The defenders stated that they had followed the universal practice of iron-masters in depositing the waste material of their pits in bings, and that the bing in question had been formed in precisely the same way as the other bings, of which there were many, of the like material in the district; that the bing had ignited spontaneously, and although every effort was made to extinguish the fire these efforts had been unsuccessful, and that, although they had consulted an analytical chemist, no means were known to them whereby they could accomplish that end.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's statement is irrelevant, and insufficient in law to support the conclusions of the summons. (2) The igniting of the bing of blaes and refuse foresaid, and the smoke and gases emitted therefrom, and the alleged nuisance and injury to the pursuer caused thereby, not having been caused through the fault of the defenders, they are entitled to absolvitor. (4) It being impossible to extinguish or stop the burning of the bing of blaes foresaid, any interdict granted against it would be inept.

A proof was allowed, from which it appeared that the existence of fire in the bing was certainly known to the defenders' manager in September 1872, if not earlier. It was proved that the defenders' workmen were in the habit of depositing ashes from a furnace on the bing, and on one occasion before the fire broke out, though the witnesses could not speak to the date, ashes were thrown upon the bing so hot that the end of the hutch in which they were carried was burned out. When the bing, however, came to be examined, nothing in the surface was found to be marked with fire, and a great body of scientific evidence was led to prove that the ignition of the bing must have been caused by internal heat generated by the excessive wet of the summer of 1872. The firing of such bings from spontaneous combustion was proved to be a very rare occurrence, although there were one or two other instances that year in the district of bings having taken fire without any known external cause. The defenders' scientific witnesses all stated that in their opinion no ordinary prudence or foresight could have anticipated the burning of the bing from the causes to which they attributed it.

Nothing was done by the defenders to extinguish the fire till the beginning of 1873. By that time complaints had been made by the workmen and others of the nuisance created by the burning bing. The defenders, accordingly, attempted to extinguish the fire by pumping large quantities of water upon it. By this time, however, the fire had taken such hold of the bing that the water had no effect. After pumping for about six weeks the defenders, in March 1873, consulted Mr Robert Tatlock, F.R.S.E., who stopped the pouring of the water upon the heap, as rather aggravating the combustion, but was not able to suggest any feasible means of extinguishing the fire; and he and other witnesses for the defenders considered that it would not have been possible to put out the fire, even if this had been attempted at an earlier period, or if put out for the time, it would, in their opinion, have broken out again.

The Lord Ordinary, on 27th July 1875, pronounced an interlocutor, which, after detailed findings in fact, to the effect that the pursuer had suffered injury and discomfort from the burning bing to an extent for which £200 was a reasonable solatium, and that the bing took fire from spontaneous combustion, proceeded:—"Lastly, Finds, as matters of fact, that (9) The defenders were in fault in putting down the bing in question upon mossy ground, and in making it of a size unusually great, at an increased risk of fire from spontaneous combustion; and, separatim, in not employing means immediately after the ignition was discovered by which the fire might have been extinguished: Finds, as matter of law, that the facts being as above set forth, the defenders are liable in the damage suffered as aforesaid by the pursuer: Therefore, repels the defences; and decerns the defenders to make payment to the pursuer of the sum of £200 sterling, in terms of the first conclusion of the summons: Quoad ultra, in respect that the conclusion for interdict is not now insisted in by the pursuer, assoilzies the defenders from that conclusion of the summons, and decerns: Finds the defenders liable in expenses," &c.*

* NOTE.—(After an examination of the evidence)— . . . "The defenders were dealing with materials more or less dangerous. They were bound to know the extent of the danger, and the counteractive precautions which ought to be adopted, as the interest of others were concerned; and having acted in such a way as to aggravate the danger, and by so doing produced the results in which the present action has originated, they, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, are answerable for the consequences of the faults which have been committed.

"Numerous decisions, it may here be mentioned, were cited by counsel at the debate upon this question of fault; among which were Keith v. Keir, June 10, 1812, F. C.; Rankine v. Dixon & Company, March 19, 1847, 9 D. 1048; Kerr v. Orkney, Dec. 17, 1857, 20 D. 298; Tennent v. Glasgow (H. of L.), 2 Macph. p. 22; and Mackintosh v. Mackintosh, July 15, 1864, 2 Macph. 1357. All of these, as well as the comments upon them, have been considered by the Lord Ordinary; and the only other explanation which appears to him to be necessary is, that if the faults imputed to the defenders in this action are as have been

Argued for them;—If a person exercised an undoubted legal right, and damage was thereby caused to another, it was not to be taken for granted that he was responsible, but it was necessary that the party complaining should prove negligence or culpa.[1] The erection of the bing in question was not only a perfectly lawful use of the defenders' premises, but it was an ordinary and necessary part of the conduct of their trade. There was no allegation and no proof that they had neglected any precautions. The occurrence of the fire was shewn to be an unforeseen event, for which the defenders could not be made liable, except upon the theory that a man carrying on a lawful operation within his own premises was bound to insure his neighbours against any incidental injury, a theory which had no place in the law of Scotland.[2]

Argued for the pursuer;—The defenders had erected an opus manufactum, a vast mass of inflammable materials, which were foreign to the surface of the ground, and they were therefore bound to make good any damage resulting therefrom, even though no specific fault could be brought home to them.[3] But if culpa was necessary to make the defenders liable, culpa had been abundantly proved.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am very clearly of opinion that the result at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived is correct, though I am not sure that I proceed exactly on the same grounds which weighed with his Lordship.

The admitted facts of the case are that the defenders erected upon their own ground an opus manufactum, composed of combustible materials. It is also proved that, if these materials did take fire "they emitted noxious vapours." Either by spontaneous combustion, or by the application of fire from without, this heap of blaes did take fire. It has gone on burning and giving out noxious vapours for three years, and it appears that it cannot be put out, and must go on burning till the fire is spent.

The question is, whether the defenders were entitled to put upon their lands a heap of refuse of this quality. If this had been the normal operation of the materials, which, without ignition were certain to give out noxious vapours, it would be quite unnecessary to prove negligence. The defenders might have been interdicted from making the erection at all. But it is said that the materials are only capable of creating damage under certain circumstances. The question thus arises, whether a man who conducts an operation on his own premises, lawful in itself, but which has a tendency to injure his neighbour, is liable for any injurious results, unless specific fault be alleged and proved.

found, none of the cases referred to is at variance with the conclusion which has been adopted.

"These views of the case, if sound, are sufficient; but there is another ground of liability which the Lord Ordinary has introduced as a separate ground of judgment. . . . . The Lord Ordinary has come to the conclusion that the defenders must be held to be in fault in not having used means calculated to extinguish the fire, and that the fault is such as renders them answerable for the consequences, so far as these have injured the pursuer."

Chalmers v. Dixon.

I think the answer to this is to be found in the distinction between the ordinary uses of property, to which a neighbour is bound to submit, although they may cause incidental injury to him, and the construction of an opus manufactum, the bringing an article upon the land which creates a hazard which did not exist before. That distinction enables us both to reconcile the decisions and to arrive at a satisfactory result in this case.

The present case is a strong illustration of the distinction. The material which caused damage was entirely foreign to the surface of the land.

Such opera manufacta are only lawful where injury does not happen to the neighbours. This was laid down very clearly in Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R., 3 E. and I. App., 330. The owner of a mill constructed a reservoir on his own land. The water found its way through disused passages of old mines into the mineral workings of a neighbour. Now, the construction of the reservoir in that case was a use of the subject lawful in itself, but it was not the ordinary use of the land. It was the creation of a hazard which did not exist before, and it was accordingly held that it was only lawful so long as the neighbour was not injured. The case of Kerr v. Earl of Orkney was very similar. It was held that the duty of a person who constructs a dam upon his land is not merely to use all precautions, but absolutely to prevent the water escaping to the injury of his neighbour.

A good deal has been said as to the necessity of proving culpa. I think that culpa does lie at the root of the matter. If a man puts upon his land a new combination of materials, which he knows, or ought to know, are of a dangerous nature, then either due care will prevent injury, in which case he is liable if injury occurs for not taking that due care, or else no precautions will prevent injury, in which case he is liable for his original act in placing the materials upon the ground.

The case of Mackintosh v. Mackintosh, 2 Macph. 1364, certainly contains some observations on the part of the Lord Justice-Clerk (the present Lord President) which appear to favour the defenders' contention. But these observations must be taken in relation to the case with which his Lordship was dealing. It was an entirely different case from the present. Muir-burning is an ordinary and necessary part of the administration of a Highland estate. The case, therefore, did not raise the question with which we have here to deal.

The case of Earl of Glasgow v. Tennent, 2 Macph. H. L., 22, simply came to this, that the substitution of a wall for a hedge by the defender was not proved to have occasioned the injury complained of.

Then, is it necessary that the danger should be known or anticipated? I think the man who brings new materials upon his land is bound to know the nature of these materials. It would be a strange result if the man who knew their nature was liable, while the man who did not know their nature was to escape liability in consequence of his ignorance.

As to damnum fatale, I think that defence was substantially surrendered in the argument, and, at all events, there is no foundation for it in the evidence.

If, therefore, I am right in holding it sufficient to establish liability against the defenders that this heap was constructed by them upon their ground, and kept there, that it did take fire, and continued to burn, and did damage to the pursuer, it is not necessary to prove specific fault. Fault is necessarily implied in the result, and it is unnecessary to go further.

But upon the facts I take a somewhat different view from the Lord Ordinary. I think that the defenders shewed the greatest possible disregard for the interests of others; and, accordingly, if I were called to decide the question of fault, I should have no hesitation in coming to a verdict that there was gross and culpable negligence on the part of the defenders.

In the first place, I am not satisfied that ignition took place spontaneously. That is merely a theory, ingeniously supported. I find that a very improper act was committed by the servants of the defenders. They put hot ashes on the top of the bing. I am not inclined to inquire narrowly into the result of this. All I know is that sometime after this act was committed the bing was found to be on fire. We are now asked to say that this was not the cause of the fire, from appearances presented on examination long afterwards. I do not attach much value to such evidence. It is said that when the defenders came to examine the bing in the early part of 1873 the crust was cooler than the interior, and, therefore, it is contended that the fire could not have been caused by external application. But in that wet season it was not wonderful that the outside should have cooled down. No experiments were made until four or five months after the fire was discovered.

Again, the defenders had no excuse for not taking steps to extinguish the fire when they learned its existence. This observation is all the stronger because on a former occasion the witness Turner says that he saw the bing fired by hot ashes, and succeeded in putting it out. If an attempt had been made to extinguish the fire when it was first discovered it is quite possible that it would have been successful. The defenders, who knew of the existence of fire in September 1872 at the latest, allowed it to burn on for several months without any attempt to put it out. In this they were all the more culpable, because the burning did no harm to the company. They were getting rid of refuse at the expense of their neighbours. When they chose to lie by and make no attempt to put out the fire I cannot read with much patience an attempt, on a purely scientific hypothesis, to shew that no efforts would have been availing.

The damages which the Lord Ordinary has awarded are moderate in the extreme. I think we should adhere in substance to his interlocutor.

LORD NEAVES concurred.

LORD ORMIDALE.—Questions have been raised in this case, not only of much importance, but also of difficulty and nicety. Neither is it easy, I think, to reconcile all the opinions and decisions bearing on the subject to which we have been referred. I have come, however, to be of opinion that the result at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived is right. But I am not prepared to say upon the proof whether this fire arose from spontaneous ignition, or was caused by the application of some external agency. Nor do I think that it is necessary for the pursuer to clear up this matter. One thing is clear, I think, that the fire cannot be held to have been of the nature of damnum fatale, which Lord Westbury defines in the case of Tennent v. Earl of Glasgow as the result of "circumstances which no human foresight can provide against, and of which human prudence is not bound to recognise the possibility, and which, when they do occur, are calamities that do not involve the obligation of paying for the consequences that may result from them." All that can be said for the defenders in regard to this point is that the season of 1872 was an unprecedentedly wet season; but an unusually wet season was expressly held in Kerr v. Earl of Chalmers v. Dixon.

Orkney not to be damnum fatale. Nor is it suggested that the fire was caused by the fault of any one not in the employment of William Dixon (Limited.)

But, whatever was the cause of the fire, it is enough for the disposal of the case that the defenders, in bringing up and storing upon the surface such an enormous mass of stuff as 200,000 tons from their mine, did an unusual and unnatural thing,—that is to say, they used the surface in an unusual and unnatural way, taking these expressions in the sense in which they were used by the Lord Chancellor in the case of Rylands v. Fletcher, cited at the debate. The defenders were no doubt quite entitled to take every ounce of mineral out of their lands and lay it down on the surface. There was nothing unlawful in their doing so, but it is quite a different question whether they were entitled to do so except at their own peril and risk, as regarded injurious consequences to their neighbours. It rather appears to me that they were not. I can hardly take it from the defenders, who have had great experience as iron-masters, and in the working of minerals, that they and their managers, or other head people, were ignorant of the nature of the materials they brought up and heaped in such a mass on the surface of their ground. On the evidence I think they must have known that that mass was composed, to some extent, of very inflammable and dangerous materials. But, supposing they were ignorant of this, that would not, in my opinion, afford them a valid excuse or defence in the present case. This, I think, clearly appears on the authority of the English case of Rylands v. Fletcher, as well as the case of Kerr v. Earl of Orkney in our own Court. In the former, which was ultimately decided in the House of Lords, it appears from the statement of the circumstances given by the Lord Chancellor that the defendants were not aware of the passages through which the water passed from their reservoir to the mineral workings of the plaintiff, and did the injury complained of. Indeed, that case in all its bearings and principles is remarkably similar to the present—only that there the damage was done underground by water, while here it was done above ground by fire. The argument for the defenders here is entirely met by the principles there laid down, both by the Lord Chancellor and Lord Cranworth. The latter said,—"If a person brings or accumulates on his land anything which, if it should escape, may cause damage to his neighbour, he does so at his peril. If it does escape, and cause damage, he is responsible, however careful he may have been, and whatever precautions he may have taken to prevent the damage. In considering whether a defendant is liable to a plaintiff for damage which the plaintiff may have sustained, the question in general is not whether the defendant has acted with due care and caution, but whether his acts have occasioned the damage. . . . For, when one person, in managing his own affairs causes, however innocently, damage to another, it is obviously only just that he should be the party to suffer. He is bound sic uti suo ut non lædat alienum. This is the principle of law applicable to cases like the present, and I do not discover in the authorities which were cited anything conflicting with it."

Such is the principle of liability laid down by the highest authority applicable as, I think, to cases such as that we are now dealing with, and it is on that principle, I think, the Lord Ordinary's judgment should be adhered to.

But if it had been necessary for the pursuer to have proved that there was culpa on the part of the defenders I think he has sufficiently done so. There was culpa on the part of the defenders in accumulating such a large inflammable mass on their land. They were at least bound to have laid down the material in such limited heaps and in such a way as that it would be always under their control; and it does not matter whether they knew of the damage or not. If they did not, there was culpa on their part in not taking the best advice that could be got on the subject. If they had taken such advice they would certainly have been told that there was some danger in what they did. There was culpa, again, on the part of the defenders in not using the utmost diligence in extinguishing the fire when it was first discovered. One of the witnesses, Turner, says that he saw smoke in July 1872; another witness says August; and, beyond all doubt, the fire was known to the defenders' manager to exist in the beginning of September. Yet no steps at all were taken for suppressing it till January 1873. It will not do for the defenders to adduce witnesses now to say that it was impossible to extinguish the fire, however early measures had been taken for that purpose; for it is impossible to say what might have been the result if proper measures had been taken at the outset.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion. It is not disputed that the pursuer has suffered considerable loss and damage from the smoke and fumes of the burning bing, and no complaint is made as to the amount at which the Lord Ordinary has assessed the damages, and the only question before us is whether the damage suffered by the pursuer is such damage that the defenders are liable to make it good. It was urged with much force for the defenders that culpa or fault is the only foundation of liability; and the defenders, it is said, are not chargeable with culpa or negligence of any kind, and therefore cannot be made liable for the loss sustained. On the other hand, the pursuer, on the authority of the class of cases like Rylands v. Fletcher, maintains that the defenders are liable without proof of actual negligence, and must make good the loss, even although the ignition of the bing were held to be a pure accident. In short, there is here a conflict between the two principles—first, that a person is entitled to use his property for any lawful purpose, even although such use should be injurious to his neighbour, and without being liable in damages; and second, this other principle, that a person must so use his property as not to injure his neighbour's property. The mode of reconciling or applying these two principles may be delicate, and there are often cases in which it is very difficult to draw the line. But I agree with your Lordship in the chair that the distinction between the two classes of cases lies in the kind of use which a person makes of his own property. I am not sure whether the terms "natural use" and "non-natural use" are very appropriate, but the meaning at all events is clear. Some uses to which land or property may be put are primary and ordinary purposes, while other uses, though perfectly legal, are exceptional or occasional, or require special erections upon or special preparation of the subject. The ordinary use of the subject, if it be land, is cultivation. If, for instance, in ploughing or draining his land, a person creates loss to his neighbour by throwing a greater quantity of water upon him, or by depriving him of water which otherwise would have reached him by percolation, the neighbour so prejudiced will have no claim of damages, because ploughing and draining in the usual manner are natural or primary uses of the land, of which the neighbour cannot complain. But, then, a proprietor may use his subjects quite lawfully for another class of purposes, which are called secondary or non-natural. He may make a reservoir of water, for instance, on his land—quite a lawful use. But in that case he is liable if the dam give way and cause injury to his neighbour, even though it be not possible to bring home negligence or fault in the ordinary sense.

Feb. 18, 1876. Chalmers v. Dixon.

I rather think, however, that culpa is at the foundation of liability. Culpa is a flexible term. Much lighter fault may make a person liable in some circumstances than in others. Much greater liability attaches to a person who is using his property not for primary purposes, but for secondary, though lawful purposes, and by which his neighbours may be exposed to risks of damage.

Another way of looking at the matter is the distinction between the case where there is no opus manufactum upon the land and the case where there is such. What was done by the defenders here certainly comes under the category of opus manufactum. A person making such a use of his property must take very extraordinary precautions to secure his neighbour against injury. It is certain that the defenders did not take sufficient precautions. I do not inquire whether the defenders knew that there was danger in their operations. It is proved that there was danger, although it may have been a remote danger. The party who creates an opus manufactum is bound to provide not only against what often happens, but against what very seldom happens. I cannot, indeed, take it off the hands of these iron-masters that they were ignorant of the chemical nature of the substance which they were bringing up from their pit and depositing in the heap or bing in question. I think they had sufficient knowledge of its properties, but even if they had not, this would not excuse them, and does not affect their liability.

In short, whether the liability of the defenders is maintained on the broad ground that a person who makes a non-natural use of his property is under an absolute obligation to secure the neighbouring proprietor or tenant against injury, or upon actual culpa, the result is the same. The defenders are liable for the damage created by the burning bing, which bing they knew or ought to have known was a source of possible danger. I think it is quite impossible to hold that the ignition of the bing, and the consequent injury to the neighbouring farmer, was a damnum fatale, or was the act of God, which will not found any action of reparation or damages.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Find that the defenders constructed on ground belonging to them a bing or heap of mineral refuse occupying about 2 acres of land and about 42 feet in height: Find that the material of which this bing was composed was of a combustible character, being to a considerable extent pyrites containing an admixture of sulphur: Find that in the course of the autumn of 1872, and not later than in September of that year, this bing took fire, and that the fire had not been extinguished when this action was raised in 1875: Find that the effect of this fire was to disengage certain noxious or injurious vapours, which inflicted serious damage on the farm occupied by the pursuer, and were productive of great discomfort to him and his family: Find that the liability of this bing to take fire was or ought to have been known to the defenders, and could have been easily ascertained by consulting any competent person: Find that no attempt was made by the defenders to put out the fire for several months after it was first discovered, and that when this was attempted it was found from the position of the fire and the size of the bing to be impossible: Find that, in these circumstances, the defenders are liable to the pursuer in the amount of damages so occasioned to him: Find that it is not disputed that £200 is a reasonable amount at which to assess the damages so incurred; and find the defenders liable to the pursuer in that sum, and decern against them therefor: Quoad ultra, in respect that the conclusion for interdict is not now insisted in by the pursuer, assoilzie the defenders from that conclusion of the summons, and decern: Find the defenders also liable to the pursuer in expenses, and remit to the Auditor to tax the same, and to report."

Lord Advocate v. Stow School Board.

Review—Board of Education—Education Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. cap. 62, sec. 28).—A school board resolved that it was necessary to provide additional school accommodation, and this resolution was confirmed by the Board of Education. Thereafter the school board resolved that in consequence of sufficient interim accommodation having been provided, the carrying out of the former resolution should be delayed. The school board having subsequently refused to comply with a requisition of the Board of Education to carry out their original resolution, the Court, on a petition and complaint at the instance of the Lord Advocate under sec. 36 of the Education Act, 1872, ordained the school board to comply with the requisition.

Observed, that the Court had no power to review the decision of the Board of Education as to the amount of school accommodation required, and that they would interpone their authority to the requisitions of the Board of Education unless it were shewn either that that board had never applied their minds to the resolutions of the school board, or that they had departed from the statutory procedure.

THIS was a petition and complaint by the Lord Advocate against the school board of Stow under the 36th section of the Education Act, 1872.*

On 28th October 1874 the school board resolved to provide additional school accommodation for the parish by erecting certain new buildings, and reported accordingly to the Board of Education, and on 23d December following the Board of Education intimated their approval, in terms of sec. 28 of the Act, of the above opinion and determination. On 9th April 1875 the school board came to the following resolution, which they intimated to the Board of Education:—"That Mrs Mitchell, having rented her school to the board, and there being in that and the parish school sufficient accommodation for all the children of the district, and looking to the high price of labour from the erecting of so many public schools, that the board delay in the meantime taking any further steps for the erection of new schools." The Board of Education replied that they could not acquiesce in this resolution. After some correspondence the Board of Education sent the school board a requisition requiring them to "perform the duty which they have failed to perform." The school board declined to comply, and this petition was then presented at the instance of the Lord Advocate. The prayer was,—"To ordain the respondents forthwith to comply with the terms of said requisition, and in compliance therewith forthwith to proceed with the erection upon said site of the necessary public school accommodation for said parish, in terms of the resolution made and adopted at the meeting held by the respondents, as aforesaid, on 28th October 1874, and approved of, as aforesaid, by the Board of Education; to find the respondents liable in the expenses of this application and subsequent procedure."

* 35 and 36 Vict. c. 62, sec. 36. . . . "If at any time the said board (i.e., the Board of Education) are satisfied that a school board of a parish or burgh have failed to maintain and keep efficient any school provided by them, or to provide such additional school accommodation as in the opinion of the board is necessary to supply a sufficient amount of public school accommodation in the parish or burgh, the said board may send them a requisition requiring them to fulfil the duty which they have so failed to perform; and the school board shall comply with the said requisition without undue delay; and if they fail, may be summarily compelled to do so by the Court of Session, on a petition and complaint at the instance of the Lord Advocate."

Answers were lodged for the school board. They stated that after the resolution of 28th October and its confirmation by the board the circumstances had undergone a material change, owing to Mrs Mitchell of Stow, a heritor, having given up her private school to the board at a nominal rent, and owing to the enhanced price of labour. They stated further,—"The present proceeding has been adopted under section 36 of the Education Act, but it is submitted that it is inapplicable to the circumstances of the present case. The respondents have not failed to provide a sufficient amount of public school accommodation in the parish. They have expressed their willingness and taken steps to provide additional school accommodation, and have stated distinctly how they propose to attain their object. Their proposal to provide sufficient school accommodation in terms of the said reports appears to them to be reasonable, and would now have been carried into effect if the Board of Education had approved and had not insisted on adhering to their decision."

Messrs Frier and Brydon, a minority of the school board, lodged a minute concurring in the prayer of the petition.

Lord President.—The question we have to decide is a very clear one. The 27th section of the Act of Parliament provides that the first duty of the school board when they come into office is to ascertain and take into consideration the educational requirements of the parish, and if they find that there is an insufficiency of school accommodation, then they are to come to a resolution as to what is necessary to supply the deficiency, and when they have done so, they are to submit that resolution to the Board of Education for their approval. The Board of Education may approve or disapprove of it, or they may approve of it with qualifications and additions; or, if the school board does not do its duty in coming to a resolution upon the subject, the Board of Education may do it for them, and may require them to make such additions to the school accommodation of the parish as the circumstances seem to require; but in all these cases it is quite apparent, from the clauses of the statute that have been cited to us, that the ultimate judgment upon what is necessary for the accommodation of the parish rests with the Board of Education. It is a statutory board created for that among other purposes—nay, that appears to me to be the chief purpose for which it is created. Now, keeping this in view, let us consider the effect of the 36th section of the statute:—"If at any time the Board of Education are satisfied that a school board of a parish have failed to maintain and keep efficient any school provided by them, or to provide such additional school accommodation as in the opinion of the board is necessary to supply a sufficient amount of public school accommodation in the parish or burgh, the said board may send them a requisition requiring them to fulfil the duty which they have so failed to perform; and the school board shall comply with the said requisition without undue delay, and, if they fail, may be summarily compelled to do so by the Court of Session on a petition and complaint at the instance of the Lord Advocate." It is under that section that this petition and complaint is before us, and let us see what are the conditions upon which such a petition and complaint must rest.

The school board must report, and the Board of Education must be satisfied that there is a defect in the accommodation, and the school board must fail to provide the necessary additional accommodation, and a requisition must be made upon the school board by the Board of Education to go on and perform their duty; and if these things have all taken place, then there is sufficient ground for petition and complaint to this Court, and it seems to me that if these requirements of the statute are all fulfilled we have no choice but to grant the order that is asked for.

Now, what are the circumstances of this case? There has been, I do not say an attempt to misrepresent the matter in any way, but there has been an attempt to confuse it by reference to a variety of correspondence with which we have nothing whatever to do. The resolution of the school board with regard to the provision of additional accommodation is contained in their minute of the 28th October 1874, and the resolution is in these terms:—"That the site approved of by Sir Alexander Grant, and sanctioned or agreed to be given by Mrs Mitchell of Stow, for the erection of said new school buildings, be agreed to by this meeting, and that steps be taken for the erection of school buildings with all convenient speed." Then further:—"The meeting took up the plan already in hand received from Messrs Herbertson, Galashiels, together with their probable estimate of the expense to be incurred in erecting such a school as would accommodate 200 scholars; they also took up plan and probable estimate for new teacher's house, and agreed that the said plans and probable estimates be forwarded by the clerk to the Board of Education for suggestions and approval," and they appointed a committee to measure off the ground for the site. The Board of Education appear to have required answers to certain questions before proceeding to consider this resolution of the school board; and accordingly Mr Walker, the clerk to the school board, wrote to the secretary of the Board of Education, intimating the answers which the school board gave to the different questions; and among other things he said the "proposed new school would accommodate 200, in regard to which there are improved plans presently in the hands of Mrs Mitchell of Stow, which will afterwards be submitted to the board if wished for." Now, it is with the material so furnished by the school board that the Board of Education deal in their resolution of 23d December 1874. They considered the report dated 23d July 1873 and 29th October 1874, transmitted by the school board of the parish in terms of section 27 of the Education Act, along with other documents. The minute further bears that "the school board report as their opinion that the educational requirements of the parish exceed the provisions for supplying the same, and that their determination to provide additional school accommodation is as follows—(a) To erect at Stow, on a site to be given by Mrs Mitchell of Stow, and approved of by Sir Alexander Grant, a school capable of accommodating 200 pupils and teacher's dwelling-house; and (b) to dispose of the existing public school and teacher's dwelling-house." The Board of Education, in terms of section 28 of the Act, approved of the above opinion and determination, and authorised the school board to act upon and carry the same into effect forthwith. Certainly that is quite in accordance with the provisions of the statute. There is a distinct resolution by the school board, and a clear and distinct confirmation of that by the Board of Education. The statute says that when that has taken place the school board must go on forthwith to carry the plan into execution. It has been suggested that after the confirmation of such a resolution circumstances might so alter as to render it inexpedient or improper to proceed in terms of the confirmed resolution. I can quite understand the possibility of that. It is needless to suppose cases; but undoubtedly such a case might arise, and if so, I apprehend it would be the duty of the school board to reconsider the matter, and to submit the resolution that they might form upon such reconsideration to the Board of Education for their approval, by whom the same would be either confirmed or rejected. But is there any case of that kind here? Nothing in the least degree like it. What takes place after this confirmation of the school board's resolution is this, that on the 9th day of April 1875 there is a meeting of the school board, and the minute of meeting bears "that the board having agreed to rent Mrs Mitchell's school for a time for temporary accommodation, with the view of having ultimately both schools merged into one, and having formerly intimated to the Board of Education their determination to erect a school to accommodate 200 pupils, they now further determine to enlarge the plans to provide accommodation for 226 pupils, which they find will be ample enough for the district, and instruct the clerk to report accordingly to the board in Edinburgh, and request their consent to the same." Now, there is nothing in that which can be said to go back on the previous resolution. It is merely an extension of accommodation beyond that already resolved on and confirmed which is intended to be provided by the school board. But then this resolution was also submitted to the meeting and carried—"That Mrs Mitchell having rented her school to the board, and there being in that and the parish school sufficient accommodation for all the children of the district, and looking to the high price of labour from the erecting of so many public schools, that the board delay in the meantime taking any further steps for the erection of new schools." It seems to me that this resolution is simply in the face of the statute, which says that after a resolution providing additional accommodation has been carried and confirmed by the Board of Education the school board shall go on without delay to carry it into execution, and this resolution is that they shall not do so. Was that a resolution they could expect the Board of Education to consider or to give effect to? The Board of Education were bound to reject, after consideration, such a resolution as that, because it was against the statute. It was a resolution in violation of the duty of the school board as prescribed by the statute, and accordingly they are told repeatedly by the Board of Education that it was impossible to sanction the delay—that they cannot do so consistently with their duty. The rest of the correspondence, except in so far as it is a repetition of that, seems to me to have nothing to do with the question before us. Then the Board of Education, at last finding that the school board adhered to their resolution for indefinite delay, issued a requisition upon them in terms of the statute. It is printed in the papers before us, and seems to me to be in the proper form under the statute. That requisition has not been attended to by the school board, and it now falls upon us to order them to proceed in terms of the statute, and carry out their resolution of 29th October 1874.

ship has done that so fully that I need hardly say more than that I entirely concur.

The first question is, what power have we to interfere? Looking to the terms of the Education Act, 1872, and particularly to those of the 28th and 36th sections, it appears to me that we have no power to interfere with the action of the Board of Education in a matter of the kind now in dispute, except in two cases—first, if it were plain that the board had refused or failed to apply their minds to the question of school accommodation in the particular parish, so as to come to an intelligent resolution on the subject, we might interfere to correct that abuse; or second, if the board had gone contrary to or outwith the statute, we might, in that case, also interfere to set them right.

But, first, it is plain that the board did apply their minds to the question what amount of school accommodation was required in the parish, and took reasonable means to satisfy themselves on the subject before coming to a final resolution in regard to it. Latterly, they sent Sir Alexander Grant, a member of the board, to visit the locality and make what inquiries he thought necessary. His written report, it is true, contains merely the conclusions he had arrived at, but no doubt verbal explanations of his reasons were at the command of all his colleagues.

Second, it is equally plain that the Board of Education did not exceed the powers conferred on them by the statute, which expressly authorises them to make such a requisition as they actually made. The discretionary power of judging what extent of school accommodation is required is vested in the board and not in us. If the opinion of the school board be right, and that of the Board of Education wrong, that is no fault of ours. No bad faith is or can be alleged. It is a difference of opinion merely, and of that matter of opinion the statute has made the Board of Education the judges.

It is true the Board of Education cannot enforce their own resolution. But that is simply because they have no judicial authority. The Courts of law are alone vested with the power of the sword. The Board of Education must come, through the Lord Advocate, to the Court of Session for compulsory powers, but the merits of the question are not submitted to us, and the procedure being all right and regular, the only thing we can do is, in substance, to interpone our authority by granting the prayer of this petition.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—We are asked in this petition to interpone our authority to enforce the statutory requisition by the Board of Education, and to ordain the respondents to proceed with the necessary school accommodation. I do not say that we are bound to grant the prayer of the petition if the Board of Education has so far departed from the procedure laid down by the statute as to exclude their demand for a statutory remedy, or if they have refused the plain duty of considering any proposal made to them by the school board.

Now, this particular case is presented to us in two forms, one which seems more prominent in the proceedings, and the other which was chiefly argued at the bar. In the first place, the respondents urge that the Lord Advocate's demand for the compulsitor which the Court can give should be refused. They ask on the merits the sanction of the Court to resist the requisition of the Board of Education. That is a proposal to which we could not accede. But at the bar they have dexterously put a different case. They say that the Board of Education never considered the change of circumstances. But the respondents ship has done that so fully that I need hardly say more than that I entirely concur.

The first question is, what power have we to interfere? Looking to the terms of the Education Act, 1872, and particularly to those of the 28th and 36th sections, it appears to me that we have no power to interfere with the action of the Board of Education in a matter of the kind now in dispute, except in two cases—first, if it were plain that the board had refused or failed to apply their minds to the question of school accommodation in the particular parish, so as to come to an intelligent resolution on the subject, we might interfere to correct that abuse; or second, if the board had gone contrary to or outwith the statute, we might, in that case, also interfere to set them right.

But, first, it is plain that the board did apply their minds to the question what amount of school accommodation was required in the parish, and took reasonable means to satisfy themselves on the subject before coming to a final resolution in regard to it. Latterly, they sent Sir Alexander Grant, a member of the board, to visit the locality and make what inquiries he thought necessary. His written report, it is true, contains merely the conclusions he had arrived at, but no doubt verbal explanations of his reasons were at the command of all his colleagues.

Second, it is equally plain that the Board of Education did not exceed the powers conferred on them by the statute, which expressly authorises them to make such a requisition as they actually made. The discretionary power of judging what extent of school accommodation is required is vested in the board and not in us. If the opinion of the school board be right, and that of the Board of Education wrong, that is no fault of ours. No bad faith is or can be alleged. It is a difference of opinion merely, and of that matter of opinion the statute has made the Board of Education the judges.

It is true the Board of Education cannot enforce their own resolution. But that is simply because they have no judicial authority. The Courts of law are alone vested with the power of the sword. The Board of Education must come, through the Lord Advocate, to the Court of Session for compulsory powers, but the merits of the question are not submitted to us, and the procedure being all right and regular, the only thing we can do is, in substance, to interpone our authority by granting the prayer of this petition.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—We are asked in this petition to interpone our authority to enforce the statutory requisition by the Board of Education, and to ordain the respondents to proceed with the necessary school accommodation. I do not say that we are bound to grant the prayer of the petition if the Board of Education has so far departed from the procedure laid down by the statute as to exclude their demand for a statutory remedy, or if they have refused the plain duty of considering any proposal made to them by the school board.

Now, this particular case is presented to us in two forms, one which seems more prominent in the proceedings, and the other which was chiefly argued at the bar. In the first place, the respondents urge that the Lord Advocate's demand for the compulsitor which the Court can give should be refused. They ask on the merits the sanction of the Court to resist the requisition of the Board of Education. That is a proposal to which we could not accede. But at the bar they have dexterously put a different case. They say that the Board of Education never considered the change of circumstances. But the respondents never asked them to consider that change, and they do not ask such consideration now, on the only footing permitted by the statute. It is always by the opinion of the Board of Education that this matter must be decided.

LORD MURE.—I concur with your Lordship. The duty imposed upon the Court by the 36th section of the statute is one of limited discretion, so limited as to amount, in the ordinary case, to little more than an executorial duty, because the statute has given the Board of Education full powers of settling what the school accommodation is to be. If, therefore, the procedure has in this respect been regular, and the school board refuses to comply with a requisition made upon them by the Board of Education, and that board comes here under the 36th section asking this Court to enforce their requisition, we are, I think, bound to do so. In the present case all the proceedings appear to have been regularly gone about under the 28th section, and I agree, therefore, in thinking that the requisition ought to be enforced. But I think it right to observe that under the 36th section there appears to me to be a certain amount of discretion left to this Court in disposing of such applications. "May be" compelled are the words of the clause. So that if, after a resolution of a school board has been confirmed by the Board of Education, a total change of circumstances were to arise relative to the school accommodation requirements of a parish, and the school board were in consequence, and in order to meet that change, to make a fresh proposal, which the Board of Education refused to entertain, I should be disposed to say that this Court might refuse to interfere and enforce the requisition until the Board of Education had duly considered and dealt with the new proposal. That, however, is not the state of matters under which the present application is made, and on that point I reserve my opinion.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Decern against the respondents in terms of the prayer of the said petition and complaint: Find the respondents liable in expenses," &c.

Company—Voluntary Winding up—Extraordinary Resolution—Companies Act, 1862, secs. 51 and 129.—The Companies Act of 1862, sec. 129, authorises the winding up of a company voluntarily "(2) whenever the company has passed a special resolution requiring the company to be wound up voluntarily"—(by the Act no resolution could be deemed special until it had been carried at two successive meetings of the company); "(3) whenever the company has passed an extraordinary resolution to the effect that it has been proved to their satisfaction that the company cannot by reason of its liabilities continue its business, and that it is advisable to wind up the same." The Act requires both special and extraordinary resolutions to be preceded by a notice "specifying the intention to propose such resolution."

A company, by circular, gave notice to its shareholders that an extraordinary meeting would be held "to consider, and, if approved of, to sanction the voluntary winding up of the company." The notice also contained this statement—"The directors enclose a balance-sheet of the company's affairs, prepared by the auditor to this date. From the result of that balance, shewing a deficiency of £3898, 3s. 9½d., it will be apparent that it is hopeless to carry on the company with any prospect of success." In an application by the liquidator to have a creditor restrained from doing diligence against the company, held that the resolution was invalid, in respect that the notice did not shew that it was intended to propose an extraordinary resolution under sub-sec. Feb. 19, 1876. Wilson v. M'Genn & Co.

THIS petition was presented in name of John Wilson, designing himself liquidator of the "Glasgow and District Co-operative Society (Limited)," against M'Genn and Company, creditors of the company, praying the Court to order the respondents to desist from following out an action of forthcoming against the company, or other diligence.

The respondents in their answers maintained that the resolution to wind up the company voluntarily, which had been adopted at a meeting of the company on 3d May 1875, was invalid, and that the appointment of the petitioner as liquidator was null and void, in respect that the notice of the resolution and the resolution itself, were not in accordance with the provisions of the Companies Act, 1862, sec. 129, sub-sec. 3.

The circular issued to the members of the company calling the meeting of 3d May 1875 was as follows:—"Notice is hereby given, that an extraordinary meeting of the shareholders in this company will be held in the Religious Institution Rooms, upon Monday the 3d of May 1875, at two o'clock P.M., to consider, and, if approved of, to sanction the voluntary winding up of the company. The directors enclose a balance-sheet of the company's affairs, prepared by the auditor to this date. From the results of that balance, shewing a deficiency of £3898, 3s. 9½d.,* it will be apparent that it is hopeless to carry on the company with any prospect of success, and that the directors are not warranted in asking the shareholders to advance any further sums by subscribing to the bonds, as proposed in a previous circular. JOHN BAILLIE, Secy.—Glasgow, 26th April 1875."

At the meeting of 3d May 1875 this resolution was carried unanimously:—"It having been proved to the satisfaction of this meeting that the company cannot, by reason of its liabilities, continue its business, resolve that it is advisable that the company be wound up, and this meeting requires the company to be wound up voluntarily accordingly."

The petitioner was then appointed liquidator.

The respondents contended;—The resolution to wind up the company voluntarily was intended to be an extraordinary resolution in terms of the third head of section 129 of the Companies Act, 1862.† Now, an ex-

* The balance-sheet brought out this deficit by debiting the company with the whole amount of its capital, viz., £5000. The company's liabilities other than to capital were only £2565, 13s. 9½d., while its assets were £3667, 10s. Though, therefore, a large portion of its capital was lost, the company was not insolvent in the sense of being unable to pay its creditors in full.

† Sec. 129 enacts—"A company under this Act may be wound up voluntarily—(1) Whenever the period, if any, fixed for the duration of the company by the articles of association expires, or whenever the event, if any, occurs, upon the occurrence of which it is provided by the articles of association that the company is to be dissolved, and the company in general meeting has passed a resolution requiring the company to be wound up voluntarily; (2) whenever the company has passed a special resolution requiring the company to be wound up voluntarily; (3) whenever the company has passed an extraordinary resolution to the effect that it has been proved to their satisfaction that the company cannot by reason of its liabilities continue its business, and that it is advisable to wind up the same: For the purposes of this Act, a resolution shall be deemed traordinary resolution must be passed "in such manner as would, if it had been confirmed by a subsequent meeting, have constituted a special resolution" as defined in the 51st section. But the 51st section* required among other things that notice of the meeting "specifying the intention to propose such resolution" should have been duly given. Now, the notice of the meeting of 3d May 1875 sent to the members specified as its object—"To consider, and, if approved of, to sanction the voluntary winding up of the company." That, if anything, was a notice of intention to proceed under the second head of section 129 by way of special resolution, and not under the third head by way of extraordinary resolution. Any member of the company receiving that notice was entitled to expect that a second meeting would be held to confirm any resolution to wind up the company passed at the meeting called by it, and that an opportunity of reconsidering the matter would be afforded to the members. To proceed by extraordinary resolution upon that notice at the meeting of 3d May was therefore incompetent, and the resolution passed was invalid and the petitioner's appointment as liquidator null and void.[1]

Argued for the petitioner;—The Act prescribed no exact form of circular which was to be followed in calling a meeting to pass an extraordinary resolution under the 3d head of sec. 129. It was sufficient that it should appear from the circular what was to be the "general nature" of the business to be transacted.[2] In England the appointment of a liquidator at a meeting, in calling which no notice that such an appointment was proposed to be made, had been sustained, which shewed that the statute was to be read leniently.[3] This case was different from the Bridport Brewery case, relied on by the respondents. The information given in the circular and balance-sheet clearly drew the attention of the members to the facts, and the probability of an extraordinary resolution being passed. The Bridport case had been commented on in England as going as far as it was advisable in the direction of strictness in construing notices.[4]

M'Genn and Company, creditors of the company, from following out an action of furthcoming. No objection has been stated to the competency in ordinary circumstances of such a petition. But the respondents meet it with a serious and important objection to the title of the liquidator. They say the company has not been validly put in liquidation at all.

The ground of the objection is that the resolution to wind up the company, dated 3d May 1875, was invalid. This resolution was passed under the 3d sub-section of the 129th section of the Companies Act, 1862. Under that section there are just three cases in which a company can be wound up voluntarily. The first case is when the company comes to an end in terms of the articles of association. The second is, when the company has passed a special resolution for winding up, and the third is where the company has passed an extraordinary resolution to certain effects. The difference between the second and third case is very important. In the second case a company may be wound up voluntarily "whenever the company has passed a special resolution requiring the company to be wound up voluntarily." Now, according to the 51st section of the Act, in order that a resolution should be a special resolution, it must be carried by a majority of three-fourths of the members of the company present at a general meeting "of which notice specifying the intention to propose such resolution has been duly given," and it must also be confirmed by a majority of the members present at a subsequent general meeting of which notice has been duly given, held at an interval of not less than a fortnight, and not more than one month. Therefore a resolution to wind up under the second head of section 129 cannot be effectual unless it is carried by a three-fourths majority at one meeting, and confirmed by a majority at a second meeting, and unless proper notice of the intention to propose the resolution has been previously given.

In the third case, a company may be wound up voluntarily "whenever the company has passed an extraordinary resolution to the effect that it has been proved to their satisfaction that the company cannot, by reason of its liabilities, continue its business, and that it is advisable to wind up the same." And it is farther enacted, that "any resolution shall be deemed to be extraordinary which is passed in such a manner as would, if it had been confirmed by a subsequent meeting, have constituted a special resolution as hereinbefore (i.e., in the 51st section) defined."

Now, this is the case with which we have to deal. The difference between it and a winding up under the second head of the 129th section is that the resolution, if carried by a three-fourths majority at a general meeting called for the purpose, does not need confirmation at a subsequent meeting, but then the resolution must be to the effect that it has been proved to the satisfaction of the meeting that the company cannot, by reason of its liabilities, continue its business. It is not enough that the meeting resolve that the company be wound up voluntarily. That is the way of proceeding under the second head. The meeting must positively affirm that it has been proved to its satisfaction that the company cannot, by reason of its liabilities, continue its business, and that it is advisable to wind up the same.

Now, the resolution which was passed in the present case at the meeting held on 3d May last was quite unobjectionable in its terms. The precise words of the 3d sub-section of the 129th section are not indeed used, but the terms are quite as near them as is at all necessary. So far, therefore, no valid objection lies to the proceedings. But then it is urged that no notice was given to the shareholders prior to the meeting of any intention to propose such resolution, and there can be no doubt that such resolution requires notice and very distinct notice of the intention to propose it. Notice "specifying the intention to propose such resolution" is by the 51st section required in the case of a special resolution, and an extraordinary resolution requires the same particulars of procedure, excepting only the subsequent meeting for confirmation. Everything, therefore, depends on the terms of the notice given. Now, the terms of the notice were these:—"To consider, and, if approved of, to sanction the voluntary winding up of the company." Now, stopping there, it appears to me that that is just such a notice as would be required for proceeding under the second head of the 129th section. And if that is so, then it is clear that the resolution carried at the meeting of 3d May was worth nothing unless confirmed at a subsequent meeting. What follows is not a notice of a resolution to be proposed at all, but merely information afforded to the shareholders who are called to attend the meeting. It is as follows:—"The directors enclose a balance-sheet of the company's affairs, prepared by the auditor to this date. From the result of that balance, shewing a deficiency of £3898, 3s. 9½d., it will be apparent that it is hopeless to carry on the company with any prospect of success, and that the directors are not warranted in asking the shareholders to advance any further sums by subscribing to the bonds, as proposed in a previous circular."

Now, that reference to a previous circular is a reference to a proposal that the shareholders should subscribe some additional capital. That was a matter which had no bearing upon the proposal to wind up the company, nor has it upon the present question. The essential information given to the shareholders was that the balance-sheet shewed a deficiency of £3898, and that the affairs of the company were in a hopelessly bad condition. That is, however, somewhat ambiguous and misleading information. No doubt the balance-sheet does shew a deficiency of £3898, but that is brought out after debiting the company with its whole capital of £5000. That, then, is all the information given to the shareholders who are invited to attend the meeting. The only resolution of which notice is given is a resolution to wind up voluntarily. But then we are told that it is submitted to the shareholders as a reason for so doing that it is impossible to carry on the company with any prospect of success, and that that makes the notice equivalent to a notice that it is intended to proceed under the third head of the 129th section. Now, is that notice, even taken as a whole, a notice of a resolution to be proposed to the meeting "to the effect that it has been proved to their satisfaction that the company cannot, by reason of its liabilities, continue its business, and that it is advisable to wind up the same?" It does not appear to me that it is, or that it in any way answers the requirements of the statute. I think that a shareholder receiving that notice was quite entitled to suppose that the resolution intended to be proposed to the meeting was one for winding up under the second head of the 129th section, and that therefore a second meeting to confirm such resolution was required.

Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that the resolution to wind up is invalid, and the petitioner's appointment consequently null.

Lord Deas, Lord Ardmillan, and Lord Mure concurred.

This interlocutor was pronounced:—"Sustain the objection stated for the respondents to the title of the petitioner, dismiss the petition, and decern: Find the respondents entitled to expenses, and decern."

THE ACCOUNTANT OF COURT, Reporter. No. 80.
LAUCHLAN M'KINNON (Grainger's Curator), Compearer.—Asher.

Feb. 23, 1876.

Curator Bonis—Investment on Security of Rates—Trust.—Investments by a curator bonis secured respectively either (1) on rates leviable under the Aberdeen County and Municipal Buildings Act, 1866, and the Sheriff Court Houses Act, 1860, or (2) on rates leviable under the Aberdeenshire Road Act, 1865, approved of.

Grainger's Curator.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Rutherfurd Clark. B.

LAUCHLAN M'KINNON, curator bonis to George Alexander Grainger, invested a sum of £4500 belonging to the ward on mortgages by the commissioners under the Aberdeen County and Municipal Buildings Act, 1866, and the Sheriff Court Houses Act, 1860. The whole sum borrowed by the commissioners was £15,852, 4s. 8d., and they proposed to pay off this sum by an assessment of one-sixth of a penny per pound in each year in the course of thirty years. In 1875 the buildings had been completed for about six years, and about £4000 had been paid off. The rate of assessment authorised by the Acts was unlimited.

The curator invested another sum of £6500 belonging to the estate of the ward by lending it to the Aberdeen Road Trustees under the Aberdeenshire Road Act, 1865. The turnpike road debt amounted at the passing of the Act to £43,000, the whole of which sum was borrowed and the debt paid off. The borrowed money remaining due in 1875 amounted to £28,600, so that the debt had been reduced by £14,400. By sections 46 and 83 of the Act the trustees were empowered to borrow money to pay off the debt, and to assign in security for payment of it the assessment authorised to be levied under the Act, and to grant mortgages for the sums borrowed. By section 47 the money so borrowed was to be applied to the payment of the debt, and to no other purpose whatever. The annual assessment for payment of interest of the debt exceeded £3000 considerably. For the year ended Whitsunday 1875 it amounted to £3,364, 15s. 4d. By section 82, the assessment was recoverable in the same way as the land tax and assessed taxes were.

The rate of interest in both investments was 4 per cent.

The estate of the ward amounted to about £20,000.

The Accountant of Court in his report (dated 12th January 1876) required the curator to realise these investments, but, at the desire of the curator, requested instructions from the Lord Ordinary. The report, while stating the Accountant's opinion that the securities were unexceptionable, bore:—"The investment of funds under judicial management is not regulated by statute, and no special authority, as regards investments, is conferred by the Pupils Protection Act, other than that specified in the 13th section thereof, which is somewhat general in its terms. But by the decisions of the Court the general rule has been held to be, that judicial factors appointed under the Pupils Protection Act can only invest the money of their wards in (1) consols or other national funds; (2) heritable securities; (3) deposits, or operating accounts, with one of the chartered banks in Scotland. . . . .

"The Lord Ordinary will observe that, though it may be very desirable that greater latitude should be given for the investment of funds under judicial management, it is essential for the guidance of factors, and of the Accountant of Court, that the power of investment shall be regulated by fixed and clearly defined rules. The securities taken by the factor in this case are of a class that is now numerous in Scotland, and if they are sanctioned by the Court, the probable effect may be, that a large amount of funds now and in past years invested in consols, on heritable securities, or in bank at a low rate of interest, will be transferred to such trust mortgages as have been taken in this factory, as the greater facilities of investing, and the higher rate of interest that can be obtained on the latter, will always form strong inducements for such transfer."

The Lord Ordinary reported the case verbally to the Court.

The curator argued;—There is no decision limiting the class of securities which a curator was entitled to take. Even if the Court had in former times made such a rule, it did not apply to modern times, when there was more difficulty in getting heritable securities.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—If there were any statutory rule, or any absolute rule founded upon decisions of this Court, that money under factorial management could be invested only on heritable security or in Government stocks, or in bank deposits, I am afraid we could not, in accordance with such rule, sanction the investments made by the curator bonis in the present case. But there is no such rule; and while the Court have in former times been in the habit of limiting factorial investments to the classes of securities I have mentioned, they have never laid down any rule that they will sanction no other kind of security. But, even if the Court had done so, I should not have been willing to be bound by their decision, for, although it may have been expedient at one time to lay down such a rule, it may be inexpedient at another time. We know that investments in Government stocks are not convenient investments for trust-funds, and that heritable securities cannot always be obtained, the demand for them exceeding the supply. Persons who are bound to invest only in heritable security are thus frequently compelled to leave large sums of money uninvested in bank. Now, in that state of the market for securities, it comes to be a very important question whether we should refuse to allow a curator to invest money upon a security which is demonstrated to be at least as good as a first class heritable security, seeing that he can get the one kind of security but not the other. All considerations of expediency and convenience certainly point one way, and I confess I am but little disposed to resist an argument founded on them, in a matter in which the Court are entitled to exercise their discretion

Now, what are the facts actually before us? In the first place, the curator bonis has invested the sum of £4500 on the security of certain assessments leviable by the Aberdeen County and Municipal Buildings Commissioners, as commissioners under the Sheriff Court Houses Act of 1860. This, which I understand to be a public statute, empowers the commissioners to levy an assessment by means of which the whole of the money borrowed by them will ultimately be paid off. The money originally borrowed was £15,852, but upwards of £4000 have already been paid off by means of the assessment. The assessment is a very light one, viz., at the low rate of one-sixth of a penny per pound, but it yields an annual sum more than sufficient to pay the interest of the debt still outstanding, and will at length pay off the whole debt. Now, I cannot say that that is not equal to the very best heritable security that can be had.

Grainger's Curator.

It is perfectly clear that the commissioners will do their duty, and as public trustees they may be compelled to do it. It is, however, needless to speculate on the means of preventing a failure in duty, as that is obviously not within the scope of probability. As regards this loan of £4500, I may say, therefore, that it seems to be as well secured as money can be, while it yields a return of four per cent, quite as much as heritable securities.

As regards the other investment, viz., of £6500 on the security of the assessments under the Aberdeenshire Road Act of 1865, it stands in a somewhat different position, as that is not a public but a local Act. But that does not affect the nature of the security. A considerable part of the sum originally borrowed has been paid off, the trustees are empowered to levy rates, and these rates are assigned in security of the debt. This investment, therefore, seems to me to be in substantially the same position as the other one to which I have adverted.

I purposely confine myself to saying that these are exceptionally good securities, which the curator was justified in taking; for it is very difficult to lay down any general rule or principle. All, therefore, that I can say is, that where, by virtue of Act of Parliament, such securities as those now in question are obtainable, they are as eligible as heritable securities, and may safely be taken by a curator bonis.

LORD DEAS.—This appears to me to be one of the most important general questions that have occurred for a long time. It is obvious that any unreasonable limitation of the kind of securities that may be lawfully accepted or continued to be held by curators for lunatics or persons under age, or by judicial factors, must be highly detrimental, and in some cases ruinous to the parties beneficially interested. Three kinds of securities have been specified as alone proper to be judicially sanctioned, viz. investments in the public funds, deposits in banks, and heritable securities. But it appears to me that it is quite out of the question to hold that there can be any absolute and permanent rule on such a matter, which must necessarily be affected, from time to time, by the changing and progressive state of the country, and the development of its monetary, agricultural, and commercial concerns. I agree, therefore, in what I understand to be the view taken by your Lordship, that although the Judges of this Court may occasionally have recognised some such rule for the time being, we cannot be bound to adhere to it in the altered circumstances of the present day.

There is no Act of Parliament on the subject, and no principle involved, except that we ought always to look to the permanent benefit of the ward. In so far as practice is concerned, the object has been to give effect to that principle, not to fix a hard and fast line which may have the very opposite effect. That the capital shall not be lost may be conceded to be one of the most important considerations involved. But the loss of the appropriate income, especially when it is required for the pressing purposes or necessities of the ward, is a sacrifice not to be made wherever it can be avoided, if the capital be reasonably secure. The three specified modes of investment may be held to give reasonable, but they cannot be said to give absolute, security for the capital. The public funds have at many periods fluctuated largely, and when realisation becomes necessary it has been nothing unusual to find the capital so invested largely diminished. And although failure ultimately to recover bank deposits in full may be a rare and improbable occurrence in Scotland, it is not rare to find such deposits yielding a mere pittance of interest, and sometimes (although exceptionally) none at all. Heritable securities have often turned out inadequate from diminution in the value of the subjects, or totally ineffectual from some flaw in the title. Besides, as we all know, the extraordinary increase of capital in this country seeking investment has rendered it all but impracticable to obtain first-class heritable security for sums of no great amount, and which the lenders cannot guarantee to remain uncalled up for a period of years, as the great life insurance companies do, and who thereby obtain a virtual monopoly of that class of securities.

I am satisfied that since I sat on this bench cases have from time to time been disposed of on the footing that there was no absolute rule on the subject, although, being circumstantial, they may have not been reported; and in this I am borne out by the opinion of the last Law Commissioners (comprehending among them experienced and eminent lawyers), to the effect that the Court was not limited by any fixed rule, but might act in the matter as seemed most expedient. That is precisely the view which I take of the question. It is entirely one of expediency, and wherever that is the nature of the question, the course to be sanctioned must necessarily vary with the circumstances. An inflexible rule would be most inexpedient. The father of a family may have invested his funds in such a way as his experience has suggested as most likely to be beneficial to his family; and, on the footing of his investments yielding a certain annual income, he may have left to his widow a specified proportion of that income, and directed the rest to be applied for the maintenance and education of his numerous young children, equally among them, till they attain majority. Now, if by a dispensation of Providence one of the family becomes a lunatic, and is placed under curatory, or if the trustees appointed by the father decline to accept, and a judicial factor is appointed, surely it is the reverse of expedient to hold that the whole investments must be immediately realised, and the proceeds invested either in the public funds, or on heritable security, or deposited in bank, although the result may be that the income is no longer adequate to support the widow and maintain and educate the children, or even to keep them out of absolute poverty. As your Lordship has observed, investments in the public funds are often highly inconvenient. They can only be held in an individual name, and they are thus open to be attached by the bona fide creditors of the individual. Then, good heritable security is, as I have said, difficult to get, and attended with trouble and responsibility in the selection. The consequence is, that a large amount of money held by judicial factors and curators is allowed to lie in bank, to the great loss and disadvantage of the wards.

As regards the particular securities now in dispute, the Accountant of Court reports that he is satisfied they are in themselves unexceptionable, and his only reason for directing them to be called up is that the Court has not hitherto sanctioned securities of that class. I agree with the Accountant in thinking that the securities are in themselves unobjectionable, and this being so, I am of opinion that there are no grounds, either in law or in practice, for ordering the curator to call them up.

Lord Ardmillan.—We are here dealing with this particular case, in which the curator has expressed his opinion favourable to the securities. As I read the opinion of the Accountant of Court, he concurs with the curator that the securities are satisfactory, and as sufficient as heritable security. Now, I am of opinion that there is a distinction between recognising a general rule that curators may, and generally should, invest in a certain class of securities, and laying down an inflexible rule that they may not and cannot legally invest in any other class of securities. I should hesitate very much to say that curators may, at their own hand, make investments in any but the three recognised kinds of security. But the general rule is, in my opinion, not inflexible; and where we have the concurrence of the curator and the Accountant of Court as to the desirability and sufficiency of the security, the Court may, if, on consideration, they think right, sanction the investment. This is not the case of a curator investing in perilous security for the sake of a high rate of interest. The investments here are manifestly prudent and on good security. There is nothing of the nature of speculation. In such a case as this we should not uphold the rule as inflexible. I guard myself against saying that we should at once cut down the general rule. I think there is a general rule which tends to make curatorial administration cautious, but it is not so inflexible as to prevent the Court granting such an application as the present one on good grounds being adduced, and on such concurrence as we have here.

LORD MURE.—I have for some time been disposed to think, regard being had to the changes which have been going on in the money market, that, in dealing with questions of this description, it would be necessary to enlarge the class of securities on which money belonging to pupils, and to beneficiaries under trusts, has been in use to be invested. By the Acts of Parliament which have been referred to, this has already been done in regard to trust funds. And by section 13 of the Pupils Protection Act it appears to me that there is not only no express limitation as to the kind of security which may be taken in such cases as that now before us, but that a discretion is given to the Accountant, in dealing with such matters, to fix what securities may be proper. He is "to consider the investments of the estate and sufficiency thereof;" and when, as here, the Accountant has done this, and reports that in his opinion the securities under which the money has been advanced by the curator are "unexceptionable," I agree with your Lordships that these investments ought not to be disturbed. In so far as I am able to form an opinion from the information before us, they appear to me to be investments on which the most prudent investors would not hesitate to lend their money.

THE LORD ORDINARY pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having advised with the Lords of the First Division of the Court, instructs the Accountant to withdraw the requisition on the curator bonis, contained in his report of date 12th January 1876, to realise (1) the investment of the sum of £4500 on mortgage by the commissioners under 'The Aberdeen County and Municipal Buildings Act, 1866,' and 'The Sheriff Court Houses Act, 1860;' and (2) the investment of the sum of £6500 on mortgage by the trustees acting under 'The Aberdeenshire Road Act, 1865,' and to sanction the said investments."

CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders and Appellants.—D.-F. Watson—R. Johnstone.

Proof—Implied Admission—Process—Production—Carrier.—In an action against a railway company for non-delivery of goods, held that a denial by the company that they received the goods was not an implied admission that they did not deliver them to the consignee.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire. I.

CRUICKSHANK, FRASER, AND COMPANY sued the Caledonian Railway Company in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow for (inter alia) the price of a cask of sperm oil delivered to the defenders or their servants at Glasgow on or about 7th November 1873, "to be carried and delivered by them to James Robertson, merchant, Carnoustie, but which had not yet been delivered."

The record was closed on the summons and minute of defence, which, with reference to this part of the case, bore:—"A denial that the defenders, on or about 7th November 1873, received from the pursuers a cask containing sperm oil, to be carried to James Robertson, or any one else; and explained that the defenders never received, and have no knowledge whatever of said cask." There was also a general denial of the pursuers' allegations.

After the record was closed the pursuers put in process a receipt by the defenders for the cask in question. At the proof two partners of the pursuers' firm deponed that the cask had been delivered to the defenders, and had not been received by Robertson. Robertson was not called as a witness.

The Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) found that it was not proved that the cask was not delivered to Robertson, and assoilzied the defenders.

The pursuers thereafter presented a petition to the Sheriff (W. G. Dickson) for leave to examine Robertson, which the Sheriff refused, and subsequently adhered to his Substitute's interlocutor on this branch.*

The case having been brought by appeal to the Court of Session upon another branch of the case, their Lordships adhered upon this point, observing that the pursuers could not found upon the defenders' statement as an implied admission that they did not deliver the cask to the consignee, especially as they had not put in process before the record was closed the receipt which was in their own hands, and that they should either have got a specific admission of non-delivery from the defenders, or called Robertson to prove the fact.

* "NOTE.—The Sheriff has some difficulty, because the defenders' denial that they received the cask to which it refers may be said to involve an admission that they did not deliver it to the consignee Robertson. But it is thought that the more correct construction of the defence, especially considering that the defenders are a public company, without personal knowledge of the facts, is, that it is simply a denial of the grounds of action, leaving the pursuers to prove them. If the case had been in the Court of Session, the pursuers would have had to take an issue—Whether (1) they delivered the goods to the defender for transmission to Robertson? and (2) Whether the defenders failed to transmit them? and they would have had to prove both these facts in order to get a verdict. The same principle requires the pursuers in this Court to prove both the facts which are essential grounds of their action; and their failure to prove the second is fatal to them."

Observations (per Lord Gifford) as to the powers of the Sheriff to regulate possession.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Perthshire. I.

IN April 1874 George Sutherland, tenant of Peel Farm, in the parish of Tibbermuir, presented a petition to the Sheriff of Perthshire against James Thomson, farmer, Almondbank, setting forth "that a footpath runs from the Perth and Madderty road towards the parish church of Tibbermuir in a south-westerly direction through a portion of said farm, and along the south-east edge or border of a field presently under pasture grass, lying between said footpath and the said Perth and Madderty road, which footpath is used principally on the Sundays by persons resident in the north-east division of said parish going to the parish church: That in the management of his farm the petitioner finds it necessary to put sheep and other stock to graze on the said pasture-field; and to admit of this being done, it is necessary to erect two small swing-gates across the footpath, one near the north-east end and the other near the south-west end of said footpath, and the petitioner has his landlord's consent and authority to the erection of such gates: That two of these gates were sometime ago erected by him, and were so constructed as to prove no obstruction whatever to the parties who have occasion to pass along the said footpath."

The petitioner then narrated that these gates had on more than one occasion been recently broken down within a few days after they had been erected, and that the respondent Thomson had been concerned in their demolition, and craved the Sheriff to interdict Thomson from removing or injuring the gates which he (the petitioner) had re-erected, or was immediately about to re-erect, and to find Thomson liable in £20 damages.

Thomson entered appearance, and a record was made up. The petitioner did not dispute the right of the public, or of the respondent as one of the public, to use the footpath, and, on the other hand, the respondent did not deny that he had on at least one occasion been a party to the removal of the gates. The respondent stated that the path had been in use from time immemorial without any gates or obstructions whatever until the petitioner had recently attempted to put gates across it; and further, that these gates were a serious obstruction and inconvenience, especially to the congregation returning from Tibbermuir parish church, of which the respondent was a member.

After some procedure the Sheriff-substitute (Barclay) remitted to Mr James Ritchie, civil engineer, Perth, to inspect the locality, and report—"First, what are the erections which the pursuer made, and which were objected to and interfered with; second, whether the same are, on the one hand, necessary to the fair enjoyment of his possession, and, on the other hand, not unnecessary interruptions to the free passage of the public in the use of the road; third, if the erections so made answer not the conditions embodied in the immediately preceding point of inquiry, then to report what other and preferable modes he would suggest to suit both said conditions."

Mr Ritchie reported that the erections which the pursuer made, and which were objected to and interfered with, were two swing-gates, moving in wickets, thus,  ; that gates across the footpath at these points were necessary to the fair use of the field by the petitioner, especially when the field was occupied by grazing stock, unless the whole footpath were fenced off entirely from the field, which could be done by the erection of a single fence along the north side of the path, the other side being fenced already; that the gates were to a certain extent obstructions to the passage of the public, but that he was not able to suggest a gate which would enclose the field and prove less obstructive to the public in the free use of the path than a wicket-gate properly constructed of the description which had been objected to.

Neither party objected to Mr Ritchie's report, and the Sheriff-substitute approved thereof, "so far as the same refers to the construction of the swing-gates, the subject of the action," and authorised the petitioner to renew the same at Mr Ritchie's sight and to his satisfaction. The gates were accordingly re-erected at the sight and to the satisfaction of Mr Ritchie.

Thereafter, after a proof, which shewed that the gates were not an obstruction to a single person, but that they occasioned a delay when there was a crowd of people returning from church, the Sheriff-substitute pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds as facts, first, there is and has been for upwards of seven years a road through the farm of the pursuer, extending from one public highway to another public road, and which road has been chiefly used by the public in passing to and from the parish church of Tibbermuir, but also for other purposes, and during that period no interruptions have existed by gates or otherwise to such free passage; second, the pursuer, without warrant of law, erected two swing-gates, one at each extremity of said public road, which more or less interfered with the freedom of passage over said road; third, the defender, directly and indirectly, without warrant of law, was concerned in the demolition of the said swing-gates: Therefore in law, finds the defender, as one of the public, and in use of the road, is entitled to a possessory judgment and to have said road kept free from obstruction by gates or otherwise: But finds the defender was not justified, without warrant of law, in interfering with said gates, and having the same removed or demolished: Therefore assoilzies the defender from the conclusion of the action, reserving to the parties their rights of declarator, or for the regulation of the said road for the interests of all concerned: Finds the defender entitled to expenses (subject to the modification of one-fourth of the taxed amount in respect of his unwarrantable interference with the gates)," &c.

On appeal, the Sheriff (Adam) pronounced the following interlocutor;—"Sustains the appeal for the petitioner, and recalls the interlocutor appealed from: Finds (1) that a public footpath runs through a part of the farm of Peel, in the occupation of the petitioner, and that the petitioner on more than one occasion before the present proceedings were instituted erected, with the consent of the proprietor, swing-gates across this footpath; (2) that these gates were broken down and removed, and that the respondent was concerned in and a party to the demolition and removal of the gates; (3) that these gates were necessary for the proper use of the petitioner's farm, and were so constructed as not to be unnecessarily obstructive to the public in the free use of the path; (4) that the gates now erected in place of the gates so removed or destroyed are in like manner necessary for the proper use of the petitioner's farm, and not unnecessarily obstructive to the public in the free use of the path: Finds, in point of law, that the petitioner was entitled to erect these gates across the foot-path, and that the respondent was not entitled to remove or destroy the same: Therefore interdicts, prohibits, and discharges the said James Thomson, respondent, from removing or in any way injuring the swing-gates which the petitioner has erected across the said footpath: Finds the respondent liable to the petitioner in the sum of £5 as the loss and damage the petitioner has sustained in consequence of the gates erected by him having been interfered with and removed by the respondent: Finds the petitioner entitled to expenses," &c.

Thomson appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for the appellant;—There was a broad distinction between the jurisdiction of the Sheriff as regards a servitude road and as regards a public right of way. In the case of a servitude road he was empowered by statute[1] to determine, as fully as the Court of Session could do, both feudal right and the mode in which the right was to be exercised. But in regard to a public right of way he could only pronounce a possessory judgment. His duty was to determine, in the first place, whether the public had a colourable title to the road, and, in the second place, to ascertain in what way the right had been possessed. So soon as possession was proved, or the right admitted, all that the Sheriff could do was to maintain matters in statu quo. It was not within his jurisdiction to say what privilege a right of way conferred upon the public, nor to determine how far the proprietor of the adjacent lands could encroach upon the right of the public. The right of the proprietor to put up anything of the nature of an obstruction across a public footpath could only be tried in the Court of Session. Further, assuming that the question was competently raised in the present process, it must be decided in favour of the public. No doubt there were many cases in which the public acquired a right to a road with gates or stiles across it. In such cases the maxim applied tantum præscriptum quantum possessum. But here there was no dispute as to the way in which this right of the public had been exercised. There had been no possession of the gates on the part of the proprietor or his tenant, the petitioner. There was no allegation of possession except for a few days. What the Sheriff was asked to do, and what he had done, was to invert the status quo. The principle that a servitude must be exercised in the way least burdensome to the servient tenement had no application to a public road. A public right was a separate right of property, and not a mere incumbrance on the neighbouring proprietors. The solum belonged to the public.[2] It "is res communis, it is inter regalia, and (in many cases) it is part of the solum of the country which has never been appropriated."[3] In any view there was a large and important question of heritable right between the two parties, which there was no pretence for trying in a possessory question.[4]

LORD NEAVES.—The question raised in this case is one of importance, and has been argued to us with great ability and great anxiety. It is said to be new, but principles have already been fixed in similar questions that go far to determine the proper decision of the case. The action orignated in the Sheriff Court by a process of interdict by the respondent Sutherland against the appellant Thomson, praying that the appellant should be interdicted from removing or injuring certain swing-gates erected across a footpath traversing the petitioner's farm, and which the appellant had broken down and destroyed, but which have now been replaced by two gates across the footpath, for the protection of which the application was presented.

The material facts as to the erection of the former gates by the petitioner and their destruction by the appellant are admitted, and the question raised is mainly one of law as to the petitioner's right to erect such gates, or the appellant's right to pull them down. If this were the case of a servitude road it would seem to be attended with no difficulty. The case of Wood v. Robertson, quoted at the bar, seems to be conclusive on the point. The Sheriff there found that while the right of road existed and could not lawfully be obstructed by the party through whose land it passed, yet "as no harm or obstruction can happen to the complainer or his tenants by swing-gates being put upon this road, provided they are not locked or fastened in any manner to prevent passengers from opening the same at all times," the Sheriff, "with that restriction, allows the gates complained of to be put up." This decision of the Sheriff was brought under review of this Court by advocation, and was affirmed, with this variation, that three gates should be allowed instead of four, as being sufficient for the petitioner's protection, and that therefore the fourth gate was unnecessary.

By this judgment several points were determined which deserve attention. 1st, There was there a right of way passing through another man's property which the proprietor was not entitled to obstruct, but as to which it was held to be no obstruction to put upon it a certain number of swing-gates that could be opened by passengers when they travelled along the road. 2d, Those gates had not existed for any definite length of time, but had only been recently thought necessary, and the application made to the Sheriff was for interdict against the erection of these gates or any other on the road. 3d, Though in this way there was no reason for a possessory judgment in favour of the gates, the Sheriff's jurisdiction was sustained so as to authorise their erection, and protect them when erected.

The present case, if it were on all fours the same as the case referred to, would, of course, be ruled by it as a precedent, but it has one point of difference, which raises the question now at issue, and which is one of nicety as well as of importance. The road in dispute in the case of Wood was a servitude road, while the road here in question is a public footpath. I admit that this is not a trifling or immaterial distinction, and that in some questions it might lead to a decision being pronounced in the case of a public road different from that which would be given in the case of a servitude road. But it does not follow that in all cases the distinction will have that effect. We must look to the substantial rights and equities of the parties in both cases before we determine that what was lawful and right as to a servitude road shall be unlawful and wrong as to a public road. The distinction between the two kinds of roads operates in more ways than one:—1st, It makes a difference as to the parties entitled to use the road. As to a servitude road, none are entitled to use it except the individuals who are proprietors or occupants of the dominant tenement; while, in reference to a public right of road, all are entitled to use it, strangers and travellers of all kinds having occasion to take advantage of it as a means of passage. No question of that kind here exists. 2d, The distinction between the two kinds of cases may give rise to a difference as to the parties in whom the right to the solum may be held to vest, and here there may be a distinction between different kinds of public roads. The subject in its largest aspect is treated of by Lord Stair, and there can be no doubt that as to proper highways the rights of the Crown are very high, paramount probably to any others. The opinion of the Court in the case of Wood shewed that they recognised the distinction now referred to, and abstained from deciding anything except the question before them, which related to a dispute regarding a servitude road, and in subsequent cases the distinction has been pointed out and practically observed. This, therefore, makes it impossible to found upon the case of Wood as a direct precedent, but still the question arises whether, in certain kinds of public roads, the exercise of the right and its limits may not in a great degree be assimilated to those of servitude roads. A highway, what is called a King's highway, involves interests of great magnitude, requiring a corresponding degree of protection, but a public footpath, though technically of a different character, is often substantially very little or at all different from what a servitude path would be. If the public path be limited, as it often may be, and as it seems to be in this case, to dimensions and requirements not exceeding those that might characterise a servitude road, there seems no reason why the proprietor through whose lands it passes should be subjected to greater hardships, or the parties using the road be entitled to greater privileges than would be fairly sufficient as to a similar servitude road.

In the case of Wood the Court observed that "the erection of gates on a public road was a practice which had prevailed in some parts of the country," but they added, that such a practice "had never been tolerated by the Court." It may be that there has been no decision recognising the legality of the practice, but as little has there been any decision to the contrary. The question then comes to be, whether there is any reasonable ground in the case of a public footpath for depriving the proprietor of the privilege of protecting his property from unnecessary injury by putting up gates which, confessedly, in the case of servitude roads, have judicially been held to be no obstruction. In both cases the parties possessing the right are entitled to pass freely, and nothing more belongs to them. It is held that a gate which opens is no obstruction to a free passage, and it would be mere legal pedantry to hold that on this point what is sufficient in the one case is not sufficient in the other. A gate which opens is either an obstruction or it is not. If it is an obstruction it ought not to be permitted in the case of servitude roads; if it is no obstruction, individual members of the public seem to have no interest and consequently no right to complain of it.

It has been suggested that in a case of servitude the servient tenement is entitled to the more indulgence in consequence of this being a burden which the dominant tenement can only impose and enforce in the mildest manner compatible with the enjoyment of its general right. But if considerations of this kind are to receive effect it is also to be kept in view that in the case of a public road the public itself has an interest that nothing shall be done that prevents the full enjoyment of property in general. It is for the interest of the public that all the land in the country should be made available, so far as possible, for the production of food, and any unnecessary impediment to its cultivation or use is a public evil. If a gate across a public footpath tends to facilitate cultivation of the adjoining land, either by promoting it or making it less expensive, there is no reason why the public should complain of this nominal interference with their supposed rights. The very object of such a case is to save the necessity of elaborate and expensive enclosures. If the gates here were not allowed, additional fences in a lateral direction might be needed to a large extent.

A plea has been maintained by the appellant that it was incompetent for the Sheriff to enter on this question at all, that he can only judge of possession, and if there has not been a gate for seven years he cannot interfere. But this is a plain mistake, and the case of Wood is an authority to that effect. It is true that in the Sheriff Court the substantive right to a public road can only be judged of according to possession. But the regulation of that possession, and the exercise of any incidental rights connected with it, do not require seven years to support them. In the same way, where the property is not in dispute, the rights resulting from that property may be exercised at any time, as these are res meræ facultatis, and if not inconsistent in themselves with the only right belonging to the other party, they may be exercised or neglected at the pleasure of the party to whom they belong. The right to put up gates is only a function of the permanent right of property, and if it does not injure the other parties they have no interest or status to prevent it. In several cases, accordingly, the Court have established the right of the proprietor of the solum of a public road to regulate its course and put up gates that caused no obstruction.

It is true that the public has some rights of property in the road, and this may infer a certain right to the solum so far as necessary for the road, but it does not divest the proprietor of the ground otherwise. The minerals are his, if he can work them without injuring the road, and in the same way other operations must be competent to him if they be "innocuæ utilitatis." The practice of the country of having gates on public roads where useful and harmless is a testimony to the correctness of this view.

The party objecting to the gates urges that this is a church road. This rather weakens his case than strengthens it. A church road more nearly approaches a servitude road in its character than other public roads. It is a road for the parishioners to go to church, and if there is no obstacle to their going to church their rights are satisfied.

If the appellant could and did allege that the gate was obstructive or unnecessarily inconvenient, we should have been disposed to listen to that, as was done in Wood's case, but no such demand has been made.

I am therefore for dismissing the appeal, and affirming the judgment of the Sheriff.

Lord Ormidale.—After the very full and lucid exposition of the law of this case given by Lord Neaves, and in which I very much agree, it will not be necessary for me to add many observations. I am anxious, however, to state my own views of the leading points which have been pressed in argument, and especially in regard to the true nature of a right of way, such as that in question. I am all the more desirous to do so, as I could not help thinking during the discussion that the qualities ascribed to a public footpath, like that with which we are now dealing, were of a more substantial and proprietory character than truly attaches to it.

The case resolves itself into two main questions—1st, Had the petitioner any right at all to put gates across the footpath? and 2d, supposing that he might have had such a right in some circumstances, was he entitled to do so in the present instance, seeing that the path had been entirely open and without gates for seven years previously? In stating these as the questions on which the determination of the case chiefly turns I am not to omit noticing, before I conclude the further contention of the appellant, that the gates which the respondent put up were in themselves objectionable.

It appears to me that with reference to all these matters it is of great importance clearly to keep in view the true nature of a public footpath such as that in dispute. And I shall premise my observations on this point by remarking that the footpath in question is not said to have had its origin in any grant or conveyance of land, from which it could be inferred that the public had acquired anything in the nature of property a centro usque ad cœlum. It is not alleged that the right of the public to the footpath was of a different character from that which may be acquired by immemorial use of passage.

The leading case, illustrative of the true nature of a public right of way, is that of Galbreath v. Armour, July 11, 1845, as decided in the House of Lords, 4 Bell's App. 374. The question there arose in this way. Mr Galbreath was superior of the small town or burgh of Dalintober, the houses or villas in and near which were held of him under feu-dispositions declaring the boundaries to be the streets of the town. Some of the villa proprietors combined for the purpose of erecting a gas-work and introducing gas into their houses. It was proposed to lay the pipes underneath the public road or street of the town. Galbreath applied to the Sheriff for interdict against them, contending that the solum belonged to him, and that the public had only a right to pass over it. The Sheriff refused interdict, and the case was brought by advocation to the Court of Session. Lord Cockburn (Ordinary) recalled the Sheriff's interlocutor and granted interdict. The case having then come into the Inner-House, the Court, before further procedure, ordered an issue to be tried before a jury for the purpose of ascertaining what was the precise nature of the road or street in dispute. The jury returned a verdict that it had been for forty years and upwards of the nature of a public highway under the control and superintendence of the road trustees, and was not under the control and superintendence of the defender (Galbreath), and had not been maintained by him or his authors. The Court, in respect of that verdict, altered the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and refused the prayer of the original petition. That judgment was appealed to the House of Lords, who reversed it, and returned to that of the Lord Ordinary. Lord Campbell examined the different pleas maintained for the respondents in the appeal. He said—"The first is that by the law of Scotland the soil of all highways is in the Crown. Let us observe to what an extent this proposition goes. Carriage roads, horse roads, and footpaths are equally public roads, and whether the use of them has existed further back than can be traced, or they have been established by uninterrupted use for more than forty years immediately before the time when the controversy respecting them arises. It comes to this, then, that if a proprietor, for the accommodation of the public, suffers a public road for horses, carriages, or foot-passengers to be established over his land, the property of the space which the road traverses is gone from him and his heirs, from the centre to the sky, so that he loses all the herbage there may be upon the surface of it, with all the minerals under it, and he cannot connect the different parts of his intersected estate by a tunnel under it, or by a bridge over it. It is curious, in a feudal point of view, likewise, to consider where and how the fee is supposed to be transferred. But I am happy to think, my Lords, that there is no sufficient authority in the law of Scotland for a proposition so absurd and inconvenient. When the text writers cited upon this point are examined it will be found that they mean no more than that highways are res publicæ—that there is a public servitude over them—that they are called 'the king's highways' in Scotland as they are in England, because the public, represented by the sovereign, have a right to use them, and that any purpresture or nuisance upon them is a public offence, for which the offender may be prosecuted and punished, leaving the soil subject to the public servitude to remain in the private proprietor. The highway belongs to the king; but what is the definition of a highway? Not the soil over which the public have a right of passage. . . . This right of passage may well be said to belong to the king, although the soil over which it is exercised belongs to a private individual." Following up the same line of argument, Lord Brougham remarked—"When it is said, as it is in the books, and in some of the cases, that a highway is in the public or in trustees on behalf of the public, or in the Crown for the benefit of the public, what is it that really is so? Ex vi termini, we are not to take 'highway' to mean that, which it is often used to mean, by the ordinary confusion of language in common parlance, where, in this case, as in many others, you confound the thing with the use of the thing," &c.—4 Bell's App. p. 389. It is obvious from the opinions so expressed of these noble and learned Lords in deciding a Scotch appeal according to the law of Scotland that they applied their observations to all public roads; but they are peculiarly applicable to a footpath like the present, which we must assume has been acquired merely by the public passing over it for the prescriptive period. It appears to me, therefore, that the right which the public have to such a footpath is more of the nature of a servitude than of property. And I may add that the views expressed by Lord Campbell in Galbreath v. Armour were repeated and enforced by him in the subsequent case of The Marquis of Breadalbane v. M'Gregor, July 14, 1848, 7 Bell's App. p. 43, in which a right was claimed for the public to have stances on a drove road, for cattle using the road to rest and pasture upon. In the latter case, Lord Campbell said (p. 60)—"I observe it is stated that the pasture upon the drove road belongs to those who use the drove road. Now, that I take leave very much to doubt, or I might say to deny. The notion has been suggested, that wherever a road is established the soil of the road belongs to the public. That is a fallacy. There may be a road established by usage for forty years, but the soil of the road continues to belong to the coterminous owner. If there are minerals under the road the minerals are his; if trees grow upon the road the trees are his; if there is grass upon the road he may take the grass—subject always to the public servitude."

If the public, then, has a mere right to pass over the road, and if the solum or ground passed over belongs to the conterminous proprietor, it would be a strong thing to hold that the proprietor, or his tenant with his leave and in his right, is not entitled, for the protection and service of his estate, to put up gates which do not unnecessarily or in any material degree obstruct the public in the exercise of their right of passage. No authority was cited in support of any such proposition. On the contrary, there is ample authority, I think, in the opposite direction. Thus, in Rodgers v. Harvie, 7 S. 289, the interlocutor bears —"Finds that by the verdict of the jury it is established that for forty years and upwards . . there existed a public footpath from . . . Therefore finds and declares that the pursuers and their families are entitled to the use and privilege of the said footpath or foot-road, free from any encroachment or any interruption inconsistent with or injurious to such use and privilege;" . . . "ordains the defender to remove the obstructions mentioned in the summons, in so far as they close up or obstruct the said passage, . . without prejudice, however, to the defender enclosing his ground, . . provided he leave in the fences wickets or proper openings for allowing free passage." This makes it very clear that the Court considered that the party through whose lands the public footpath passed had the right to put up gates or wickets across it, so far as not to be destructive or injurious in a reasonable sense to the right of passage belonging to the public.

That the same principle was recognised in the case of Kirkpatrick v. Murray and the Aberdour case,[1] both of which were cited in the course of the argument, is also, I think, clear.

The general right of the owner, or farmer in his place, to erect gates, provided they do not interfere in a fair and reasonable sense of that expression with the public right of passage, is therefore, I take it, beyond dispute. But it is said here that no gates having existed for a period of seven years prior to those put up by the respondent the appellant was entitled to the benefit of a possessory judgment, and consequently the petitioner was not entitled to put up the gates till he had established his right to do so by a declarator in the Supreme Court. Assuming that he had a right to put up gates at all, and there being no dispute about the existence of a public footpath itself, I think it would be quite extravagant to hold that before exercising his right he required to resort to the Supreme Court for a warrant to do so. Indeed, the case of Wood v. Robertson, referred to by the Sheriff, is conclusive on this point; for, although that case related to a servitude road, the Sheriff had at the time it was decided no more authority to deal with a servitude than he had with a public road. It appears to me, therefore, that the putting up of gates being a matter incidental to the use of the footpath was peculiarly appropriate to the Sheriff, who, if he has jurisdiction in anything, has it in questions of possession. It was for him, therefore, to regulate the use and possession of the footpath, and that is all he did.

The only remaining point to be noticed is whether the gates put up were in themselves of an objectionable description. I think the appellant has failed to shew that they were. Besides, on this point, Mr Ritchie's report, to which no objection was taken by the appellant, must be held as conclusive.

I, therefore, for the reasons which now have been stated by me, concur with your Lordship in the opinion that the appeal in this case ought to be dismissed, and the Sheriff's interlocutor appealed against affirmed.

LORD GIFFORD.—The questions raised in this case are important and interesting, and they have been very ably argued. It can perhaps hardly be said that these questions are directly and conclusively settled by any of the authorities referred to, but on principle I have little difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the judgment of the Sheriff-principal is well founded, and that the appeal ought to be dismissed, subject to the right of the appellant to have the wickets or swing-gates across the footpath made as convenient as possible for the exercise of the admitted public right of footpath.

[1] Hay v. Earl of Morton, Dec. 5, 1861, 24 D. 116, 34 Scot. Jur. 61.

Sutherland v. Thomson.

The first question raised was, Has the Sheriff jurisdiction as in a possessory question to authorise or confirm swing-gates or wickets across an admitted public right of footpath where such gates or wickets have not existed for the possessory period of the last seven years? Now, on this point, I am of opinion that the Sheriff has jurisdiction in such a question as this. He can regulate interim possession—he can say and determine how and in what manner the right of footpath is to be enjoyed in the meantime—his judgment being always possessory and ad interim, leaving either party, if they think that the interim possession fixed by the Sheriff is inconsistent with their legal and permanent rights, to have these rights finally determined and fixed by the Supreme Court. It is a mistake to say that in such possessory questions the Sheriff has the mere ministerial duty to look to, What was the state of possession and the manner of possession for the last seven years? and to continue that precise state of possession by an interim possessory judgment till the matter of right be fixed. No doubt this is often done when a competition of heritable rights arises, when the Sheriff, who cannot decide in the competition, continues the party in possession who has been so for the last seven years, and this is in such cases the possessory judgment. But this by no means exhausts the Sheriff's jurisdiction in possessory questions. In cases where no question of heritable right arises, where the heritable right is admitted and undisputed, but where the parties are at issue as to the mode in which they may use and enjoy their respective rights, the Sheriff has undoubted jurisdiction to regulate ad interim the mode of possession, and this, apart altogether from the usage during the last seven years. Thus, in questions of admitted common property, the Sheriff may fix ad interim how the co-proprietors are to possess or enjoy their admitted joint rights. In questions of common interest, as where houses are built in flats, with a common entrance or common stair, the Sheriff may fix questions of gates or doors or modes in which alterations are to be made or repairs effected. And so in many other questions of like nature, when there is no dispute about the heritable right, but only difference as to its consequences or results, the Sheriff may ad interim regulate possession or exercise of use, either party having the right to resort to the Supreme Court for a permanent rule. Thus the Sheriff is undoubtedly the proper judge in all questions as to the interim rights between landlords and tenants—in all questions of removing, ejection, maills and duties, intrusion, wrongous use of property, nuisance, and a variety of other actions which often arise where no question of heritable right at all is raised, but which all relate to the use or enjoyment of heritable subjects.

In the present case there is no doubt at all that the Sheriff had jurisdiction to entertain and dispose of the present petition, for it is simply a petition to interdict the appellant from injuring or removing the swing-gates across the line of public footpath in question, that is, to interdict the appellant from destroying these swing-gates at his own hand, and by violence or force. It cannot be disputed that the Sheriff had power and jurisdiction to restrain violence or prevent personal conflict or breach of the peace. But it does not deprive the Sheriff of this jurisdiction merely because the appellant, against whom interdict was sought, pleads that the petitioner had no right to put up or to maintain the swing-gates or wickets in question, and urges that no such gates or wickets have existed during the last seven years. A judgment refusing the interdict sought would be virtually a judgment finding that the petitioner had no right to put up the swing-gates or wickets, and that the appellant was entitled brevi manu to remove them, but in a question of jurisdiction such a judgment would be quite as much an exercise of jurisdiction as a judgment finding that the swing-gates must remain, or regulating their construction.

By a recent statute the jurisdiction of the Sheriff has been enlarged so as to enable him to try all questions relating to real or prædial servitudes. But even before that statute was passed the Sheriff was in use, and almost necessarily so, to regulate ad interim the possession and exercise of servitudes, whether of road, of pasturage, of aqueduct, or of any other description, and our books are filled with instances of such interim regulation. The case of Wood, 9th March 1809, F.C., and other cases quoted in the present discussion, are examples. Even in questions where the road is not a servitude road, but a public right of way, the Sheriff has undoubted jurisdiction to regulate interim possession. An instance occurs in another case cited in argument, Kirkpatrick v. Murray, 26th November 1856, where there was claimed a public right of way through Mr Murray's private park and policies of Cally, and where the Sheriff regulated interim possession by fixing that gates at either end pending the action of declarator of right of way should be unlocked so as to give the public ad interim right of access.

There are other similar cases, and it would be extremely inconvenient if the local Judge had not such jurisdiction, but if parties on mere questions of interim enjoyment or possession should be obliged to come to this Court. I am therefore of opinion that the Sheriff had jurisdiction to entertain and rightly entertained the question whether the swing or wicket-gates erected by the petitioner should or should not be maintained, and whether or not their construction should be altered or modified.

But the next and the more important question is, what may be called the merits of the action, and these are, whether the Sheriff has decided rightly in holding that the petitioner is entitled to maintain swing-gates across the line of the public footpath in question, and in fixing or approving of the character and construction of these gates. Now, here also I am of opinion that the Sheriff-principal has decided this point rightly, subject to the observation I have already made, that, if the respondent demands it, the construction of the swing-gates possibly might be somewhat improved or altered.

It seems to be quite fixed, and, indeed, was not seriously disputed by the counsel for the appellant, that in the case of a proper servitude right of footpath, that is, a right of footpath not in favour of the public, but in favour only of the proprietors and tenants of a particular property or estate,—a prædial servitude of footpath, as it is called,—the proprietor of the servient tenement, that is, the lands subject to the footpath, may put up such swing-gates, stiles, or turnstiles, as may be necessary for fencing his property, provided they do not materially interfere with the exercise or enjoyment of the right of way which the occupants of the dominant tenement can claim. This rests upon the equitable rule that a servitude must be rendered as little burdensome to the servient tenement as is consistent with its fair exercise.

It was contended, however, that this principle, which is in full force as to a servitude footpath, is inapplicable to a right of public footpath where the right of way is in the public, and is not confined to the mere inhabitants of a dominant estate, and the distinction between the two was urged with great ability. No precise authority was quoted establishing that open or unlocked gates were permissible in the one case and not in the other, the nearest authority being the dicta in the case of Wood v. Robertson, 9th March 1809. But there the Judges were only dealing with a servitude road on which they decided that swing-gates were permissible, and, while doubting whether such permission should be extended to public roads, the Court seem to have had in view not a mere public right of footpath, but a public right of road for carriages and vehicles of all kinds where the public were entitled to drive, day or night, free of all obstructions. I cannot hold, therefore, the dicta or doubts expressed in Wood v. Robertson as excluding the right of a proprietor to put swing-gates or stiles or wickets across a public right of footpath, and I am of opinion that the same principles of equity which give a proprietor a right to put such gates across a servitude footpath will apply, at least in many cases, and in the present case, to a public right of footpath. There are many public footpaths extending for miles across open or pastoral country. Fences are required on such estates for the mere purposes of pasturage, and to prevent cattle and sheep from straying. It would be very hard in such cases to compel the proprietor to fence the line of footpath on both sides throughout its entire length, it may be for many miles, and we are familiar with such footpaths, extending through a whole valley, and yet this would be the consequence of preventing him from putting, say, at the entrance and exit of such footpath, swing-gates or wickets, which, while they would prevent animals from straying, would be no inconvenience to foot-passengers using the footpath.

No. 82.

Sutherland v. Thomson.

No doubt there is a broad and a well-known distinction between a servitude footpath and a public footpath, the use of the one being confined to the residents in or the visitors to a dominant tenement, the use of the other being open to the whole public wherever they reside or wherever they are going. But this difference does not affect the equitable principle which gives the proprietor the best use of his property subject to the right. In reality, a public right of footpath is really the same as a servitude right, excepting that the dominant tenement is the whole kingdom and not a special subject or estate, and no good reason seems to exist why the equitable rights of use which the law secures to the proprietor of a servient tenement should not be given to the proprietor of an estate burdened with a public footpath, provided only its use as a public footpath is not interfered with. It seems to follow from the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of Galbreath v. Armour, 11th July 1845, 4 Bell's App. Ca. 374, that the solum of the line of footpath is in the landlord of the ground, and not in the Crown; the public have nothing but a mere right of free passage over or through the lands which the respondent in the appeal occupies, and which belong to the Earl of Kinnoull. I am therefore of opinion in the present case that the petitioner (respondent in this appeal) is entitled, in order to the enjoyment of his land for pasture, to put up such swing-gates or wickets, as while they will prevent his cattle from straying, will not impede the public right of way.

It was urged for the appellant that the path in question was not only used for foot-passengers, but was occasionally traversed by horses or by riders on horseback. I am of opinion that this has not been sufficiently proved, or, at all events, not during the last seven years, and therefore I think that in this question of interim possession, and in this action we can do no more than settle interim possession, the alleged right of horse-road or actus has been rightly laid out of view.

I have only to add that if the appellant had thought it worth while to move for it, I should be inclined to give him, instead of a wicket or wickets, swing-gates fastened by a mere latch or catch (which may be self-acting), instead of the wickets which I understand presently exist. I sympathise with the remark urged by the appellant that a wicket, requiring to be turned by each single individual, and thus scarcely permitting the passage of more than one at a time, may be inconvenient when a whole congregation is at once dismissed, and the present footpath seems to be used by the congregation. A swing-gate, which admits of being held open or even temporarily fastened open seems not unreasonable in such circumstances, and when it had allowed passage it could be closed on a latch so as to serve the petitioner's legitimate purpose of preventing his cattle from straying. The gate could be so hung or so hinged as, if thought desirable, to swing shut of its own accord. This is really a matter of adjustment, if moved for, and I see the present respondent expresses readiness to do whatever is expedient in this respect.

On the whole, and subject to this remark, I think the judgment of the Sheriff-principal right.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find in point of fact that the public footpath runs through a part of the farm of Peel, in the occupation of the respondent, and that the respondent, on more than one occasion before the present proceedings were instituted erected, with the consent of the proprietor, swing-gates across the footpath; (2) that these gates were broken down and removed, and that the appellant was concerned in and a party to the demolition and removal of these gates; (3) that these gates were necessary for the proper use of the respondent's farm, and were so constructed as not to be in any material degree injurious or obstructive to the public in the free use of the path; (4) that the gates now erected in place of the gates so removed or destroyed are in like manner necessary for the proper use of the respondent's farm, and not in any material degree injurious or obstructive to the public in the free use of the path; and (5) that the respondent sustained damage to the extent of £5 in consequence of the demolition as aforesaid of the above-mentioned gates: Find in point of law that the respondent was entitled to erect said gates across the footpath, and that the appellant was not entitled to remove or destroy the same: Therefore, in respect of the foregoing findings, affirm the interlocutor of the Sheriff appealed against: Dismiss the appeal, and decern: Find the respondent (the petitioner in the Sheriff Court) entitled to expenses in this Court," &c.

JAMES WALKER AND ANOTHER, Complainers.—J. G. Smith—Balfour.

Church—Churchyard—Presbytery—Jurisdiction—Ecclesiastical Buildings Act, 1868, 31 and 32 Vict. c. 96, secs. 3, 14, and 20—Compulsory Sale—Notice.—On 18th April 1875 a notice was read from the pulpit of a parish church intimating that a petition had been presented to the Presbytery, "craving them to design and set apart the piece of ground immediately adjoining the churchyard on the north, or other suitable piece of ground, for an addition to the same, and that the Presbytery are to visit and inspect the churchyard on Thursday the 6th day of May next, at one o'clock afternoon, at which time the heritors and all others concerned or persons duly authorised to act for them, are requested to attend."

At the time specified the Presbytery, after inspecting the churchyard, proceeded to designate the piece of ground to the north, part of which belonged to W., a heritor, who was not present, but who had heard the above intimation made in church. On 11th May notice was sent to W. (but not to his tenant) that a meeting of Presbytery would be held on 17th May "to take further steps towards making an addition to the churchyard," and requesting him to attend.

At this meeting the Presbytery, upon the report of men of skill, fixed the value of W.'s ground, including the value of unexhausted manure, and ordained the tenant to remove at the term of Martinmas 1875. No notice of either judgment was sent to the heritor or to his tenant till 22d July 1875.

In a suspension and interdict brought by W. and his tenant, and insisted in by W., on the grounds (1) that the only notice he had got of the meeting of 6th May was a notice that the Presbytery would merely visit and inspect the churchyard, and that therefore the decree of designation then pronounced was illegal; (2) that he had been deprived of his statutory right of appeal to the Sheriff by not receiving notice of the judgment until after the time for appeal had expired,—held (1) that the designation of an addition to a churchyard, and the regulation of the procedure thereanent, being matters within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Presbytery, were not subject to review in the Court of Session; and (2) (rev. judgment of Lord Young, diss. Lord Ardmillan) that considering the fact that W. had been engaged in negotiations with the heritors as to the sale of his ground before the application to the Presbytery the notice from the pulpit was not so insufficient as to justify the Court in quashing the whole proceedings as illegal.

Churchyard—Decree of Designation—Decree of Removing by Church Court—Executorial Power—Compensation to Tenant—Lease.—In the same suspension and interdict insisted in by the tenant, on the grounds (1) that the designation, decrees, and valuation were invalid, because the Presbytery had ordained the tenant to remove, and (2) that the tenant's compensation had not been taken into view, held (1) that the decree was according to usual style, and competent, although the Presbytery had no executorial power to enforce the decerniture to remove; (2) that, assuming that the tenant's interest was not taken into view in the valuation which the Presbytery had made, it was still open to the tenant to maintain any claim that he had.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Young.

THIS note of suspension and interdict was presented by James Walker of Ravensby, in the parish of Barry and county of Forfar, and James Dargie, one of his tenants, against the Presbytery of Arbroath and heritors of the parish of Barry, for suspension of a decree of designation by the Presbytery of a piece of land on the estate of Ravensby as an addition to the churchyard of Barry, and for interdict against the respondents carrying the same into effect.

The note was presented in the following circumstances:—On 19th March 1874 the heritors of the parish of Barry resolved that an addition should be made to the churchyard, and on 1st October 1874 they came to be of opinion that a small field adjoining the churchyard to the north, and belonging to Mr Walker, was the most suitable for this purpose. An offer for the ground was made to Mr Walker, but on 11th November 1874 he declined it, at the same time stating the terms on which he would agree to the proposal of the heritors.

Subsequent negotiations with Mr Walker proved abortive, and on 6th April 1875 a petition was presented to the Presbytery, signed by fifteen of the heritors, setting forth the circumstances, and craving the Presbytery to visit and inspect the churchyard, and to designate and set apart so much of the said piece of ground adjoining the churchyard to the north, or other suitable piece of ground, as might be necessary as an addition to it.

The Presbytery, at their meeting on 6th April 1875, as their minutes bore,—"Resolved to visit and inspect the churchyard of Barry on Thursday, the 6th day of May next, at one o'clock P.M., with a view to fix upon a piece of ground suitable for designating as an addition to the churchyard, if they shall find the same to be necessary, and to designate the same; and directed and hereby direct the minister to intimate this petition, and the time fixed for the visit, from the pulpit and on the church door, and also by advertisement in the local papers once during each of the two successive weeks between the intimation from the pulpit and the day for which the visitation is called; further appointed and hereby appoint the minister to secure the attendance of a duly qualified and licensed land-valuator to aid them in the inspection and valuation of such portion of ground as may be considered suitable and necessary as an addition to the churchyard, with a view to apportion the expense of providing the same among the several heritors according to their just proportions; and adjourned and hereby adjourn further consideration of the petition till the said 6th day of May next."

On Sunday, 18th April 1875, the following intimation was made from the pulpit and on the church doors of the parish church of Barry:—"Notice.—Intimation is hereby given to the heritors of this parish and all concerned that a petition has been presented to the reverend the Presbytery of Arbroath, craving them to design and set apart the piece of ground immediately adjoining the churchyard on the north, or other suitable piece of ground, for an addition to the same, and that the Presbytery are to visit and inspect the churchyard on Thursday, the 6th day of May next, at one o'clock afternoon, at which time the heritors and all others concerned, or persons duly authorised to act for them, are requested to attend."

An advertisement was also inserted in the "Dundee Advertiser" of 23d and 30th April to the same effect.

Mr Walker was present in church on Sunday, 18th April 1875, when this intimation was made.

The minutes of the meeting of Presbytery of 6th May bore,—"The Presbytery then did, along with the heritors and the valuator, visit and inspect the churchyard and adjoining ground, and after deliberation and hearing parties petitioners, Find ad interim that the churchyard of Barry is not sufficient for the wants of the parish, and requires to be enlarged; further, that a portion of the two ridges of arable land lying immediately to the north of the churchyard, belonging respectively, the ridge contiguous to the churchyard, to the estate of Ravensby, possessed by James Walker, Esq., and the ridge further north to the estate of Pitskelly, possessed by the Right Honourable the Earl of Dalhousie, and bounded as follows,— . . . is a suitable and proper and convenient piece of ground to be designated and appropriated as an enlargement of the present churchyard. The Presbytery further designate and set apart the portion of ground above defined, and belonging to the several estates of Ravensby and Pitskelly, as an addition to the churchyard of Barry: . . . . Further, the Presbytery ordain the present tenants of said portions of land now designated and set apart for addition to the churchyard . . . : as aforesaid to remove therefrom at the term of Martinmas next: Further, the Presbytery remit to Mr James Proctor, licensed land-surveyor, to measure separately and ascertain the dimensions of the several portions of land now designated and set apart for the purposes aforesaid, distinguishing that portion belonging to the estate of Ravensby, set apart for addition to the churchyard, from the portion belonging to the estate of Pitskelly, set apart for the like purpose, . . . and to report the same certified to the Clerk of Court; and appoint the clerk to communicate the said certified measurements to Mr Collier, the valuator, and remit to the said valuator to ascertain and fix the value of said portions of ground respectively, and to report his award to a meeting of Presbytery to be held at Barry on Monday, the 17th day of May current, at one o'clock afternoon; and the Presbytery did and hereby do appoint a meeting to be held at the time and place aforesaid, and cite parties apud acta to appear for their interests, and adjourn further consideration of the petition till said meeting."

No special intimation was made to Mr Walker of the resolution come to by the Presbytery at their meeting of 6th May 1875, but on 11th May a notice was sent him that a meeting of Presbytery would be held on May 17th "to take further steps towards making an addition to the churchyard at Barry, which meeting you are requested to attend."

The Presbytery met on 17th May 1875, when appearance was made for the petitioners (the heritors).

Mr Walker was not present either at the meeting of 6th or of 17th May.

The minutes bore that the reports from Mr Proctor as to the measurement, and from Mr Collier as to the value of the portions of the ground taken from the estates of Ravensby and Pitskelly respectively, were read, and that "Mr Collier stated in his report that in arriving at these valuations he had taken into account the unexhausted manures in the ground, and as regards the Ravensby land the allowance required to be made for detour;" that the Presbytery, after findings as to the measurement and value, in terms of the reports, found that the value of the ground was a burden upon the whole heritors of the parish of Barry, and fell to be paid by them according to their just proportions; that the heritors were bound to enclose the addition made to the churchyard with a proper wall, &c., and generally to do whatever might be requisite to put the whole into a proper condition for the use of the parishioners as a churchyard, and remitted "to the heritors to take estimates of the expense; and authorised them to enter into contracts for the execution of the work, and to report the same to the Presbytery on Tuesday, the 7th day of September next, at their meeting in Arbroath, to enable them then to give final decerniture in the petition, and to allocate the whole expense upon the several heritors according to their just proportions, and adjourned farther consideration of the petition till the said 7th day of September next, at twelve o'clock noon, and cited parties petitioners to appear then and there for their interests."

No special intimation was made to Mr Walker of the resolutions come to by the Presbytery at their meeting of 17th May 1875. But on 22d July 1875 a letter was addressed to the complainer, James Dargie, by the clerk to the Presbytery, requiring him to remove from that portion of the ground designated as the addition to the churchyard which was occupied by him.

The note of suspension and interdict was presented on 4th September 1875, and the Lord Ordinary granted interim interdict.

Mar. 1, 1876.

Accordingly, the meeting of Presbytery, appointed for 7th September 1875, was not held.

The complainers set forth as the grounds of their suspension and interdict—That no intimation whatever of the petition, or of its presentation, or of the meeting of Presbytery for its consideration, or of the adjournment of that meeting, was made to either of the complainers. Farther, the intimations ordered by the minute of Presbytery of 6th April 1875 were not made. An intimation was made from the pulpit that the Presbytery were to visit and inspect the churchyard on the 6th day of May, but no intimation was given of the object of the visit, and in the notice affixed to the church door (which notice bore no date) no intimation was given either of the object of the visit, further than that it was "to visit and inspect the churchyard," or of its date. Farther, the petition and the time fixed for the visit were not intimated in the local papers. The only newspaper published in Arbroath was "The Arbroath Guide," and no advertisement whatever on the subject was inserted in that paper. That neither of the complainers received any intimation of the object of the meeting of 6th May, or that it was the intention of the Presbytery at that meeting to designate as an addition to the churchyard the ground belonging to and occupied by them respectively. That no intimation whatever was made to them of the designation of the said piece of ground belonging to and occupied by them respectively at the meeting of 6th May 1875, nor of the object of the meeting appointed to be held on 17th May 1875. That they received no notice of any meeting with Mr Proctor or Mr Collier, and had no opportunity of being heard before the latter as to the price to be paid for the ground. That the complainer James Walker having received no notice of the foresaid findings or pretended findings and designation of part of his lands by the respondents, the Presbytery of Arbroath, and having been in ignorance of these findings or pretended findings and designation till after the receipt by the other complainer of the foresaid letter from the clerk to the Presbytery, dated 22d July 1875, was unable to submit the proceedings of the respondents, the Presbytery of Arbroath to the review of the Sheriff, in terms of the provisions of the Act 31 and 32 Vict. c. 96.* That the whole of the foresaid proceedings of the respondents, the Presbytery of Arbroath, were illegal, and the designation of a portion of the estate of the complainer James Walker in the occupation of the other complainer, without their consent, and without intimation to them that they might be heard for their interest, both as to the expediency of taking the ground, and as to the compensation to be paid to them in the event of the same being taken, were null and void. The complainer James Dargie held a lease of the ground which did not expire till the term of Martinmas 1886, but no provision was made for payment to him of any sum whatever in respect of unexhausted manure, or the loss of the occupation of the said subject during the years yet to run of the said lease, and it was, he averred, the intention of the respondents to take possession of the ground and to deprive him of the occupation thereof without making any compensation to him therefor, or giving notices or putting in force the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

The complainers pleaded;—(1) The whole proceedings of the Presbytery in connection with the said pretended designation of the ground in question having been irregular, informal, and illegal, the designation is inept and not binding on the complainers. (2) The said pretended designation and valuation of the ground in question are inept and not binding on the complainer James Walker, in respect that they were made in his absence and without intimation; or at all events without any lawful or sufficient intimation to him.

The respondents pleaded;—(1) The judgments of the Presbytery referred to not having been appealed from are final, and implement thereof cannot competently be interdicted. (2) The proceedings of the heritors and the Presbytery above set forth having been regularly taken, the ground in question was thereby duly designated as a portion of the churchyard of Barry. (4) The petition of the heritors, and deliverances of the Presbytery thereon, having been duly intimated, the complainer Mr Walker was bound to appeal against the deliverances of the Presbytery, if he objected thereto.

Thereafter, on 26th November 1875, the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Suspends the proceedings complained of, continues the interdict, and declares the same perpetual, and decerns: Finds the respondents liable in expenses," &c.*

* "NOTE.—It is admitted that the complainers had no notice of the presentation of the petition of the heritors to the Presbytery on 6th April, of the meeting of Presbytery on that day, of the proceedings thereat, other than the subsequent intimation from the pulpit, and the advertisement referred to and quoted in Statement 4. I assume that this was good notice of the resolution of Presbytery 'to visit and inspect the churchyard' on 6th May, as a preliminary to designation, but it was, I think, no notice that the Presbytery would, at a meeting to be held immediately after the inspection, and on the same day, proceed to designation. This, however, they did in the absence of the complainers, and, as I must hold, without notice to them. The interest of the complainer Mr Walker was obvious, for not only was he proprietor of the ground which the Presbytery designated, but as an heritor he was by 31 and 32 Vict., chap. 96, sec. 3, entitled to appeal to the Sheriff against the judgment of the Presbytery within twenty days of its date. It does not appear that he had any notice of the judgment of 6th May, or of the subsequent judgment of 17th May, prior to the letter of 22d July, quoted in Statement 7. The proceedings of the Presbytery in ordering the removal from the ground, and in valuing it, may be subject to criticism and objection, but the want of notice to parties so nearly interested as the complainers, and particularly to the heritor who was thus deprived of his

The Presbytery of Arbroath, and the Earl of Dalhousie as one of the heritors of the parish of Barry, reclaimed.

Counsel were first heard on the grounds stated in the second plea in law for the complainers, on which the Lord Ordinary had founded his judgment.

At advising on 18th February 1876,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The object of this suspension is to stop certain proceedings which have been taken by the Presbytery of Arbroath for the purpose of making an addition to the churchyard of the parish of Barry, and the Lord Ordinary has suspended the proceedings and granted interdict against further proceedings in the matter. His judgment gives effect to one of several objections which have been stated by the complainers, namely, that a certain deliverance of the Presbytery designating this ground as part of the churchyard, or as an addition to the churchyard, was not preceded by any proper notice to the complainers, who are the proprietor and tenant of the ground so proposed to be added to the churchyard. Of course in dealing with this reclaiming note we have not considered nor have we heard parties upon any of the other objections which have been taken to these proceedings, and our judgment must be confined entirely to that which forms the ground of the Lord Ordinary's judgment. As regards that matter I cannot agree with the Lord Ordinary.

The Presbytery in dealing with this matter are not regulated by the provisions of any statute, but are possessed of a jurisdiction which, although originally derived from statute, is matter entirely of common law as regards the mode of its exercise. It depends entirely upon practice and custom how its proceedings are to be carried out. It is, no doubt, of importance to observe that a recent statute has been passed to amend procedure in regard to ecclesiastical buildings and glebes in Scotland, including the matter of churchyards, but that statute neither confers jurisdiction on the Presbytery, nor deprives them of jurisdiction, nor does it either extend or limit their jurisdiction. It seems to me merely to recognise the existing jurisdiction of the Presbytery, and to give a particular mode of appeal or review of their proceedings in place of that which was formerly competent. The 3d section of the statute provides,—"If in the course of any proceedings before any Presbytery of the Church of Scotland relating to . . . . the designing or excambing of sites for or additions to churchyards, and the suitable maintenance thereof (including the building or repairing of churchyard walls), any heritor or the minister of the parish shall be dissatisfied with any order, finding, judgment, interlocutor, or decree pronounced by such Presbytery, it shall be competent for such heritor or minister, within twenty days of the date of such order, finding, judgment, interlocutor, or decree, to stay such proceedings by appealing the whole cause, as hereinafter provided; and such appeal, on being duly intimated to the clerk of the said Presbytery, shall have the effect of staying the Presbytery from taking any further steps in connection with said proceedings: Provided always, that if no such appeal is taken and duly intimated within the period foresaid, every such order, finding, judgment, interlocutor, or decree not appealed from as aforesaid shall be final and not subject to review." The statute also contains provisions as to the mode in which the appeal is to be followed out, by presenting a summary petition to the Sheriff statutory right to appeal, is, in my opinion, sufficient to warrant the suspension now asked."

of the county, and makes the deliverance of the Sheriff of the county upon the appeal petition final and conclusive, subject only to appeal to the Lord Ordinary on Teinds, and makes the judgment of the Lord Ordinary on Teinds not reviewable.

Now, it seems to me that that statute, in the first place, clearly recognises the competency of the Presbytery to deal with the matter here in dispute. It leaves the jurisdiction of the Presbytery just where it found it, but in place of there being any mode of reviewing the Presbytery's findings in this Court, as formerly, there is an appeal given to the Sheriff, and from him to the Lord Ordinary on Teinds, and that is exclusive of all other review. Although the Lord Ordinary on Teinds is a member of the Court of Session, he is singled out as a person possessing peculiar functions of his own for the purposes of this statute; and most certainly the Inner-House cannot exercise those functions for him, nor in any way, so far as I can see, review the proceeding of the Presbytery in a matter of this kind.

But, no doubt, although we are precluded from reviewing the proceedings of the Presbytery, either on matters of substance or matters of form, if it can be made out to our satisfaction that some serious violation of the ordinary rules of procedure common to all Courts of competent jurisdiction has been committed, whereby injustice or inequity has resulted, then we may be entitled to interpose for the purpose of setting the matter right, and making the inferior Court perform its functions according to the known rules and principles of law. But I think before we can so interfere we must be quite satisfied, not that the Presbytery have proceeded in a different mode from that in which the Sheriff or any other civil Court would have proceeded, provided they have followed their own rules and practice, but that they have proceeded in some way which is inconsistent with the ordinary rules of the administration of justice in all Courts, and have thereby committed some injustice. Now, I cannot see that there is anything of that kind before us as regards the objection which has been sustained by the Lord Ordinary; and it seems to me that his Lordship has too much left out of view, as I think the counsel for the complainer did also in the course of the argument, that we are not here to review the proceedings, but only if sufficient cause be shewn to quash them, and set them aside as being illegal. And in exercising such a jurisdiction, it creates a very considerable embarrassment and limits very much our right of interference that the inferior Court is not acting under the directions of any particular statute, and therefore is not tied down to the use of any particular form; so that unless it can be shewn that some practical injustice has been done by failure to follow out the obvious and proper course which every Court of ordinary jurisdiction must follow in its proceedings, I do not think there is any room for our interference.

Now, how stands the matter of fact? It is said that the Presbytery proceeded to designate this ground as an addition to the churchyard without due notice to the complainer, Mr Walker, and his tenant. In considering whether any notice was given to Mr Walker in this respect, or whether he really was without notice of these proceedings, I do not think we are at all confined in our inquiry to the precise terms of the notice which reached his ear as a member of the congregation in church upon the particular day when the notice was read out from the pulpit. On the contrary, we are quite entitled to see how far Mr Walker is in good faith in objecting to the terms of that notice, and how far his own previous knowledge of the proceedings with regard to the addition to the churchyard did not enable him fully to understand what was the intended import and effect of that notice. Now, it appears from the minutes of the heritors which have been laid before us that the addition of that piece of ground, the property of Mr Walker, to the churchyard, was the subject of negotiation between Mr Walker and the heritors for some time previous to the presentation of the petition upon which the deliverance complained of was pronounced. The heritors, at a meeting on the 1st of October 1874, resolved to offer to Mr Walker for one acre of the field immediately adjoining the present burying-ground to the north of the existing churchyard, a certain sum of money, and upon certain conditions, and the clerk of the heritors was desired to make a communication to Mr Walker upon the subject. We find from another meeting of the 19th of November 1874 that Mr Walker's answer was received, and Mr Walker's answer adjected certain other conditions which were not satisfactory to the heritors; and accordingly the meeting unanimously declined to entertain Mr Walker's offer upon the terms therein stated. Then there was still further negotiation upon the subject, and the minutes shew that personal communications took place between Mr Walker and some of the heritors, or some one deputed to represent them, and that in the end Mr Walker and the other heritors could not come to terms about the price of this ground and the conditions on which it was to be taken. That this piece of ground belonging to Mr Walker, immediately adjoining the churchyard upon the north, was the piece of ground that everybody looked to as forming the proper addition to the churchyard, there could be no manner of doubt. Now, it is in these circumstances, when the heritors find that they cannot settle this matter among themselves, that a petition is presented by fifteen of the heritors to the Presbytery of Arbroath. No doubt this is not a petition by the whole heritors, nor was it at all necessary that it should be so. It appears that there are forty heritors in the parish, and the petition was signed by only fifteen. I do not think that that makes any difference. But the prayer of the petition is that the Presbytery shall visit and inspect the churchyard, and with the assistance of such persons as may be considered qualified, find that it is no longer sufficient in extent for the wants of the parish, and design and set apart so much of the foresaid or other suitable piece of ground as may be necessary as an addition to it. Now, the foresaid piece of ground is just the piece of ground which had formed the subject of negotiation between the heritors and Mr Walker previously, viz., that field belonging to him immediately adjoining the churchyard on the north. This petition having come before the Presbytery on the 6th of April 1875, the Presbytery resolved to visit and inspect the churchyard on the 6th of May next, with a view to fix upon a piece of ground suitable for designating as an addition to the churchyard, if they shall find the same to be necessary, and to designate the same; and directed the minister to intimate this petition, and the time fixed for the visit, from the pulpit, and on the church doors, and also by advertisement in the local newspapers. Following upon this minute there comes the notice which is complained of as insufficient, and which the Lord Ordinary has held to be insufficient, as a notice to Mr Walker of the intention of the Presbytery to proceed to designate the ground as an addition to the churchyard. The notice is in these terms:—"Intimation is hereby given to the heritors of this parish and all concerned, that a petition has been presented to the Reverend the Presbytery of Arbroath, craving them to design and set apart the piece of ground immediately adjoining the churchyard on the north, or other suitable piece of ground, for an addition to the same, and that the Presbytery are to visit and inspect the churchyard on Thursday, the 6th day of May next, at one o'clock afternoon, at which time the heritors and all others concerned, or persons duly authorised to act for them, are requested to attend."

Now, it is maintained by the complainer that this is an insufficient notice, because it does not intimate that at that same meeting on the 6th of May the Presbytery will proceed to designate ground as an addition to the churchyard, but merely intimates an intention of the Presbytery to visit and inspect the churchyard. Now, if it were absolutely necessary that the Presbytery should divide the exercise of its functions into certain parts or stages,—if the Presbytery could not competently, at one and the same meeting, visit and inspect the churchyard, and also designate ground as an addition to it, I should think there was a good deal of force in that objection. But that has not been contended, nor could it be contended, because there is nothing, so far as I know, in the practice of the Church Courts to prevent the Presbytery from proceeding to exercise their functions to the whole extent in the course of one visit; and I do not see any reason why they should not do so under ordinary circumstances. Why should they not on their visit to the churchyard say,—"There cannot be the smallest doubt that the churchyard is too small—everybody is agreed about that—the whole heritors are agreed upon that subject, and there is one piece of ground here that above all is the proper piece of ground to add to the churchyard, and therefore we at once fix upon that and designate it as the proper addition." Now, if it be competent to do that at one meeting, and if it be formally intimated to the heritor who is interested that the Presbytery are to proceed to visit the churchyard for the purpose of giving effect to the petition, the prayer of which is set forth in the notice,—for the petition is described as craving the Presbytery to design and set apart the piece of ground immediately adjoining the churchyard on the north, or other suitable piece of ground—if it be competent for them to do that at one meeting, then I think it is a very strict construction indeed of such a notice as this, to say that they have thereby pledged themselves that they will not proceed to do that at one meeting, but will confine themselves at their first meeting to a visit and inspection.

Nor is there anything in the practice of Presbyteries at all to justify such an expectation. We have been referred to the forms and styles of writs in Church Courts,[1] which are well known, published, and acted upon every day; and in analogous cases, for which styles are provided in that book, we certainly find a great deal of authority for holding that an intimation of this kind, conceived in general terms, and making reference to the prayer of the application which is before the Presbytery, is quite sufficient notice to everybody concerned. It is quite clear that in a proceeding of this kind it is not necessary to have a formal citation of parties, and an execution of citation upon them. That cannot be maintained. Indeed, it is admitted that an intimation from the pulpit and upon the church doors is sufficient. And surely, if that be so, it depends entirely for its authority upon the practice of the Church Courts; and if the practice of the Church Courts be also to give intimation generally in such terms as are found in this notice, that equally must receive respect from this Court, when we are considering whether the Presbytery have committed any such flagrant violation of the ordinary rules of proceeding in judicial tribunals that their proceedings must be set aside as altogether illegal. I am not able to say that this notice is in that sense an irregular and insufficient notice, or that the thing was here done behind the back of Mr Walker, while he really knew nothing about it, and that his land was taken (as it has been expressed) without his knowledge. I think there is very strong evidence in this case that Mr Walker knew perfectly well what was going on, and, at all events, whether there is such evidence otherwise or not, it appears to me that the terms of this notice were quite sufficient to make him answerable if he did not choose to come to meet the Presbytery in the churchyard, in terms of the intimation which he so received.

It is said that, in consequence of his not receiving sufficient notice, and not believing that the Presbytery were going to designate this ground on that particular day, he lost his opportunity of appealing to the Sheriff. But he got further notice after this deliverance had been pronounced, by a letter dated the 11th of May, in which he was told, that "on Monday, the 17th, the Presbytery will meet within the parish church of Barry, to take further steps towards making an addition to the churchyard, which meeting you are requested to attend;" and if he had even complied with that request, and attended that meeting either by himself or a representative, he would then have found what had been done on the 6th of May, and he would still have been in time to appeal to the Sheriff. But he does not choose to attend that meeting either, but lies by, apparently with the hope of finding some technical objection to the proceedings which have taken place in his absence.

I cannot give any countenance to an attempt of this kind to set aside the proceedings of a competent Court upon so vague and imperfect a ground as this seems to me to be; and therefore I am for recalling in hoc statu the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and hearing what further objections there are to the proceedings of the Presbytery.

LORD DEAS.—The question is, whether Mr Walker can be held to have got notice of what was intended to be done, and was done, by the Presbytery at their meeting upon the ground in question upon the 6th of May. There is no room for doubt according to the practice in this country, as well as according to the fair construction of the statute of 1868, that the Presbytery had and have jurisdiction to do what they did, provided they did it in a regular and proper manner. The duty of providing additional ground, when it is required for a churchyard, lies in the first instance upon the heritors; but there is an undoubted power in the Presbytery, if the heritors do not fulfil that duty, to take steps to have it carried out. It is also quite clear that in this case there has been no breach of any provision of the statute of 1868, which makes certain regulations, with a power of transferring the jurisdiction from the Presbytery to the Sheriff.

I entirely agree with your Lordship that the proceedings of the Presbytery are to be regarded in a different and less strict and stringent light than the proceedings of an ordinary Court of law. There is no imperative rule with reference to citation or intimation. The rules applicable to summonses in this Court, where there must be citation by a messenger-at-arms or by a sheriff-officer, are altogether inapplicable to the proceedings of a Presbytery. The Presbytery do not require to employ messengers-at-arms or sheriff-officers. They proceed in their own way, and all that is required is that everything shall be done fairly,—that the matter in which any individual heritor is concerned shall be fairly brought to his knowledge. If that has been done, there is no room for question that the law has been fulfilled. Accordingly, the question here is whether that has been done. It is said in the record, art. 17, "The complainer, Mr Walker, believes and avers that all the notices and intimations were intentionally made vague in order that he might not know what was being done, and might consequently be deprived of his right of appeal to the Sheriff, and his other rights." What might have been the effect if that had been so, I do not know; but there is not a particle of evidence of that, and there is not the slightest presumption that it is true. On the contrary, there is the strongest possible room for believing that it is not true. It is unintelligible what motive a body like the Presbytery, entrusted with the duty of providing additional ground for the churchyard, could have had for making their intimations intentionally vague in order that the complainer might be deprived of his rights. It is not said that the members of Presbytery had any desire to be buried in this particular spot, or that they had any personal interest whatever in the matter. That averment, therefore, ought not to have been made. There was a long negotiation about the matter before these ultimate proceedings were adopted. There was a meeting of the committee of heritors, at which the complainer was present, on 19th March 1874, and the minute of meeting bears that those present were unanimously of opinion that steps must immediately be taken either for enlarging the present burying-ground, or acquiring ground elsewhere in the parish. A negotiation then took place between a sub-committee of the heritors and Mr Walker for acquiring this very bit of ground, and he did not impugn his previous resolution and opinion that it was necessary to have that ground or some other, and he made no objection to the heritors having that ground on certain terms and conditions. These terms and conditions were rejected as unreasonable. Thereafter, a number of heritors presented a petition to the Presbytery on 6th April 1875, pointing out that the piece of ground in question was the most suitable, and asking the Presbytery to visit and inspect the churchyard, &c. (as narrated at p. 499). There had been a previous meeting of the heritors on 18th March 1875, at which Mr Walker was not present, when an opinion of counsel was submitted, and the clerk was instructed to petition the Presbytery to designate the ground, and on that authority the petition of 6th April was presented. The main reason for noticing that previous meeting is, that the minute of meeting bears in the body of it that there were more than forty heritors in the parish, and consequently the more specific intimation which otherwise would have been requisite was not required. The Presbytery ordained advertisement and intimation to be made. Advertisements were accordingly inserted in the newspapers —[reads]. Intimation was likewise given from the pulpit. It is stated, and is not disputed, that Mr Walker was in church on 18th April when the intimation was made from the pulpit. I need not say that, being a heritor, Mr Walker had perfect access to all the minutes of meetings of the heritors, so that if he had any doubt about their contents he could easily have seen them.

Mar. 1, 1876.

Now, Mr Walker's whole case is founded upon this,—that while it had been distinctly stated at the beginning of the notice, both in the newspapers and in the intimation from the pulpit and on the church doors, that the object and intention was to design and set apart this ground, yet all that, it was understood, the Presbytery were to do, at their meeting on 6th May, was to visit and inspect the churchyard. The whole question thus comes to be whether Mr Walker was not bound to understand, and whether in point of fact he did not understand, that when it was stated the Presbytery were to visit and inspect the churchyard it was meant that they were to do so for the purpose of designating the additional ground, if the heritors who were summoned did not appear to object.

No. 83.

Mar. 1, 1876.
Walker, et al. v. Presbytery of Arbroath, et al.

I do not say there is any bad faith on the part of Mr Walker, as he says there was on the part of the Presbytery, but it is very extraordinary if, after all the negotiations and all the notices, he did not understand that the meeting of 6th May was to be a meeting upon the ground at which the Presbytery might fairly be expected and intended to go on to designate the ground if nobody appeared to object. It is not very usual for a body like the Presbytery to travel backwards and forwards, at their own expense, in this sort of way,—to go simply to see the ground which they knew all about before, and about which the negotiations had taken place, and which all of them were familiar with as being the most convenient piece of ground for the purpose. The heritors had satisfied themselves about all that before, and it does not appear that the Presbytery could have had any doubt about it; and it is quite clear that in point of law and practice Mr Walker was reasonably bound to understand that this proceeding might take place upon that day, and was not intentionally nor even really kept in the dark about it. He could easily have made that clear to his own mind if he had any doubt about it; and on the whole matter I am of opinion that, according to all the law and practice applicable to proceedings of Presbyteries in matters of this kind, the notice to him was quite sufficient, and if that be so, there is an end of the question we are now considering.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—The leading facts from which this case has originated are very simple. It appears that an additional piece of ground was required for burial ground in the parish of Barry. The complainer, Mr Walker, is proprietor of the lands of Ravensby in the parish and in the vicinity of the present burial ground. It does not appear that he is the only proprietor of land so situated as to be available as an addition to the burial ground. The mode by which the land of an heritor can be lawfully taken for the purpose of adding it to burial grounds is by procedure in the Presbytery, in the course of which a judgment of designation, which means a presbyterial setting apart of the land required, is pronounced by the Presbytery. I have no doubt of the jurisdiction of the Presbytery. This judgment of designation is an important step directly affecting the interest of the heritor, and it is all the more important, that by the Act 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 96, sec. 3, it is provided, that, if any heritor be dissatisfied with any order, finding, judgment, or decree of the Presbytery in procedure for such designation, it is competent for the heritor to appeal to the Sheriff within twenty days from the date of the judgment. The complainer, Mr Walker, alleges that his land has been illegally designated, and illegally taken from him, and two questions are presented for determination in this Court—1st, Whether the complainer can be competently heard—whether he is entitled to challenge the proceedings now objected to, or is excluded from challenge because he did not appeal to the Sheriff; and 2d, whether, if the challenge is competent, the proceedings of the Presbytery have been legal, or have been so illegal and irregular as to call for the interposition of this Court to redress a wrong done to the complainer. The two questions have in argument been naturally and perhaps unavoidably mixed, but they are separately stated on record, and have been separately argued, and I think must be separately dealt with.

No. 83.

Mar. 1, 1876. Walker, et al. v. Presbytery of Arbroath, et al.

The Lord Ordinary has held the challenge competent, and being of opinion that the complainer is right on the merits, has accordingly granted interdict as craved. I think that the Lord Ordinary's opinion is right upon both points.

Mr Walker has had his land taken from him without his consent and in his absence. That is the leading and primary fact in this case, the point from which the consideration of the argument must start. The next fact is, that Mr Walker had declined, as he was entitled to decline, to agree to an arrangement. He had declined to part with his lands on the terms proposed to him. He was not only not a consenting party, he was, and was known to be, an opposing party, and the procedure for designation was adopted in order to effect by presbyterial authority what had not been accomplished by arrangement. To me it appears that Mr Walker was just in the position to render it especially becoming and right for the heritors who desired designation of his land, and for the Presbytery whose interposition was craved, to deal carefully and fairly and candidly by him, and to afford him every legitimate opportunity of stating his views and protecting his interests. I think it will appear in the sequel that they did not do so. They have taken his land, certainly without his consent, and, as he alleges, without sufficient notice. The respondents say that the complainer is not entitled to plead the want of notice, because he did not appeal within the period of twenty days from the date of the judgment. They plead that this application is incompetent because he did not appeal. But, looking to the nature of his objection, which is want of notice, this plea of the respondents to exclude his stating it in this Court seems to me to be ill-founded in law, and manifestly so in equity. He says that he would have appealed if he had got notice. He says he got no notice either of the intention to designate on the 6th of May, when, in his absence, the judgment of designation was pronounced by the Presbytery, or of the fact that on 6th of May such judgment of designation had been pronounced. Not having got notice of the intention to crave or decern designation, he was not present when the judgment was pronounced, and not having got notice that the judgment had been pronounced, he did not appeal. Now, the respondents plead that, because he did not appeal, he cannot competently maintain the objection of want of notice. They actually propose to shut out his complaint as incompetent, on the ground that he did not appeal, although the want of notice prevented his appeal.

It is argued that, even if he had got no notice at all, he cannot be heard to complain of it, because he did not appeal. The want of notice prevented appeal. The want of appeal protects the judgment. This is a very singular plea on the part of the respondents. If it were well founded, the result would be, that the party who got no notice could get no redress, and that the respondents, by withholding notice, could create and secure the finality of their own judgment. I cannot understand this. If an heritor, getting no notice, or insufficient notice, has, for want of notice lost, first his land, and then his right to appeal, is he not to be permitted to seek, in this Court, redress against the double loss and the double wrong inflicted by those who ought to have dealt fairly by him, and given him due notice?

To sustain the plea of finality and incompetency of complaint as urged in the first plea in law stated for the respondents, and on that ground to refuse this note, and hold the complainer excluded from stating his case, would, I think, not be just.

I therefore hold the complaint competent, and proceed to consider the complainer's case on its merits. Did the complainer get sufficient notice to support the taking of his land in his absence and without his consent?

In my opinion, the question here involved seriously affects the rights of property. I think it clear, that the land of a British subject, of whatever station, cannot be taken from him in his absence and without his consent, unless he has had such notice of the intention to take his land under judicial authority as to imply his consent from his absence or his silence. But the consent of an absent man, the owner of land to be taken from him by judgment, cannot be lightly inferred. The implication of consent must be clear. In the present case, I think that the implication is not clear, not sufficient, and not safe. The consent of Mr Walker to part with his land cannot be implied from his absence on the 6th of May unless he had distinct notice that, on that day, a judgment of designation was to be craved and pronounced, and this is the more especially important, because it was known that he was non-consenting, and that he had objections to state, and views to explain, on which he was entitled to be heard before judgment of designation was pronounced. I do not intend to occupy your time by again referring to the course of procedure in the Presbytery. We have it all before us, and it has been already explained. I am of opinion that the notice was altogether insufficient,—indeed, I hold that there was no notice at all of the intention to proceed to pronounce a judgment of designation on the 6th of May. There was notice of the existence, though not of the exact terms, of a petition by certain heritors craving the Presbytery to appoint a visit to the parish of Barry, thereafter to visit and inspect the churchyard, and after taking such assistance as might be required to find that the churchyard is no longer sufficient, and then after doing these things to design and set apart so much ground immediately adjoining the churchyard as the complainer's ground does, and to ordain the tenants to remove, and to ascertain the value of the ground and assess the heritors for the same. On the 6th of April 1875 the Presbytery, having considered the petition, resolved to visit and inspect the churchyard on the 6th of May next at one o'clock P.M., with a view to fix upon a piece of ground suitable for designating as an addition to the churchyard, if they shall find the same necessary, and to designate the same. They then proceeded to direct intimation of the petition, and the time fixed for the visit, from the pulpit, on the church door, and by advertisement. It is important to observe that what was directed to be intimated was the petition, the visit for inspection, and the time fixed for the visit, and no intimation was given of any intention to crave, or of any intention to pronounce, on the 6th of May, a judgment of designation of Mr Walker's land. It is not pretended that any notice was given of an intention to proceed on the 6th of May to the formal or final designation of the complainer's ground. Yet that designation was the only really important matter. On the 6th May 1875 the Presbytery, with certain heritors present, but in the absence of Mr Walker, proceeded to inspect, and then and there they pronounced judgment of designation. They inquired if the order for intimation of the petition and of the time of the visit had been implemented, and they were told that that had been done. They were not told, and they could not have been truly told, that any notice had been given of the intention then and there to pronounce judgment of designation. Mr Walker was not present, and was not cited to hear judgment, and it was known that he did not consent, yet in his absence, and with no other notice than that of the existence of the petition, and of the intention to visit and inspect, the respondents proceeded to take his land. So far as I have been able to ascertain, this procedure was not according to the rules and practice of the Church Courts. I do not say that a separate letter of intimation to the complainer was necessary, that being required only in the case of a non-resident heritor. But the procedure is a sequence of separate steps. We have, first, the consideration of the petition, then the visit and inspection, the finding of insufficiency, and of the suitableness of the proposed addition, and then, most important of all, the judgment of designation, a step conclusive against the heritor if he does not appeal. Of that last and most important step no notice whatever was given. The minute bears that the Presbytery further designate and set apart the portion of ground above defined, &c.; and further, the Presbytery ordain the tenants of the land to remove at the next term of Martinmas.

In my humble opinion this judgment of designation by which they laid hold on the complainer's land without his consent, and notwitstanding his declared objection and known opposition which they had previously ascertained, was altogether irregular and illegal. In such a case the suggestion of the private knowledge of Mr Walker as a substitute for the proof of notice seems to me out of the question; but besides, the private knowledge is not proved, and the respondents demand a decision in their favour without proof. The conjecture or suspicion that he may have known can be no ground for judgment. It is said that Mr Walker should have been more alive to his interests, and the maxim vigilantibus non dormientibus jura subveniunt has been appealed to. But surely they who by their conduct have disarmed me and thrown me into a slumber cannot by this maxim maintain the wrong they did when I was asleep. To use the maxim for defence of such a wrong would be a perversion and an abuse of it. I look upon the right which a man has to his land as deserving and requiring the protection of a Court of justice against deprivation contrary to his will or without his consent. Where he has refused that consent, and where contract or arrangement is necessarily excluded, it is only on the very clearest and strongest grounds of law, and on the most regular and orderly procedure, that he can be deprived of his land. That must indeed be a powerful reason which stands at the door of a Court of justice and bids away a subject of this realm complaining of such a wrong. I can see no such reason here. I can see no ground on which we can, without proof, dismiss this complaint of Mr Walker, who alleges that he has been deprived of his land without his consent, in his absence, and without fair notice. The letter of 11th May was written after the designation, and does not state the fact of prior designation.

Nor is this all; within twenty days from the 6th of May Mr Walker had a right of appeal from the judgment of the Presbytery. The fact of the judgment created his interest to appeal; the terms of the judgment were the subject of appeal; the date of the judgment limited the time for appeal. But he got no notice of the fact that judgment of designation had been pronounced, and no notice of the terms of the judgment or of the date of it. Therefore he did not and could not, within the time permitted, take his appeal. He says he presented an appeal, but it was too late. And now, having taken his land in his absence, by means of failing to give notice of the intention to designate, and having cut him out of his appeal by failing to give the subsequent notice of the judgment of designation, the respondents meet his demand for redress in this Court by pleading that the complaint is incompetent, because he did not appeal.

That plea seems to me to have no support in legal principle or authority, and to be signally at variance with justice.

It would be unbecoming in me to say that this is a clear case, because I am aware that I have the misfortune to differ from your Lordships. I have not formed my opinion hastily—I have reconsidered the view which I formed at the debate, and out of my great respect for your Lordships I have endeavoured to reach the conclusion which is satisfactory to you. But I am quite unable to do so. Important principle, legal and constitutional, appears to me to be involved in the questions before us. We are not indeed reviewing, nor can we review, the judgment of the Presbytery; but that judgment relates to part of a landed estate, and we are called on to exercise the high powers, I humbly think the clear powers, of this Court, by interposing to redress a wrong, and to quash as illegal and unjust a deliverance seriously affecting the land rights in Scotland of one of Her Majesty's subjects. To that effect and extent I think we have jurisdiction. It would be unfortunate if we had not.

If this case is decided against Mr Walker on the ground set forth in the first plea in law for the respondents, then his land is gone—taken from him without redress. If this case is decided in favour of Mr Walker, as I think it should, no wrong will have been inflicted, no injustice done, scarcely any inconvenience caused; the result would only be that the Presbytery must resume consideration of the matter, and proceed more regularly and more fairly next time.

LORD MURE.—The question here raised for decision, in the view I take of it, is whether this Court has any jurisdiction to entertain the complaint which has been made to us in this note of suspension; because nothing can be more express than the provisions of the statute 31 and 32 Vict. c. 96, quoted in the record, to the effect that, in the ordinary case, there is no jurisdiction in this Court to entertain questions of this description. The jurisdiction by way of appeal is there given to the Sheriff in all matters relative to the fixing and designating of churchyards or glebes, or matters of that sort, before a Presbytery; and a Court of review having thus been provided by the statute, every other mode of review is expressly shut out. The jurisdiction of the Presbytery, moreover, to deal with these matters is distinctly recognised in the statute. In these circumstances the question which we have to consider is whether there is anything in the proceedings in this case which has been done in violation of the statute referred to, or of the ordinary rules of procedure in Presbyteries, which can warrant us in saying that the course adopted has been so utterly irregular and incompetent that we must step in as the Supreme Court, and quash the whole proceedings. Because I apprehend it to be perfectly settled law, that, where there are such clauses as those in the statute here in question, this Court cannot touch the proceedings of a Presbytery, unless there has been either some violation of the statutory procedure, or some such flagrant departure from the ordinary rules of procedure in Presbyteries, as will make it imperative upon us to hold that the proceedings must be quashed. Now, the only one of the grounds of objection on which this complaint is rested, with which we have here to deal, is the alleged want of due notice to the complainer of what was intended to be done upon the petition of the heritors. I understand that there are other objections to the procedure, although these were not argued before us. The Lord Ordinary has dealt with that one question; and the point for consideration is whether there is anything in the proceedings following upon the petition so irregular and illegal as to entitle us to interfere.

No. 83.

I do not mean to detain your Lordships by going over the details of the case. I concur with your Lordship in the chair, and with Lord Deas, in holding that nothing has been laid before us by way of objection to the proceedings which would warrant us in interfering. It may be unfortunate that the complainer did not take his appeal under the statute to the Sheriff; but he is only entitled to ask us to quash the proceedings and give him redress if there have been irregularities of the nature to which I have referred. Now, the plea in law which the complainer mainly rests upon is this—that the "pretended designation and valuation of the ground in question are inept and not binding on the complainer, in respect that they were made in his absence and without intimation, or, at all events, without any lawful or sufficient intimation to him."

In dealing with this question we cannot, in my opinion, shut out of view the fact that it is plain to demonstration that, for months before the proceedings were taken, the complainer was well aware that this particular piece of ground was required by the rest of the heritors with a view to add to the churchyard. Negotiations to that effect had been going on for a considerable portion of the year 1874. At one time the complainer had consented to the ground being taken on certain terms; but ultimately the parties could not agree about it, and the negotiations fell through. A meeting of heritors was accordingly held on the 18th of March 1875, which bears to have been duly called by intimation from the pulpit and advertisement in the newspapers, and which the complainer was therefore summoned to attend, for the consideration of the question, whether a petition should be presented to the Presbytery with a view to have the piece of ground in dispute set apart for the churchyard. The minute bears that the whole heritors were called to this meeting. The complainer, however, did not attend; and a petition having been resolved on, the one now in question was drawn up in the usual form and laid before the Presbytery. It was thereafter duly intimated from the pulpit; and it is admitted by the complainer that he was present and heard the intimation made. Now, in a parish which consists as this parish does of a large number of heritors, no other intimation is required, according to the usual practice and procedure of Presbyteries, than intimation from the pulpit, and on the church doors, advertisements in the newspapers, and the sending of letters to absent heritors, which, I understand from the books of practice, means non-resident heritors.

The notice on the church door was in these terms—"That a petition had been presented to the Presbytery of Arbroath craving them to set apart the piece of ground immediately adjoining the churchyard upon the north, or other suitable piece of ground, for an addition to the same; and that the Presbytery are to visit and inspect the churchyard on Thursday, the 6th of May next, at one o'clock afternoon, at which time the heritors and all concerned, or persons duly authorised to act for them, are requested to attend." There is here no limitation as regards what the Presbytery are to do on that day. It is an intimation that they are to visit and inspect the churchyard, evidently with a view to the designation and setting apart of the piece of ground in question; because it sets forth that the petition had been presented to them to set apart that particular piece of ground, and that the Presbytery are to visit and inspect the churchyard with a view to the setting apart of that ground. I see no limitation in that intimation to the effect that they were to confine themselves to visiting and inspecting on that particular day. It is to visit and inspect with a view to designate and set apart. That is the fair import of the intimation when read with reference to the petition. And similar notices are put into the public newspapers. In these circumstances, the complainer being quite aware of the object of the petition, and having heard that intimation made from the pulpit, coupled with a request that the heritors should attend, or send persons duly authorised to act for them, does not go to the meeting. The Presbytery make their inspection. There is apparently no opposition, and they proceed to designate the ground. But some further proceedings being necessary before any final steps could be taken in the matter, they appoint a valuator to report on the value of the ground, and another meeting is fixed for the 17th of May. On the 6th of May, therefore, the meeting is adjourned to the 17th, and parties are appointed to be called in the usual way to that meeting. The intention of the Presbytery to meet on the 17th of May is admitted by the complainer to have been intimated to him on the 11th in the following terms,—"The Reverend the Presbytery of Arbroath will meet at Barry on Monday, the 17th inst., within the parish church at Barry, at 1.30 P.M., to take further steps towards the making an addition to the churchyard at Barry, which meeting your are requested to attend." Now, I think it impossible to read this notice without seeing that this gentleman was put distinctly on his guard that, under a petition presented to the Presbytery in the usual form, the Presbytery were on the 17th of May to take further steps than those which had been taken on the 6th with a view to the addition to the churchyard. But he does not go to the meeting. Why, we do not see. Now, all this is done in accordance with the usual mode of giving notice by Presbyteries of proceedings before them, as I understand the style books. But it is said, under the second plea in law, that the proceeding being in absence and without any notice it is illegal. I cannot so view it. If critical objections of this description had been taken before the Court of appeal appointed by the statute I think it doubtful whether any of them could have been entertained. We are, however, here dealing with parties who have followed the usual form of proceedings by intimation from the pulpit, on the church doors, and by advertisement in the newspapers, and who, in this particular case, have been so careful as to send a special notice to the complainer of the meeting on the 17th of May. If he had gone to that meeting as requested he would have ascertained the exact position of matters, and could have taken his appeal against everything which had been done upon the 6th as well as on the 17th of May; so that it is simply in consequence of his wilful absence from the meeting on the 17th, to which he was duly and specially cited, that he has found himself in the difficulty in which he now says he has been placed.

I therefore concur in opinion with your Lordship and Lord Deas that we cannot interfere in this case on the grounds stated in the second plea in law.

THE COURT, on 18th February 1876, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor in hoc statu: Repel the second plea in law for the complainers, and decern, and appoint parties to be heard on their remaining pleas, reserving in the meantime all questions of expenses."

The complainers then argued that the proceedings of the Presbytery were irregular, because they had ordained the tenant to remove, which they had no jurisdiction to do. Such a proceeding ought to have been brought in the Court of Session where the tenant would have appeared as a party.[1] Further, they had made no valuation of his interest, and awarded him no compensation.

The respondents argued;—The style of the order of the Presbytery was the same as the established style for the designation of glebes.[2] Admittedly the Presbytery had no executorial power, but they could obtain it at once by coming to the Court.[3] The tenant's interest was not left out of view in the valuation. But, at all events, it was still open to him to claim it. It was not the practice of Presbyteries to deal with subordinate interests such as those of tenants, bondholders, and superiors separately, but to leave it to the parties to arrange among themselves.

Lord President.—The complainer Mr Walker, and his tenant James Dargie, now contend that the proceedings of the Presbytery at two meetings on the 6th and 17th May 1875 were irregular. We have already held that the objection which Mr Walker took, that he had not sufficient notice of the intention of the Presbytery to designate the ground belonging to him for an addition to the churchyard, is ill-founded; and we have also already intimated our opinion, that seeing the proceedings of the Presbytery in a matter of this kind are final unless an appeal is taken to the Sheriff, we cannot interfere with those proceedings in the way of review, but only set them aside in the event of its being made out to our satisfaction that there is an excess of jurisdiction, or something equivalent to it. Now, keeping that in view, I am really quite unable to see any irregularity in the proceedings either at the one meeting or at the other. The deliverances of the Presbytery and the whole proceedings, as embodied in the minutes, appear to me to be in strict conformity to the order of practice of a Presbytery in such cases. They are in accordance with the style given in the ordinary styles of the Church Courts, not indeed that there is any special style applicable to this particular matter of designating ground for an addition to the churchyard, but there are styles for designating ground for other ecclesiastical property, such as a glebe or the site of a church, and these are styles applicable mutatis mutandis to a case of this kind; and when we find that the proceedings before us are quite in accordance with such styles, it is a serious matter for us to say that there is here an excess of jurisdiction, or such a departure from the ordinary and universally recognised rules of procedure in all Courts that we can interfere to set them aside. But apart from that altogether, it rather appears to me that the Presbytery have done nothing more than was absolutely necessary in order to work out their own jurisdiction. The ground being set apart for the purpose of forming an addition to the churchyard, it follows of necessity that both the owner and his tenant, if it is on lease, must be dispossessed, and it follows further that the ground must be taken possession of by the heritors of the parish and converted into a burying-ground; and these seem to me to be the only things that have been done by the Presbytery. No doubt one part of the first minute is an order upon the tenant to remove. Well, that seems to me to be quite right. It was said that this was an assumption of jurisdiction which was beyond the powers of the Presbytery, because they had no jurisdiction to remove a tenant; but all that they have done is to appoint this man to remove. They cannot put that decree into execution, and in that sense it is not a decree at all. It can only be enforced by application to a Court of civil jurisdiction; and if any plea occurs to enable the tenant to resist the enforcement of the decree he can still maintain it, though I do not perceive that any such plea would be open to him.

Again, it is said that in valuing with a view to reimburse the owner for his loss, the tenant's compensation has not been duly attended to. Now, it certainly has not been left out of view, because in the second minute it clearly appears that the valuator embraced in his estimate of the value of the land the unexhausted manures on the ground, and that looks very like part of the tenant's compensation. But the plain answer to all that appears to me to be this, that as this proceeding has not yet come to an end before the Presbytery, it is quite open to the tenant still to ask the Presbytery to reconsider his claim for compensation. The matter is not ended by any means; there remains a good deal to be done, and there is nothing to prevent the Presbytery from reconsidering that matter if the tenant can satisfy them that there is some portion of his claim to compensation that has not been fully considered; and so, upon the whole matter, it appears to me that there is nothing to find fault with in these proceedings of the Presbytery.

LORD DEAS and LORD ARDMILLAN concurred.

LORD MURE.—The questions now raised present themselves to my mind very much in the same way as the larger question which we formerly disposed of. This Court has no jurisdiction to deal with cases of this description, unless it be shewn that there is some gross violation of statutory or common law rules. Otherwise this Court has no right to review in any respect the proceedings of a Presbytery. The points here raised are irregularity and excess of power in ordering the tenant to remove. Now, what the Presbytery here did was simply to ordain the tenant to remove. As pointed out by Lord Deas, they could not take an operative course to turn the tenant out as the civil Courts could do; but the order to remove is just the usual order pronounced, according to the styles of the Church Courts given in Dr Cook's book, in all questions of designating manses or glebes. If there was any impropriety or unfairness in that, it was a matter to be disposed of by the Sheriff on appeal. What, therefore, we are here asked to do is to review the judgment of the Presbytery in ordaining the tenant to remove; but that is a matter for appeal to the Sheriff.

As regards the compensation to the tenant, our interference would be still more questionable. The point raised is just whether the Presbytery, in valuing the landlord's interest in the ground, valued properly the interest of the tenant. But my view of that matter is that it is a question on the merits; and that we cannot form, or at all events act upon, any opinion we may have as to whether the Presbytery did right or wrong on that question, because we have no jurisdiction to deal with it.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Repel the reasons of suspension, refuse the interdict, and decern: Find the complainers liable in expenses," &c.

ANDREW STEUART, Pursuer.—J. G. Smith—R. V. Campbell.
JOHN CHARLES EARL OF SEAFIELD, Defender.—D.-F. Watson—Kinnear.

*Public Burdens—Clause of Relief—School-Rates—*35 and 36 Vict. c. 62, Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, secs. 43 and 44.—In a disposition the granter bound himself to free and relieve the disponee of inter alia "all schoolmaster's salary and road-money payable for the lands and others hereby disponed, from henceforth and in all time coming."

Held (diss. Lord Deas) that the obligation to relieve of schoolmaster's salary did not apply to school-rates imposed under the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872.

Public Burden—Clause of Relief—Road-Money.—Held by Lord Young that the general assessment imposed under the Banffshire Roads Act, 1866, was covered by the obligation to relieve of "road-money."

1ST DIVISION. Lord Young. B.

ANDREW STEUART of Auchlunkart purchased in 1861 from the Earl of Seafield the lands of Russelhall and others at the price of £3505, and, in 1867, a portion of the lands of Belnabreich, at the price of £981, 12s.

The Earl granted dispositions of these lands in favour of Mr Steuart, "his heirs and assignees whomsoever," each containing the following clause:—"And I bind myself to free and relieve the said Andrew Steuart and his foresaids of all feu-duties, casualties, and public burdens payable for the said subjects prior to . . . . ; and also to free and relieve him and his foresaids, and the lands and others hereby disponed, of all cess or land-tax, minister's stipend, schoolmaster's salary, and road-money payable for the lands and others hereby so disponed, from henceforth and in all time coming: And I grant warrandice."

In 1866 the Banffshire Roads Act, 1866, was passed abolishing tolls in the county of Banff, and in that part of Elgin containing the lands of Russelhall and Belnabreich above mentioned, and introducing a general assessment for the maintenance of the roads and bridges in the district in lieu of the tolls, and of all statute-labour conversion-money and other road-money previously collected.

In 1872 the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, came into operation.

The Earl of Seafield having refused to relieve Mr Steuart of the amount of assessment laid upon him under the Banffshire Roads Act, 1866, and of the amount of school-rate imposed under the Education Act, 1872, as not falling under the clause of relief in the dispositions, the pursuer brought this action to recover these assessments, and for declarator "that under and in virtue of the said obligations of relief the defender is bound to free and relieve the pursuer and the said lands and others henceforth in all time coming of all road-money or assessments under 'the Banffshire Roads Act, 1866,' falling upon the pursuer as proprietor or owner of the lands respectively conveyed to him by the said two dispositions; and further, of all school-rates under 'the Education (Scotland), Act, 1872,' falling upon the pursuer as such owner; or failing decree being obtained as to the whole of such school-rates, then of such proportion thereof as our said Lords may fix and determine."

The defender denied his liability in relief as concluded for.

The Lord Ordinary, on 14th July 1875, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds and declares that, under and in virtue of the obligations of relief libelled, the defender is bound to free and relieve the pursuer and the lands libelled of all road-money paid, or which may hereafter become payable, for the said lands, under the Banffshire Roads Act, 1866; and declares that money paid or payable under assessments duly imposed by virtue of the said Act, in respect of the ownership of said lands, shall be regarded as road-money within the meaning of said obligations of relief and of this decree: Decerns against the defender for payment of the several sums of road-money libelled as already paid by the pursuer under the said Act, with interest as concluded for: With respect to the other conclusions of the action—viz. those relating to school-rates under the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872—assoilzies the defender, and decerns: Finds no expenses due to either party." *

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—On a consideration of the series of statutes relating to parochial education in Scotland it was manifest that the Education Act of 1872 introduced no new system, but merely modified the old. Formerly the parochial schoolmaster received his remuneration from three sources—the school fees, which he was allowed to collect; the Government grant, when earned; and his fixed salary from the heritors holding lands of £100 valued rent. To these a fourth source might sometimes be added—namely, endowments. The obligation of the heritors was to contribute this portion of the schoolmaster's salary, and, in addition, to provide and maintain the school buildings and schoolmaster's house. The clause of relief from "schoolmaster's salary" contained in dispositions, such as those libelled, had always been interpreted to embrace relief from all obligations and liabilities of a heritor as to

* "OPINION.—With respect to the conclusions of the action relating to road-money, I am of opinion that money payable under assessments authorised by the Banffshire Roads Act, 1866, is road-money within the meaning of the obligations of relief in both deeds libelled. The road-money payable under the Act is probably of larger amount than the road-money payable before the Act by reason of the increased number or length of the roads to be maintained, and the abolition of tolls as a source of income; but it is the same tax, however, and, from whatever cause, the amount of it may be increased or diminished.

"With respect to the school-rate under the Education Act, 1872, I am of opinion that it is not 'schoolmaster's salary' within the meaning of the obligations of relief. By the law prior to the Act, 1872, a limited number of the heritors of each parish—viz. the valued rent heritors—were bound to provide a salary for a schoolmaster within a certain statutory maximum. The defender was a valued rent heritor, and his obligation to relieve the pursuer (his feuar) of schoolmaster's salary for his feu imported only that he would continue to pay the whole amount of the salary payable on the valued rent of his lands in the parish, without asking any contribution or relief in respect of the feu which he had given off. By the Act of 1872 the valued rent heritors are no longer required to provide a salary for a schoolmaster. The expense of the educational establishment instituted under that Act in each parish is defrayed out of a school fund, for which provision is made, and which in any particular parish may or may not, as it happens, be sufficient for the purpose without the aid of a school-rate. In the event (no doubt the usual event) of a deficiency in any year, a school-rate to an amount sufficient to supply it is authorised. Such a rate to supply a deficiency in the school fund of a parish has a very different incidence from the schoolmaster's salary, of which the defender undertook to relieve the pursuer, for it has the same incidence as the poors-rate, in assessing for which no distinction is made of valued rent heritors or account taken of valued rent. Nor is it a rate for schoolmaster's salary in any other sense than this, that it is to supply an ascertained deficiency in a catholic fund, out of which all charges connected with the execution of the Act, including the remuneration of teachers, are paid. The deficiency to be supplied may in any year be largely or even wholly attributable to a school board election, the expense of which is payable out of the school fund. The school-rate under the Act of 1872 is thus, as I regard it, quite distinguishable from the schoolmaster's salary payable by the valued rent heritors under the prior law, and I cannot extend to it the obligations of relief on which the pursuer founds. He is a ratepayer under a new system of national education, according to which also he is, as a ratepayer, an elector of the managing board of the district in which he is rated."

schools in the parish, in respect of the lands disponed. The Act of 1872 introduced two material changes. The schoolmaster was no longer to receive his remuneration from different sources, but was to receive a slump salary from the school fund. The school fund was to consist of the school fees, the Government grant, the produce of endowments, and the rate levied on the householders in the parish to make up any deficiency in the fund. From the widening of the area of taxation the old valued rent heritors received a considerable benefit, but that was not to defeat the pursuer's claim of relief. When the matter was looked into more closely it was seen that the present school-rate was just the equivalent of the old assessment for the schoolmaster's salary, together with any assessment required for school buildings, &c. An apparent difference was introduced by the school board collecting the school fees and receiving the Government grant, instead of the schoolmaster receiving them directly as formerly. But it left matters the same in the end. The deficiency of the "school fund," for which the school rate was levied, was just the amount of the old schoolmaster's salary and the cost of maintenance of buildings. The only thing that created any new charge was the cost of the school board election; but that did not introduce such a change as to render it possible to hold that the Education Act, 1872, introduced an entirely new tax, which was not in contemplation of the parties in 1861 and 1867, when the deeds founded on were granted. The analogy of the Poor-Law Amendment Act, 1845, and the decisions pronounced under it, was conclusive in favour of the pursuer's argument.[1] Even if it could be held that a change had been introduced, and that the school-rate was not the equivalent of the schoolmaster's salary, still a portion of it at least was so. That portion could be easily determined by ascertaining how much was paid to the schoolmaster in name of salary, over and above the amount of school fees collected, of the Government grant, and of endowments, and dividing the rate laid on the pursuer in the proportion which that sum bore to the whole produce of the rate levied.

Argued for the defender;—The burden imposed on owners and occupiers of lands and heritages under the Act of 1872 was quite different from that imposed upon the valued rent heritors by the previous Acts. All these previous Acts were repealed. There was no longer any special provision made for schoolmaster's salary. What was provided was a catholic fund, upon which a great many different charges, some of them quite new, were laid. It was only to supply any deficiency of this catholic fund to meet these charges that a school-rate was to be levied. This was a very different thing from dividing the schoolmaster's salary among the valued rent heritors. The incidence of the new assessment was quite different. Its purposes were quite different. It could not be held to have been within the contemplation of parties, in entering into the contract of sale on which the disposition was granted, and it was not therefore covered by the clause of relief. Nor was it possible to give the pursuer the alternative relief which he asked. If practicable at all, which was very doubtful, that could not be done without an elaborate accounting, to be repeated every year, and at an expense quite beyond the value of the matter in dispute.[2]

Mar. 1, 1876. Steuart v. Earl of Seafield.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The object of this action is to have it declared that the lands mentioned in the summons are, in virtue of a clause of relief contained in the pursuer's titles, to be relieved by the defender of certain parochial and public burdens, one of them being the road-money, or assessments under the Banffshire Roads Act, 1866, and the other being school-rates under the Education Act of 1872.

The Lord Ordinary has found that the defender "is bound to relieve the pursuer and the lands libelled of all road-money paid, or which may hereafter become payable for the said lands, under the Banffshire Roads Act, 1866." But in regard to the education rate he has found the opposite; and with respect to the conclusions of the action relating to school-rates under the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, has assoilzied the defender. The defender has acquiesced in the first part of the Lord Ordinary's judgment, but the pursuer has reclaimed against the second part. That, therefore, raises the only question which is now before us.

The clauses of relief which form the basis of the action are contained in two dispositions, which proceeded upon the sale of two parcels of land by Lord Seafield to Mr Steuart. These are not feu-dispositions or contracts, as the Lord Ordinary appears to have taken for granted, but dispositions in the ordinary form for a price paid; and certainly it is singular to find clauses of this kind in such deeds. The granter undertakes only a personal obligation of relief,—"I bind myself to free and relieve." The obligation of relief imposes no burden on any heritable subject, and the question, whether the obligation would be transmitted against a singular successor, is a question which the terms of the clauses necessarily suggest to the mind, and which, if raised, as it fortunately is not here, would present considerable difficulty. The terms of the dispositions and clauses of relief therein contained shew that there is something very special and peculiar in the case. At the same time, I do not think that this affects the construction of the clauses of relief themselves. I think we may consider them, as the Lord Ordinary has done, just as if they occurred in an ordinary feu-disposition.

The words of the clauses are—"I bind myself . . . . to free and relieve him (i.e., the said Andrew Steuart) and his foresaids (i.e., his heirs and assignees whomsoever), and the lands and others hereby disponed, of all cess or land tax, minister's stipend, schoolmaster's salary, and road-money payable for the lands and others hereby so disponed, from henceforth and in all time coming." The two dispositions themselves are dated in 1861 and 1867 respectively, and we must first consider the meaning of the term "schoolmaster's salary" at the date at which they were granted—that is, before the passing of the Education Act, 1872.

The state of the law prior to the passing of the Education Act, 1872, was, that the schoolmaster's salary was a burden on a very limited class of heritors, namely, those who held lands valued at not less than £100 of valued rent. That limited class sustained the whole burden of the schoolmaster's salary. They were also liable to provide and maintain the school buildings and schoolmaster's house. On the other hand, they enjoyed certain privileges in consideration of these burdens. They had the right of appointment of the schoolmaster, and they had the right of supervision of the school. But by the Act of 1872 the parochial schools were taken entirely out of the hands of this limited class of heritors, whose whole rights and privileges in the matter were abolished, and their whole liabilities extinguished. They are no longer liable to pay any part of the schoolmaster's salary on the ground that they are proprietors of lands valued at £100 of valued rent. There is no longer any such incidence of taxation. The burden of the schoolmaster's salary is not transferred as a separate burden to any class of proprietors at all. It is to be paid for the future out of the general school fund, as defined by sections 43 and 44 of the Act. The persons to be subjected to taxation are totally different. They are a much more extensive class than that which formerly bore the burden of the schoolmaster's salary. The school rate to be levied when required is to be laid on all owners and occupiers of lands and heritages in the parish. Instead of embracing only the few valued rent heritors, as we may term them, the incidence of the tax is now to fall upon all the inhabitants of the parish, or at least upon all the householders. It even goes further than that, for the definition of lands and heritages in the Valuation Act of 1854, which rules the matter, is of the most comprehensive kind. It includes "all lands, houses, shootings and deer forests (where such shootings and deer forests are actually let), fishings, woods, copse and underwood from which revenue is actually derived, ferries, piers, harbours, quays, wharfs, docks, canals, railways, mines, minerals, quarries, coal-works, water-works, lime-works, brick-works, iron-works, gas-works, factories, and all buildings and pertinents thereof, and all machinery fixed or attached to any lands or heritages." And not merely are these enumerated subjects liable to taxation, but every kind of beneficial interest in them is also a direct subject of taxation. It has even been carried this length, that a water company has been subjected to taxation in respect that its pipes ran under the soil of the parish. Nothing, therefore, could well be more extensive than the class of persons subjected to the tax.

Now, that itself is one very considerable difference between the old assessment, termed schoolmaster's salary, and the new one, termed education rate. But there are other points which shew a still greater distinction. The education rate is not laid on for the purpose of paying the schoolmaster's salary. The only authority which the school board have for requiring the parochial board to levy a school-rate for them is the 43d section of the Act, which says that "any deficiency" of the school fund to meet the burdens imposed on it by the Act "shall be raised by the school board, as provided for by this Act,"—i.e., by the 44th section. But if the school fund is sufficient to meet those demands upon it, the school board has no right to require the parochial board to lay on an assessment. Now, the Government grant forms a constituent part of the school fund. So also do the school fees. There may be gifts and mortifications, the revenue of which will add to its amount. After taking all these elements of income into account, there may be no need for an assessment at all. It is, perhaps, hardly to be expected that this should be so at first, because the necessary outlay in buildings in most parishes has been large, but it may come to be the case in many parishes in after years. Now, it is only to supply the deficiency of the school fund, after taking all these elements of income into account, that there is any authority given to lay on an assessment.

Moreover, the school fund is applicable to a great many purposes. It is applicable to the maintenance of buildings. It is applicable to pay interest on debt. It is applicable to pay the expenses of the election of the school board and all the ordinary costs of management. In short, it is applicable to a great many purposes never heard of under the old system. True, it may also be applied to furnish the schoolmaster's salary. But it does not necessarily follow that the schoolmaster's salary is paid out of the school-rate. If paid in the ordinary way, it is paid by appropriating a sum out of the school fund—that is, out of the aggregate fund. But, on the other hand, it may be laid as a special burden on one part of the school funds. There is nothing to prevent that. For instance, the whole school fees might be applied as an adequate remuneration to the schoolmaster. Could it then be said that the schoolmaster's salary was paid out of the produce of the rate, or that the rate was the same as the schoolmaster's salary before the passing of the Education Act, 1872? Therefore the nature of the new tax is totally different from that of the former one. Its incidence is also totally different. The purposes to which it is applicable are different. The schoolmaster's salary, instead of absorbing the whole of the assessment, may or may not be now paid, in whole or in part, out of the produce of the rate, just as the board may order.

On the other hand, the schoolmaster in the present day is in a totally different position from the parochial schoolmaster before 1872. Before the Act of 1872 came into operation the parochial schoolmaster was a public officer of importance. His office was a munus publicum. His duty was not confined to teaching. He had a great many other statutory functions,—for instance, under the Militia Act; under the Act of William IV., making him depositary of all documents appointed to be published by the standing orders of either Houses of Parliament; under the Railways and Lands Clauses Acts, making him depositary of plans, &c. All these were public functions belonging to a proper public official. But what are the duties of the schoolmaster under the present system? He has nothing whatever to do but teach. Section 76 of the Education Act makes that quite plain. All the duties of the parochial schoolmaster, such as those I have mentioned, "not relating to teaching," are transferred to the registrar of the parish. Further, he is no longer schoolmaster of the parish. There may be more than one, and they may be all of equal rank. We are no longer, therefore, dealing with a schoolmaster in the same position as the parochial schoolmaster held prior to 1872.

There is, therefore, on both these grounds, no longer any such tax upon land as schoolmaster's salary. The education rate is a totally different tax altogether.

In the course of the argument reference was made to a class of cases supposed to favour the pursuer's view. It was contended that the tax under the Act of 1872 was merely continuing in a different form the tax previously existing, in the same way as the present poor-rates, under the Act of 1845, is merely the continuance in a different form of the previous assessment. If the cases on the question of poor-rates were applicable to the present they would be conclusive, but I cannot admit the analogy. The ground of judgment on which it was held that the present poor-rate was the same tax as the assessment formerly imposed is better stated in the opinion of Lord Wood in the case of Hunter v. Chalmers (20 D. 1315) than anywhere else:—"I think that the claim of relief, which would otherwise have been competent is not destroyed or invalidated by the Act 8 and 9 Vict. c. 83. The burden of which relief is demanded is not a new burden introduced by that statute. It is a burden to which the owners of lands, as such, were subject, and which was exigible in respect of the laws existing at the time the original feu-contract was entered into, the Act, so far as regards the assessment for the support of the poor, only regulating the mode of assessment, and pointing out the different ways in which it may be imposed. In all of them the assessment is to be imposed to a greater or less extent on lands and heritages, or the owners or occupants thereof; and it is only for that portion of the assessment that relief is here asked. Had the assessment in question been one on means and substance the objection to the claim would have stood upon a different ground. But as that is not the case, and the burden not being one which, in respect of the Poor-Law Amendment Act, can be held to be a burden imposed by a supervening law, there is no room for maintaining that it could not be in the contemplation of the parties when the obligation of relief was granted, and therefore cannot, upon a fair reading of its meaning, be found to be included in it." Now, there it is observed that the tax levied under the Act of 1845 is a tax precisely of the same nature, imposed on heritable subjects, and applicable to the same objects as the former assessment. That case, therefore, stands in direct contrast to the present.

But the pursuer also contended that, even if not entitled to relief of the whole education rate, he was entitled to relief at least of so much of it as was applicable to the schoolmaster's salary. I cannot, however, entertain even that contention, for the reasons which I have already sufficiently explained. The school-rate is not necessarily applicable to the schoolmaster's salary at all. It may be one year, and it may not the next. The proportion of the rate applicable in one year to the schoolmaster's salary may, and generally will be, different from that applicable in any other year. If so, in order to entertain this claim, you must have an accounting every year to adjust the proportion of the education rate from which the pursuer is entitled to be relieved. Such inquiry is quite out of the question. Unless it is a burden which can fairly fall as a whole under the same category as the former assessment for schoolmaster's salary there can be no valid claim of relief.

Lord Deas.—We are quite familiar with clauses of relief of this kind in deeds between superior and vassal, and they have sometimes entailed considerable hardship on the superior. But that has never been allowed to interfere with the enforcement of the obligation. It is, however, new to find an obligation of this kind in an ordinary disposition by a seller to a purchaser, which last is the position of Mr Steuart under these deeds. He bought the lands partly in 1861 and partly in 1867. He paid a sum of between £3000 and £4000 for the first portion, and about £900 for the second portion. He says that these prices were in each case above the market value of the land in consideration of this obligation of relief. There may be some doubt about that, but the presumption, at any rate, is that he paid value for all he got. The Earl of Seafield is the granter of the deeds; and, although, when you come to the obligation of relief, it bears to be by the Earl without adding his heirs and successors, I can have no doubt that it is binding upon his representatives. When a man binds himself, he binds his heirs and successors. The obligation is in favour of the pursuer, his heirs, and assignees, in express words.

The obligation itself is perfectly clear. It is an obligation to free and relieve Mr Steuart, and his heirs and assignees, and the lands disponed, of, inter alia, schoolmaster's salary. But it is contented that there is no longer any schoolmaster's salary payable out of the lands. This is, I think, a difficult plea to maintain. There is a schoolmaster—and, I think, a parochial schoolmaster. He may not, indeed, be any longer a public officer in the sense in which parochial schoolmasters were formerly public officers. But he is a schoolmaster entitled to a salary, and that salary is a burden to some extent at least upon the lands, although in the shape of an education rate.

It is very difficult to see how, under these circumstances, this clause of relief which must be held to have been paid for under an onerous contract, is to be rendered entirely valueless. Why is the grantee not to have implement of the clause by getting relief from the rate levied out of his lands, so far as applicable to schoolmaster's salary? There may be a difficulty in ascertaining what part of the salary is paid from the rate, or rather, what portion of the rate is applicable to the salary, but I do not see why that difficulty, which seems by no means insurmountable, should be allowed to defeat the clause of relief altogether. The fact that the schoolmaster is no longer a public officer can have nothing to do with the matter. I quite admit the practical difficulty of ascertaining the precise amount of which the pursuer falls to be relieved; but I cannot get over the fact that the schoolmaster's salary is paid, at least in part, out of a rate levied on the land.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I concur with the Lord Ordinary in the view which he has taken of this case, both as regards the part of his decision which is favourable to the pursuer, and the part of his decision which is favourable to the defender. The only question seriously raised relates to the second part of the interlocutor, being that in regard to the obligation of Lord Seafield in the disposition granted by him to Mr Steuart in 1861, wherein his Lordship binds himself to free and relieve Mr Steuart and his lands of "schoolmaster's salary." A similar clause is in the disposition of other lands in 1867. I do not rely on the special and rather unusual peculiarity of the obligation of relief,—that it occurs in a disposition, and not in a feu-contract.

The Lord Ordinary has assoilzied the defender from the conclusions of the action in so far as relating to this particular obligation. At the date of the obligation the pursuer was an heritor on valued rent, bound to provide a salary for a schoolmaster up to a certain statutory amount. His obligation to pay the salary to the schoolmaster was direct, and was laid on him as heritor in respect of and in proportion to his valued rent. It was a rate or tax chargeable on the valued rent, and it was for the direct and definite purpose of remunerating the schoolmaster, and was payable to the schoolmaster. Since then the position and the obligation of the pursuer has undergone a most important change; changed also is the incidence of the tax on his land, and the nature of the tax itself, and the position and relations of the schoolmaster. The pursuer, as a heritor, no longer pays the schoolmaster's salary charged on the valued rent. There is no such charge, and no such payment. He pays his proportion, as a ratepayer in a new and wide class, of a general school-rate charged on the real rent, and administered and distributed and applied by a public board in promoting the purposes of primary education. It may, or it may not, happen that the rate or part of the rate he pays is applied to the remuneration of the schoolmaster. He does not pay directly any schoolmaster's salary. The obligation of relief has regard to the incidence of the rate or tax, rather than to its distribution—to the primary purposes of its enforcement, rather than to the ultimate purposes of its application. As a charge on the pursuer the school-rate under the Education Act is not a charge for schoolmaster's salary, nor is it a charge on the valued rent of his land; but, supplemental and auxiliary to other funds, it is a general school-rate for the district; it is charged on real property, and applied to many purposes. It is not reasonable to expect that a Court of law shall trace out the administration of school funds, gathered from many sources, and raised under statutory authority for many purposes, in order to see whether any or what part of it may have reached the schoolmaster in the shape of salary. It is quite uncertain how much of the school-rate may so reach the schoolmaster, because the school fund under the statute is not entirely composed of school-rates, but is drawn from other sources as well as from the rate, and indeed the school-rate is raised to supply a deficiency. It is quite possible that the schoolmaster may be otherwise remunerated, and that no part of the rate paid by the pursuer may be applied in paying the schoolmaster's salary, or rather the teacher's salary, for that is the word used in the statute. The incidence of the tax, and its character and quality when exacted, is far more important in this question than the distribution of the tax, and its character and quality when administered.

I am not prepared to say that the change from valued rent to real rent, if in other respects the charge had retained its former character, would of itself have been sufficient for decision of this question. But it is an element in the consideration of the question, and is not without some degree of weight. The assessment under the Poor-Law Act is, in my view, quite different from the school-rate. Your Lordship's explanations on this point are most important, and I entirely concur in them. I agree with the Lord Ordinary in holding that the nature of the rate is different, and that payment into a fund out of which all charges connected with the execution of the Act of Parliament are to be met —the remuneration of teachers being one of them—is not payment of schoolmaster's salary within the meaning of Lord Seafield's obligation of relief. There is truly no rate or tax exigible under the present law which can be correctly termed a rate or tax for the specific purpose of paying schoolmaster's salary. Since the application of part of the school-rate to that purpose is not a necessary nor a certain application of the rate, it cannot give a character to the rates, which form only part of the general fund. This school-rate, paid in respect of assessment on real rent, is one of several streams which flow into a general fund. The administration of that fund is in the hands of a public board, and it is applied to many purposes—to other purposes than the remuneration of teachers. We know not what part of the entire expenditure for various purposes is met by one of the several streams which form the fund, and to attempt, in every case where such a question is raised, to trace each stream, and to eliminate the application of each particular part of the fund, seems to me to be out of the question.

I think, accordingly, that we should adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

Lord Mure.—In the leading conclusion of this summons the pursuer asks for relief of the whole school-rates imposed upon the lands in question. He no doubt qualifies this by adding "or of such proportion thereof as the Court may determine." But the broad conclusion is the leading one, and it is, I think, untenable; because the school-rate is levied, not in order to pay the schoolmaster's salary, but to supply any deficiency there may be in the general school fund to meet the various calls which may be made upon it.

At the discussion, however, the pursuer took the lower ground, and restricted his claim to relief of that portion of the rate which was applicable to the schoolmaster's salary. This raises a more difficult question, because the terms of the clause of relief are broad and general; but after full consideration I have come to the same conclusion as the majority of your Lordships. Since the obligation to relieve was granted there has been a total change in the character and object of the rate. Formerly the schoolmaster's salary was a fixed sum, which was divided among the valued rent heritors. Each heritor's portion was collected from him by the schoolmaster, and the receipts granted proved the exact amount which each heritor had to pay. Now all that is changed. Under the present system, as I understand it, no rate is levied specially for schoolmaster's salary; and you cannot ascertain from the receipts what or whether any portion of the salary is paid in any one year out of the rate, without an inquiry which would involve an investigation into the whole accounts of the school board, to be repeated every year. You must ascertain what portion of the master's salary is paid out of the Government grant, what portion out of the school fees, and what portion out of gifts and mortifications, before you can ascertain what remains, if any, to be paid out of the rates levied to meet any deficiency in this school fund. The present tax could not therefore, in my opinion, have been within the contemplation of parties when they granted and accepted this obligation of relief. The observations of the Lord Ordinary at the end of his opinion are, I think, very pertinent; and the difficulty of sustaining the pursuer's contention lies just where his Lordship has put it.

Lease—Missive—Singular Successor.—A yearly tenant, who also acted as factor for his landlord, wrote in October 1871 to the landlord asking for leave to break up pasture on a portion of his farm and to perform certain operations which would occupy a period of years, and received a written acceptance of his proposal from the landlord, who died before Martinmas 1872. The tenant commenced the operations and continued to pay the same rent as before, which he entered as formerly in a cash-book which he had kept as factor for the landlord (and which had been docqueted by him on 1st September 1872) and subsequently for his trustees, and also in accounts rendered to the trustees, which were audited on their behalf in December 1874. In 1873 the tenant applied to the trustees to fix the exact termination of his lease. Their agents wrote him fixing the ish at Whitsunday 1880. The estate was advertised for sale, the lease terminating in 1880, and the rent being mentioned in the particulars of sale shewn to the purchaser. The tenant continued to pay the same rent after Whitsunday 1874, when the purchaser entered. In an action by the tenant against the purchaser for declarator that he was in right of a lease till Whitsunday 1880 at his old rent, held that the letters, cash-book, and accounts instructed a lease at the former rent and for the term alleged, which was good against a singular successor.

2D DIVISION. Lord Rutherfurd Clark. I.

THOMAS MANN, of Glentyan, in Renfrewshire, raised an action of removing against Robert Wilson, one of the tenants on that estate, on 8th September 1875, on the footing that he was only a tenant from year to year. Mr Wilson defended that action, and at the same time raised an action in the Court of Session to have it declared that he was "in virtue of letters signed by the late Captain James Stirling" (from whose trustees the pursuer had bought the property), "then proprietor of the estate of Glentyan, in or about the months of October and November 1871, and of a letter by Messrs Dundas and Wilson, clerks to the signet, factors and agents for the trustees of the said Captain James Stirling, then deceased, dated 23d December 1873," in right of a lease of the farm of Forehouse for the term of eight years from and after Whitsunday 1872 at the rent of £223 sterling per annum.

Wilson averred that on the death of his father in 1861 Captain Stirling had accepted him as tenant of the farm of Forehouse in room of his father, at the rent of £223, as a tenant from year to year, and that he also acted as factor for Captain Stirling until his death in 1872, and since then he had continued to act as factor for Captain Stirling's trustees until the sale of the estate to Mr Mann in 1874. He also stated that in 1871 a portion of the pasture of his farm of Forehouse, which was principally a grazing farm, called Bankhead, had become so coarse as to require to be broken up, and that he accordingly applied to Captain Stirling for leave to do so in a letter in the following terms:—"Forehouse, October 28, 1871—Captn. Jas. Stirling, R.N.—Dear Sir,—In consideration of the fact that Bankhead field, and the other grass fields leased by me from you, are not grazing as they did when more newly laid down, and believing that they require breaking up and renewal, I hereby submit to you for approval a plan for breaking up head end of Bankhead, or from trees above where old house stood, about 10 acres at first, and the rest of it, &c., afterwards, if you permit, as follows,—the larger part to be in oats, the rest green crop, first season; what is in oats to go through the regular cropping rotation, being laid down with a sufficient quantity of manure; what is in green crop first year to be oats next year, then green crop again, and laid down with sufficient manure; and when sown down to have proper grass and clover seeds, and of sufficient quantity, sown. Should this meet your approval, and you grant this request, it will much oblige your obedt. servt., ROBT. WILSON."

That to this letter Captain Stirling appended the following holograph addition:—

"Glentyan, 31st October 1871.

"To be laid down without furrows; cut once in hay, not allowed to seed; to have three tons of warm lime per acre, and a quarter of ton of salt pr. acre on the hay stubble. JAMES STIRLING, R.N."

That he, Wilson, appended in his own handwriting as follows:—

"I agree to the foregoing. ROBERT WILSON."

And that a day or two after the above was written Captain Stirling gave Wilson the following corroborative letter, written by Wilson to the dictation of Captain Stirling, who signed it, but it bore no date:—

Wilson v Mann.

Bankhead field, &c., as specified in your note to me, with the addition which I have added at foot of same, viz., that it is to be laid down without furrows, to be cut only once in hay, and to have the quantity of lime and salt which I have mentioned applied to it. JAMES STIRLING, R.N."

It was further averred that this application was made by Wilson to Captain Stirling, and was assented to by him on the footing and understanding that Wilson was to remain tenant of the farm at least until the whole operations contemplated in the way of breaking up pasture ground and again laying it down in grass should be completed. That the period which Captain Stirling and he had in view as the shortest within which these operations could be completed was the term of Whitsunday 1880, and it was understood and agreed between them that he was to remain tenant of the farm of Forehouse until that term at the annual rent of £223. That Wilson accordingly, in terms of this agreement, at once proceeded to break up a portion of the farm, and he had since continued to cultivate a portion thereof, in terms of the agreement, and in conformity with the rotation assented to by Captain Stirling.

Wilson also stated that after Captain Stirling's death he continued to farm the land in accordance with this agreement, but when the estate was about to be sold, in order that he might know how much ground to break up in each year, he applied to the trustees, Mr Ralph Dundas, C.S., and a Mr Somervell, to fix the exact term at which his tenancy of the farm was to cease, and their agents, Messrs Dundas and Wilson, C.S., wrote him accordingly :—

"16 St Andrew Square, Edinburgh, 23d December 1873—Glentyan. "Robert Wilson, Esq., Forehouse Kilbarchan, Johnstone.—Dear Sir,—We have now heard from Mr Somervell regarding the termination of your occupation of Forehouse. He wishes it to be understood that the termination of your lease shall be at Whitsunday 1880, as to the whole subjects, that the lands shall be left in grass, and that the portion which you are allowed to break up shall be left in pasture of not less than a year old.—We are, dear sir, yours truly, DUNDAS & WILSON."

That the estate was sold by private bargain to Mr Mann, after an advertisement of particulars, which contained the following statements :—

"The lands are let from year to year, with the exception of Forehouse, the lease of which expires at Whitsunday 1880." Also—"Rental Particulars.—Forehouse—Let to Mr Robert Wilson for eight years from Whitsunday 1872, £223."

Wilson further averred that during Captain Stirling's lifetime, he, as his factor, had entered in a cash-book which he kept, the half-yearly rent of the farm of Forehouse as £111, 10s., and the cash-book containing these entries had been regularly docqueted as correct by Captain Stirling down to 3d September 1872, the docquet of that date being applicable to the year from 31st July 1871 to 31st July 1872; but the continuation of the cash-book after 31st July 1872, containing all the entries of Forehouse rent after 20th May 1872, was not authenticated or docqueted by Captain Stirling or his trustees in the cash-book, and was not submitted to the trustees, but Wilson rendered to them separate accounts from 31st July 1872 to July 1874, containing the like entries; which accounts were examined and found correct by accountants on behalf of the trustees, on 3d December 1874.

Wilson also stated that after Mr Mann had entered into possession of the estate at Whitsunday 1874 he had paid him rent at the rate of £223 per annum for two half years after his entry, and he produced receipts for these sums.

Mr Mann defended this action, and averred that Wilson was only a yearly tenant, and that the rent paid by him was much below the real value of the farm. He also stated that he had only received, and granted receipts for, the rent paid him by Wilson under protest. In any view, he averred that the arrangement founded on by Wilson related to the portion of the farm called Bankhead only, and that Wilson had not adhered to the rotation of crops stipulated for by Captain Stirling.

Pleaded for Wilson;—(2) The defender, at the time he purchased the estate of Glentyan, having been in the full knowledge that the farm of Forehouse was let to the pursuer to the term of Whitsunday 1880, he is now barred from objecting thereto, and he ought to be prohibited from disturbing or molesting the pursuer in the possession of the farm. (3) The defender having homologated the lease to the pursuer by taking payment of rents as above condescended on, he is now barred from interfering with the pursuer's possession of the farm.

Pleaded for Mann;—(2) The writs libelled on being informal and improbative and defective in the essentials of the alleged mutual contract of lease, the defender is entitled to absolvitor. (3) In a question with the defender, a singular successor, the alleged lease in all its stipulations, hinc inde, can only be established by writ, and the writs libelled on being insufficient and defective, the defender is entitled to absolvitor.

A joint minute was agreed to between the parties whereby it was admitted that the letters founded on by Wilson were genuine, and were written of the dates which they bore, and that the undated letter by Captain Stirling was delivered to Wilson on or about 31st October 1871. The entries in the cash-book and docquets by Captain Stirling, and the approval by the accountants of Wilson's accounts on 4th December 1874, were also admitted.

On 24th January 1876 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds, declares, and decerns in terms of the conclusions of the libel: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses; and remits," &c.*

* "NOTE.—This case is attended with some difficulty.

"The argument of the defender is, that there are not sufficient writings to constitute a lease, or to prove the existence of such a contract, at least in a question with him as a singular successor, and in particular, he urges that the rent is not ascertained by any writing.

"The writings which passed between the pursuer and Captain Stirling in 1871 relate to Bankhead, which is a part of the farm of Forehouse. They shew that it was contemplated that the pursuer should possess the farm for a period of years. But the period is not fixed, nor is any reference made to the rent.

"On 23d December 1873 the agents of Captain Stirling's trustees wrote a letter, in which they say that the 'termination of your lease shall be at Whitsunday 1880.' This document recognises the existence of a lease, and specifies its duration, but it says nothing as to the rent. It seems, however, to the Lord Ordinary that it must be construed as meaning that the subjects were to be held at the rent which was then payable by the pursuer. What that rent was is fixed by the books kept by the pursuer as factor for Captain Stirling, and docqueted by Captain Stirling in August or September 1872. The pursuer continued to possess the farm after that time, and no change in the tenure is alleged. The Lord Ordinary thinks, therefore, that the rent payable is ascertained by the writ of the landlord.

"Although the pursuer was already in possession of the farm when the writing of December 1873 was granted, the Lord Ordinary thinks that his subsequent possession must be ascribed to that writing. This was the view of both parties. In their advertisements with a view to a sale of the estate of Glentyan, Captain Stirling's trustees stated that the farm of Forehouse was let under a lease expiring at Whitsunday 1880; and the pursuer proceeded with Mann reclaimed, and argued;—Whatever effect the letters and cash-book founded on might have as against the original granter they were of no avail against a singular successor. All the recent cases where informal and irregular writings had been sustained were cases between the tenant and the granter.[1] All that these missives could be said to do was to set up a former verbal lease, which could be of no force against a singular successor.[2] Captain Stirling's letter contained no reference as to either entry, ish, or rent, and was therefore not a binding lease, and the letter by the agents, though it fixed the termination of the lease, said nothing as to rent. It was not competent to find out the rent from the cash-book as the Lord Ordinary had done, as that was making a contract for the parties. Moreover, after Captain Stirling's death, the cash-book was never docqueted or examined, and ceased to be the writ of the landlord. The audit and approval of the separate accounts on behalf of the trustees did not take place till seven months after they had ceased to be proprietors of the farm, so that could not make the book from which they were taken the writ of the landlord. The omission of the rent in the agents' letter distinguished this case from those founded on by the Lord Ordinary.[3] Wilson had not cropped in conformity with the agreement he founded on, and so could not plead that rei interventus had followed on it.

Counsel for Wilson were not called upon to reply.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The first question is, whether there was at the date of the purchase a valid lease subsisting between the proprietor and the tenant. I am of opinion that this is too clear to be disputed, and that it is proved by the writ of the lessor that there was a binding and effectual lease for eight years from Whitsunday 1872 at a rent of £223. The proof of this contract rests on several written although informal documents. 1. The letter of 28th October the cultivation of the farm on the footing that he held it till that time. If the writing of December had not been granted, he might have given notice that he intended to remove at Whitsunday 1874.

"But it was maintained by the defender, that though a contract of lease might be sufficiently proved against Captain Stirling or his representatives, that contract was not binding on him as a singular successor. In the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, this argument should not prevail. He thinks that all the requisites of a lease have been sufficiently proved by the writings under which the pursuer was possessing at the date of the defender's entry, and that the contract is therefore available against the defender. The nearest case is that of Skene v. Spankie, 1 Bell on Leases, 313, and noticed in Baron Hume's Reports in Arbuthnot v. Campbell, p. 785. It is true that there the writing specially stated that the lease was to be at the present rent. But the Lord Ordinary does not think that a distinction can be drawn between the expression and the implication of such a stipulation, if the implication arises from the sound construction of the writing itself.

"It is clear enough, and indeed it was not disputed, that the defender purchased the estate on the representation that the farm of Forehouse was held under a lease, expiring at Whitsunday 1880."

1871 necessarily implies a tenancy of at least five years, with a definite specified object, and thus it is clear that the acceptance of that offer implied an obligation to grant a lease for a term. 2. What that term was is proved by the letter of Dundas and Wilson, the landlord's agents, which truly constitutes the lease, for apparently the ish had not been previously adjusted. It is not so much proof of a previous verbal lease as the completion of the previous inchoate contract. This is conclusive against the landlord; and even if the rent had not been established scripto, the presumption would have been that the old rent was to be continued, and it is proved, under the landlord's own hand in the rental book, that this rent was £223. But the amount of the rent is clearly proved by the landlord's advertisement, in which the existence of the lease, the duration, and the rent are clearly announced to intending purchasers, and on this representation the defender made the purchase. I am therefore clear that there was a valid lease as between the former proprietor and the tenant. Is it then binding on the singular successor? I see no reason why it should not be so, for these informal writings together constitute a lease scripto. I should have come to the same conclusion although the documents had amounted to no more than the acknowledgment of an antecedent verbal contract. If the writing is sufficient to bind the landlord to grant a formal lease, that is sufficient, and it is immaterial to inquire how the antecedent obligation was constituted. But the agreement is not verbal. It is constituted scripto by the original letter and that of the landlord's agents, which together with the other writs contain all the requisites of a verbal lease. I agree without hesitation with the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Neaves.—I am of the same opinion, and may say generally that I am well satisfied with the Lord Ordinary's views as expressed in his note. The case is one of importance, and I should be sorry if the views urged for the reclaimer were held applicable in matters of this kind. In early times it was a disputed point whether a purchaser or a leaseholder was to be preferred. There were opposite maxims advocated by opposite schools. But the Legislature, influenced no doubt by the consideration of the importance of agricultural improvement in developing the resources of a country, removed the matter from the uncertainty of the common law and passed the Act of 1449, cap. 17. That Act gives protection against singular successors in the case of leases having an ish, a definite subject, and a substantial rent. At first the Judges used some strictness in construing that Act, and leases were held to be good only if they were constituted by regular and probative written documents. That has not been the law of Scotland, however, for a long time, and it would, I think, have been strange if an Act intended "for the safetie and favour of the puir people that labouris the ground" should only be available in such circumstances, and should not apply to those informal leases which were most likely to be entered into by illiterate tenants. It is sufficient as the law is now administered if there are documents to shew the consent of the parties to a continuing lease with a definite ish, rent, and subject. All such writings constitute a lease binding on singular successors.

In this case Captain Stirling, and his tenant, Wilson, made an arrangement under which there was to be a change in the possession by the tenant, and a certain change in the rotation of crops was made, as the tenant was no longer to be a yearly tenant but was to get a lease of longer duration. I think that upon that document the tenant could have come into Court, and have contended successfully that it implied a longer lease than from year to year and that he was entitled to get a formal lease the duration of which should be calculated on the nature of the work contemplated. I think the Court would have considered his case and have calculated the length of his tenancy, although it is unnecessary to decide that point here, as the duration of the lease was afterwards fixed and settled in the correspondence that passed with the landlord's agents. When such a document once existed as the proposal for an alteration on the possession it was competent for the landlord, or those acting for him, to supplement it and fix what was to be the duration of the lease. I think that Messrs Dundas and Wilson assigned a definite ish to the lease, when, looking to that document, they wrote saying the period for the ish now unfixed was to be 1880. But it is also said that there is no rent fixed in these documents. There are however other documents which do so. Wilson's book was kept by him as factor for his employer, and the rents were entered each half year, and the landlord signed the book for some years, up to 1872 in fact. The lease was commenced under the original missive, and the landlord could have access to the book in which the rent was entered each half year. We have thus the rent in a book which is the book of the landlord as well as of the tenant, and then there is the letter of Messrs Dundas and Wilson crowning the transaction by fixing the ish in 1880.

After this the lands were advertised for sale, and, although it is perhaps unnecessary for the decision of the case, still it is satisfactory that the fact of there being a lease at a certain rent and for a fixed period was set forth in the advertisement in the most explicit terms.

I cannot help thinking that all these documents and this advertisement put the purchaser in full knowledge of what he was buying. There was no concealment as to state of the lease or of the lands of Forehouse, as it plainly states that they were let for eight years to Robert Wilson. The purchaser bought on the footing that these lands were let on an eight years' lease, and presumably calculated the price he would give on that footing. After buying the lands on that calculation he now says he is not bound by the lease, and can get rid of it. That is certainly unjust to the tenant, and, I think, we are bound to protect him.

Technically there is no rent stipulated in the documents, but, I think, the factor's book satisfactorily shews the rent. The expression in Messrs Dundas and Wilson's letter, of "your lease," means and shews that the lease was granted at the rent he was then sitting at.

It has further been urged that Wilson did not act under the missive, but I do not think that is a relevant plea in the mouth of the defender, because any deviation must be held to have been condoned by his predecessor long ago.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I agree with both of your Lordships.

All that was necessary to constitute a lease, not only as between the tenant here and his original landlord, but also as between him and the present defender, is established by the writings before us.

It was conceded towards the conclusion of the argument, and indeed it could not, having regard to the authorities, be disputed, that a lease in all respects formal is not indispensable so as to bind a singular successor. All that is necessary is that the writing or writings constituting the lease should disclose the subject, the rent, and the duration of the contract. Here we have all of these essential elements; the subject of the lease is, I think, clearly established by writing, as well as the rent, and the duration. Without going back to the letter of 28th October 1871—although it is impossible even at that date not to see that there was a lease for an indefinite number of years—it is manifest that at any rate on 23d September 1873 a letter was written by Messrs Dundas and Wilson, who were just the landlords, or in the landlord's place, by which the lease was distinctly recognised. In that letter we have the subject expressly stated, viz., "your occupation of Forehouse," also the duration, viz., "Whitsunday 1880," and, I think, by very strong implication, if not in specific figures, even the rent. But the rent is proved otherwise in writing. It is proved by the factor's accounts, which, prior to 1872, bear to have been examined and docqueted by the landlord, Captain Stirling, and after his death these accounts continued to be kept by the factor for his trustees. These accounts must therefore be considered as good as the landlord's writ, and from them we find the amount of rent. It is true that the rental book does not appear to be docqueted by the trustees or by the defender, but I do not think that can affect the matter seeing that the accounts bear to have been examined and "found correct by accountants on behalf of the trustees." That negatives all idea of dishonesty or irregularity on the part of the factor. It appears to me, therefore, that there is enough in this case to set up the alleged lease and make it binding on the defender, without going into the effect of the advertisement and purchase, in regard to which, however, I concur in the observations made by your Lordships.

No. 86.

Wilson v. Mann.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion.

(First) I think that there was a valid and effectual contract of lease concluded between Stirling's trustees, or Stirling himself, and the pursuer. After Messrs Dundas and Wilson's letter it would be impossible to say that the trustees were not bound. No doubt the rent was not mentioned in that letter, but there could be no doubt about the rent; it was £111, 10s. per half year at the date when the lease commenced, and that rent had been paid for four and a-half years. If the missive letter had contained the words "at your present rent," this would have removed every ambiguity, and the case of Arbuthnot v. Campbell would have been directly in point. The actual figures are not necessary, the words "present rent" are enough, and I do not see any difference between a case where these words are used and one where they are implied, the tenant being actually in possession and paying rent, and it not being necessary to say anything as to rent at all.

(Second) If the lease was binding on Stirling and his representatives I think it was also binding on the singular successor.

This purchaser has also barred himself from objecting to the lease if it was binding on his author, because in the warrandice clause "current tacks" are excepted,—that is, all current tacks binding on the landlord and disponer. The effect of this is that the purchaser is bound by all that would be binding on his author, as was decided in the case of Wight v. Hopetoun, Nov. 17, 1673, M. 15,199.

THE COMMISSIONERS OF POLICE OF THURSO, Defenders.—
D.-F. Watson—Trayner—Keir.

Mar. 3, 1876.
Stephen v. Thurso Police Commissioners.

Reparation—Liability of Police Commissioners for Negligence of Contractor employed by them.—A person raised an action of damages against the police commissioners of a burgh for injuries sustained by him from having fallen over a heap of rubbish left upon the street after night-fall and not fenced or lighted. The defence was that the commissioners, under the powers conferred upon them by the Police Act, had contracted with a person for the cleaning of the streets and removal of refuse, and accordingly that, if there was negligence on the part of any one, it was the contractor who was liable, and not the commissioners. Held, upon the terms of the contract, that the commissioners retained a complete control over the execution of the operations contracted for, and were not relieved from the obligation incumbent on them to remove the rubbish or to put it in a state free of danger to the lieges.

Question, Whether, even if the contractor had been uncontrolled in the execution of the work, the commissioners could have so delegated their statutory duty as to free themselves from liability in case of its non-performance.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Craighill. I.

DAVID STEPHEN, watchmaker, Thurso, brought this action against James Brims and Charles Macdonald, joint-clerks to and as representing the Commissioners of Police of the burgh of Thurso, acting under the Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1850, for payment of £500 as damages for bodily injury sustained by him by falling over a heap of rubbish in Rotterdam Street of Thurso after dark upon the evening of 27th November 1874.

The pursuer averred that, contrary to the duty imposed upon the commissioners by the statute, they had neither removed the rubbish before night-fall, nor fenced and lighted the same.

He pleaded;—The pursuer having at the time and place sustained the injuries and loss condescended on, and the said injuries and loss having been caused to him by and through the fault, culpable negligence, and failure on the part of the Police Commissioners of the burgh of Thurso, or of their servants or other persons or person for whom they were and are responsible, the said commissioners are bound to make reparation to the pursuer as concluded for.

The defenders stated;—(Stat. 1) "The defenders, as commissioners of police foresaid, contracted with Mr Andrew Swanson, carter, Thurso, for the removal by him of all dung, refuse, or other matter from the streets, lanes, pavements or footpaths in Thurso, and also, when required, from any premises there which the defenders or their inspector might point out. The said contract was binding upon the said Andrew Swanson for three years prior to Whitsunday last 1875." (Stat. 2) "The rubbish which the pursuer avers to have been the cause of injury and damage to him was removed by the said Andrew Swanson, or those employed and paid by him, under the foresaid contract with the defenders, from the premises of Mr J. W. Galloway, bank agent in Thurso. If there was any fault committed in allowing said rubbish to remain on the street unduly, or in its non-removal, it was the fault of Swanson, and not of the defenders."

And pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's statements are not relevant to support the conclusions of the summons. (2) The injuries condescended on, if sustained by the pursuer, not having been caused by the fault of the defenders, they are not liable in reparation, and should be assoilzied with expenses.*

* The clauses of the Police Act, 1850, founded on by the parties were:—
Sec. 49.—"That the commissioners, or any committee of their body especially

A proof was allowed, which disclosed the following facts:—The contract between the police commissioners and Swanson, which was in writing, was executed in 1872, the period of its endurance being three years from Whitsunday 1872. The more important parts of the document bearing upon the present question are quoted in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk (infra, p. 538).

About the end of the year 1873 Mr William Bruce was appointed inspector of nuisances for the burgh by the commissioners. Some time after his appointment a conversation took place, the effect of which is stated by Mr Bruce in his evidence,—"Some time after I was appointed inspector, the contractor and I were standing together at the top of Caithness Street, when Mr Brims came up and told the contractor it was better to leave the servants wholly in my power now. Swanson agreed to that. (Q.) That he would leave his men entirely in your power now? (A.) Yes." What precise change was in consequence made upon the previous relations between the inspector and Swanson did not clearly appear.

On 26th November 1874 a Mr Galloway wrote to Swanson desiring him to send scavengers to clean out his ash-pit. This was accordingly done next day, and the rubbish from the ash-pit put upon the street. The attention of Bruce, the inspector of nuisances, was called to the rubbish on the street, and, according to his evidence, he communicated with Swanson, who promised to have it removed that night. Bruce made no further inquiries after half-past three in the afternoon as to whether the rubbish had been removed. In fact it was not removed, and the pursuer coming home from his shop to his house about 7 P.M. stumbled over the heap of rubbish, and was severely injured.

The Lord Ordinary, on 24th November 1875, pronounced an interlocutor containing detailed findings in fact, in which he repelled the defences, and found the defenders liable in £50 of damages.*

empowered, may contract with any person for carrying into execution any of the operations hereby authorised."

Sec. 139.—"That when any building materials, rubbish, or other things are laid, or any hole made in any of the streets, whether the same be done by order of the commissioners or not, the person causing such materials or other things to be so laid, or such hole to be made, shall at his own expense cause a sufficient light to be fixed in a proper place upon or near the same, and continue such light every night from sun-setting to sun-rising while such materials or hole remain, and such person shall, at his own expense, cause such materials or other things and such hole to be sufficiently fenced and enclosed until such materials or other things are removed, or the hole filled up or otherwise made secure."

Sec. 142 enacts that the commissioners shall cause the streets to be cleaned and dust and ashes to be removed from the houses.

Sec. 150.—"That the commissioners shall appoint and employ a sufficient number of scavengers, or contract with any company or other person to employ scavengers, for sweeping, cleansing, and watering the streets, and for removing all dust, ashes, rubbish, and filth therefrom, and from the houses and other premises therein, and for emptying privies and cesspools in the manner by this Act directed."

Sec. 218 empowers the commissioners to appoint an inspector of nuisances.

* "NOTE.— . . The real controversy is this—there having been fault, are the defenders liable for the consequences? They are commissioners of police. The cleaning and clearing of the streets was within their functions, and indeed was one of the most obvious duties they were called upon to discharge. But it does not follow from this that the fault in question can be imputed to them. They were entitled to contract for the performance of the work; and if a contractor undertook to do all that was required, to him, and not to the defenders, liability will attach. In fact, there was a contract for the cleaning of the streets,

No. 87.

Mar. 3, 1876. Stephen v. Thurso Police Commissioners.

Argued for the reclaimers;—The ground on which alone the Lord Ordinary had found them liable was unsound. A written contract could not be over-ridden by a loose conversation in the street such as that which was said to have taken place between Brims and Swanson. The liability of the defenders must be determined upon the basis of the written contract. The statute gave the commissioners the option of two ways of cleaning the streets. They might either employ scavengers themselves, or contract with another for this purpose. The defenders adopted the last course. The scavengers were the servants of the contractor, and not of the defenders. Where a person employed an independent contractor to do a lawful act he was not liable for the negligence of the contractor, or of the servants of the contractor.[1]

Argued for the pursuer;—(1) The terms of the contract shewed that Swanson was not an independent contractor. He was subject to the supervision and control of the commissioners. Where there was a retention of the right of control by the employer the employer was the person liable.[2] (2) The defenders being statutory commissioners could not delegate their statutory duties to the effect of relieving them from liability for the non-performance of such duties.[3]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case raises a question of general interest. The action is at the instance of the pursuer against the Commissioners of Police for the burgh of Thurso, and the ground of action is that certain obstructions were left in the streets of Thurso, whereby the pursuer, walking in the dark, stumbled, and sustained severe injuries. The action is brought under the obligation imposed on the defenders by the Police and Improvement Act, 1850, and is laid upon their failure to remove the obstructions, or to fence and light the same, so as to prevent them being dangerous to the public.

It is not denied that the event happened, that this heap of rubbish was left on the streets, and that the pursuer was injured in the way he describes; nor is there any serious dispute as to the amount of the injury. The defence for the commissioners is that they had entered into a contract with a third party, Swanson, for the removal of rubbish from the streets, and that Swanson, being as well as for other work, current at the time of the accident; but, unfortunately for the defenders, the terms of that contract, for some reason not easily understood, were altered, and the effect of the alteration was, as the Lord Ordinary reads the evidence, to constitute the defenders the masters of the scavengers in so far as regarded the giving of orders, and the supervision of the work which was in hand. The contractor, in other words, was so far displaced. What he had previously done was committed to a servant of the commissioners, the inspector of nuisances, and the neglect, from which the pursuer suffered, is consequently not the neglect of the contractor, but that of the defenders, inasmuch as it was the neglect of their servant specially appointed by them to do what had previously been done by the contractor."

an independent contractor, they are not liable for his negligence. The question is, whether this is a good defence.

In the ordinary case, when reparation is demanded from a principal for the consequences of acts done by those he employs, it is for the pursuer to prove such a relation between the person sued and the person who was the immediate cause of the accident as will make the act of the one the act of the other; and accordingly, if the person who caused the injury is an independent contractor, not under the control of the principal, the latter cannot be made liable, the relation of master and servant not subsisting between them. But there is a question involved in the present case to which I think it right to advert, although its solution is not necessary to the opinion I have formed. The case is wholly different where a distinct duty is imposed upon the person sued towards the person injured, and where that duty has not been performed. It is not disputed that it was the duty of the defenders under the statute to remove obstructions. It would seem, therefore, not to be necessary for the pursuer to prove the relation of master and servant between the defenders and Swanson, or any one else. It is enough for him, in the first instance, to say that the police commissioners were bound to remove this rubbish, that it was not removed, and that its non-removal caused the accident. There is a general power given by sec. 49 to "contract with any person for carrying into execution any of the operations hereby authorised," and in regard to cleaning there is a further provision in sec. 150 authorising them to "contract with any company or other person to employ scavengers for sweeping, cleansing, and watering the streets, and for removing all dirt, ashes, rubbish, and filth therefrom," &c. The question whether, when the whole work to be done under any of these branches is made the subject of a specific and independent contract, and where the contractor has power without further control or supervision to carry the work into execution,—whether such a contract will relieve the commissioners of liability, it is not necessary to decide in the view which I entertain. I am of opinion, in the first place, that this was not an independent contract, but, on the contrary, that the contractor was dependent on the commissioners, not only generally, but in regard to the whole details of the execution of the contract; further, that there was no obligation laid upon the contractor in the contract, so far as I can find, to fence and light obstructions in the street. Accordingly, the obligation to make them safe for the lieges still remained with the commissioners.

The terms of the contract are as follows:—It commences with a statement that the police commissioners having advertised for estimates for cleansing the town, and keeping the streets and lanes in repair, and lighting, &c., Swanson offered to execute these several works. The cleansing he undertook for £88, 10s., the fulzie being his property. He also made specific offers with regard to the other works. The contract then proceeds to narrate that the commissioners accepted these offers for a period of three years, and the contractor found caution, and bound himself and his cautioner "to perform the cleansing or cleaning of the whole streets and lanes within the burgh or barony of Thurso, ... including the cleaning out of the public privies, and to keep the same clean and in good order and condition, and to remove therefrom all refuse, dung, and fulzie, which refuse, dung, and fulzie shall belong to the said Andrew Swanson." That is the general enunciation of what the contractor binds himself to do, and afterwards comes the minute specification of what is to be done, from which it appears that the greater part of the work to be done is to be done as directed by the commissioners. For instance, it is provided "that all the side drains and surface strands running along the roads within the town . . . . shall also be swept as often as required by the inspector." It is also stipulated "that the commissioners shall be entitled, as occasion may arise, to require an additional cart or carts to be provided by the contractor for said purposes." Then comes a provision "that the contractor or one of his servants shall, when required by the inspector, be bound to clean and remove any nuisance, fulzie, or other matter on the streets, lanes, pavements, or footpaths, and shall also be bound to enter upon any premises when or where the commissioners or their inspector may point out any nuisance, and remove it upon receiving written orders to that effect from the clerk or inspector." Indeed, it is plain enough that without the leave of the commissioners the contractor had no power to enter private premises at all. The commissioners had the right under the statute, and the contract properly contained this provision that the contractor must have leave from the commissioners. In this particular case he had not that leave, because Mr Galloway applied directly to him and not to the inspector.

No. 87.

Stephen v. Thurso Police Commissioners.

Then comes a clause of the greatest possible importance,—"The whole of the works and services specified shall be performed in the most sufficient and complete manner to the entire satisfaction of the said commissioners of police or any person they may appoint as surveyor or inspector, and that the contractor, except where otherwise provided for, shall be under the immediate order of the inspector, or, in his absence, of the clerk of the commissioners." That at once destroys the character of the contract as an independent contract. The control is kept in the commissioners in every case, "and in the event of the contractor at any time failing to carry out the works and services falling within the terms and scope of this specification, or being required to do so by the inspector or clerk as above provided, it shall be in the power of the commissioners to employ persons to do the work at his expense, and the contractor shall be bound to repay the expense so to be incurred by the commissioners."

I need not go further into the contract, because these passages shew plainly what kind of contract it was. I think the commissioners were quite right to retain the control and powers which they did. I do not say,—because it is not necessary to decide the point in this case,—whether or not the commissioners could so delegate their power as to cease to be responsible to the public. Here, however, they certainly retained the powers, and were therefore responsible to the public. That being so, on the general question of law I have no doubt.

The English authorities have established a distinction between a contract of service and an independent contract of work to be done. In the latter case the man who alone is responsible for the execution of the work is liable for his servants; but, on the other hand, when the man is merely another's hand, his employers are liable under the rule qui facit per alium facit per se. That is enough for the decision of this case.

But there is a second ground, which, looking at the facts of the case, is very strong. The contractor is not bound to light or fence heaps of rubbish; and there can be no doubt that the commissioners were bound to light or fence rubbish which they could not remove if the contractor was not bound to do so. The commissioners were also bound to remove this rubbish if the contractor failed to do so, and they could make the contractor repay them for expense so incurred. It is said that the contractor undertook to remove this rubbish, but from the evidence it appears that the inspector had reasonable ground to suspect that it would not be removed; and that would be sufficient to make the commissioners liable, even if the contract had been a more independent one than it is.

No. 87.

Stephen v. Thurso Police Commissioners.

After the contract had been entered into we find the clerk to the commissioners taking a strong step, which throws light upon the view which the commissioners entertained of the power reserved by them. He told the contractor to give the whole charge to Mr Bruce, who had been appointed inspector of nuisances. Had there been an independent contract he could have had no power to do so; but, looking to the right of control reserved by the commissioners, I am not prepared to say that he went beyond his powers. But I do not think, as the Lord Ordinary does, that the action of the clerk constituted a new contract. It was only a strong exercise of the supreme control retained by the commissioners.

Therefore, on the whole facts of the case, I am of opinion that the commissioners are liable. As regards the general question of law, it is unnecessary to say anything farther. The law is well established. In the first place, a master is liable for the injurious act of his servant. In the second place, if the wrongdoer be a contractor who is subject to the control of his employer, the latter is responsible; and, in the third place, if the contractor be independent, and may do as he pleases as regards the execution of the work, he is to be viewed as the principal, and alone is liable.

Lord Neaves concurred.

Lord Ormidale.—That the defenders were entitled to enter into a contract for the cleaning of the streets of Thurso is clear, I think, from the 49th and 150th sections of the Police Act, 13 and 14 Vict. cap 33, under and in terms of which they derive their authority in reference to that matter. Neither can it be disputed in point of law that if the contractor could be held to have exercised an independent employment under the contract which was entered into with him, he, and not the defenders, would have been answerable to the pursuer in reparation for the injuries sustained by him. But, although the question has been found by me to be attended with difficulty, I have, after full consideration, come to be of opinion that the contractor Swanson cannot, under the contract, be held to have exercised an independent employment. It is, amongst other things, expressly stipulated in the contract that "the contractor, or one of his servants, shall, when required by the inspector, be bound to clean and remove any nuisance, fulzie, or other matter on the streets, lanes, pavements, or footpaths, and shall also be bound to enter upon any premises when or where the commissioners or their inspector may point out any nuisance, and remove it upon receiving written orders to that effect from the clerk or inspector;" and further, that he shall, except as regards some particular instances, "be under the immediate orders of the inspector, or in his absence, of the clerk of the commissioners." It appears to me that by these stipulations the contractor, in place of being left to the independent exercise of his own discretion and judgment in the execution of the work committed to him, was subjected in a very large degree to the control and direction of the defenders and their inspector. This being so, it is only reasonable, and in accordance with well established principles, that they, as the defenders called and concluded against in the present action, should, under the circumstance disclosed by the proof, be held liable in reparation to the pursuer.

No. 87.

Mar. 3, 1876. Stephen v. Thurso Police Commissioners.

Upon the ground I have now stated I have reached the same conclusion, although in a different way and for different reasons, as the Lord Ordinary. His Lordship seems to have thought that the contract, as originally entered into, if it had not been innovated on and altered, was such as to have placed the contractor in a position of independent employment; but I am unable to concur with the Lord Ordinary in that view. Neither can I agree with him in thinking that the contract was altered, or that it could have been altered in the way he assumed it was. On the contrary, it rather appears to me that the control and interference of the inspector, founded on as an alteration of the contract, was what the contract itself allowed; and that just shews that the contractor was not placed in such a position as entitles the Court to hold that he exercised an independent employment.

LORD GIFFORD.—I have felt this case to be one of considerable delicacy and difficulty, but I have ultimately come to be of opinion that the commissioners of police of Thurso, as such and to the effect of charging the funds under their control, are liable in damages to the pursuer. The amount of damages, as assessed by the Lord Ordinary, has not been objected to on either side. Both parties are satisfied with the mere assessment of damages, and the result is that I agree in the decree which the Lord Ordinary has pronounced, although I differ from the Lord Ordinary as to one of the main reasons on which his Lordship has proceeded. I cannot agree with the Lord Ordinary in his finding that the terms or provisions of the written agreement or contract between the defenders, the commissioners of police, and Andrew Swanson were varied or altered during its currency. On the contrary, I think that the provisions of that contract must be held to have been at the date of the cause of action in full force and observance, and that Mr Brims and Mr Bruce, even if they had wished to vary the provisions of the contract, had no power to do so, and did not do so in point of fact, and I cannot agree with the Lord Ordinary in resting the judgment upon such alleged variation.

Still, holding the written contract as in full force in all its provisions, and keeping in view the whole circumstances of the case, I am of opinion that in point of law the commissioners of police are liable to the pursuer for the negligence which left the heap of rubbish on the public street of Thurso unlighted on the night of 27th November 1874, whereby the pursuer received the injury for which he now claims reparation.

The delicacy and difficulty of the case arises from the necessity of distinguishing between the negligence of a servant employed by a master, and the negligence of a tradesman employed by a person to do some work on his property, or the negligence of the workmen of such a tradesman. A master is liable for damage occasioned by the act or by the negligence of his servant acting in his employment. In such a case the maxim applies qui facit per alium facit per se. On the other hand, a person who employs an independent tradesman or contractor to build or to repair or to take down his house, or to execute some specific work, is not liable for the fault or negligence of such tradesman or contractor, or of the workmen whom they may employ. The employer is not responsible either for the fault or for the negligence of the independent contractor unless he expressly directed the wrongful or improper act. In such cases the rule holds. culpa tenet suos auctores tantum.

No. 87. Mar. 3, 1876. Stephen v. Thurso Police Commissioners.

But there are many cases where it is exceedingly difficult to tell whether the party directly guilty of the fault or negligence is the servant of a master who will be responsible in the damage caused or merely the independent employee of an employer who will not be answerable for the employee's or contractor's fault and not liable in damages occasioned thereby. The present case is one in which there is great difficulty in determining whether the persons who were directly negligent, that is, the persons who were to blame for leaving the heap on the public street unlighted and unfenced, were in point of law to be held the servants of the commissioners, or were merely the workmen of an independent contractor, for whose negligence the commissioners are not answerable.

To solve this question it is necessary to take into view the terms of the written contract between the commissioners and Mr Swanson, and the mode in which it was to be carried out, and not only so, but to keep in view the position of the parties and the whole circumstances attending the deposit of the heap in question, and its being allowed to remain unlighted all night.

On carefully considering the very numerous cases which have occurred, chiefly in England, on this branch of the law, and of which we had in argument a very full citation, I think that the principle which governs the decision in such cases is that the person or superior, be he called either master or employer, who has reserved or who has assumed the direct and personal control over the subordinate, be he called servant or workman, who committed the fault or negligence, is liable for the damage thereby caused. In such case, "respondeat superior;" the superior is answerable for the negligence of his subordinate; and the test, I think, always is, had the superior personal control or power over the acting or mode of acting of the subordinate? I use the expression "personal control," because I think that this is always the turning point in such cases. Was there a control or direction of the person in opposition to a mere right to object to the quality or description of the work done? Where this element of personal control is found, then responsibility, either for malfeasance or nonfeasance, for fault or negligence, will attach, not only to the servant or workman (he is always liable), but to him who had the personal control over him who was his superior in the sense of the maxim. On the other hand, if an employer has no such personal control, but has merely the right to reject work that is ill done, or to stop work that is not being rightly done, but has no power over the person or time of the workman or artizan employed, then he will not be their superior in the sense of the maxim, and not answerable for their fault or negligence.

It is sometimes said that the question is whether the relation between the immediate wrongdoer and the defender is that of master and servant, or employer and contractor. But these words are a little ambiguous, and though they may indicate generally the rule of law the real question always is, I think, Who had the control and direction of the person who did the wrong? For example, it is of no consequence whether there is a written contract or not. The real question is, What is the nature of the contract? A man may have a written contract with his butler or coachman, but he will be liable for their negligence just as if he hired them verbally. And there may be no written contract with a builder who undertakes to build a house according to plans, and yet the owner of the house will not be liable for the fault or negligence of the builder or his workmen. Again, even where by the terms of the contract an employer has no personal control over the contractor's workmen, the employer may become liable for negligence if he personally interfere with the workmen and directs and adopts their acts. An instance of this occurred in the case of Burgess v. Gray (1845), 1 C. B. 578, and in other cases.

No. 87.

Stephen v. Thurso Police Commissioners.

Now, applying the principle to the circumstances of the present case, I agree with all your Lordships that, by the terms of the written contract, the commissioners of police of Thurso did not so part with the entire control of the contractor and his workmen as to liberate them from responsibility for the particular act of negligence now in question. The direct parties negligent were the scavengers who removed the rubbish from Mr Galloway's premises to the public street and left it there. Now, the written contract expressly bears that the contractor, "except where otherwise provided for, shall be under the immediate order of the inspector, or, in his absence, of the clerk of the commissioners," and it is proved that in accordance with this the inspector and clerk were in the habit of giving, and in this instance did give directions and orders to the scavengers who, though paid by Swanson, the contractor, were always under the control of and obliged to obey the orders of the commissioners given through their inspector and clerk.

Indeed, I have some doubt with your Lordship whether the commissioners of police of Thurso could competently divest themselves of what was so much their proper and immediate duty as the keeping the streets of Thurso clean and free from obstruction. They have, no doubt, power by the statute to contract for work; but it is more than doubtful whether this would enable them to denude themselves of the duties and responsibilities which the statute imposes. It is unnecessary, however, to consider this, for I am quite clear that by this written contract the commissioners did not give up all control over the contractor and the scavengers, but, on the contrary, expressly reserved it.

Still farther, the special work done in this case—the removal of the rubbish from Mr Galloway's ash-pit and premises, must be held to have been done under the immediate orders of the commissioners and their inspector. By the terms of the contract it is only on getting written orders from the clerk or inspector that the contractor, Mr Swanson, or his servants, should be entitled or bound to enter upon private premises, such as Mr Galloway's undoubtedly were, and to remove rubbish or nuisance therefrom, and although a written order seems to have been dispensed with in this case, it was not the less under that clause of the contract that the operation of removing these ashes fell. It is proved that the inspector knew of the operation and gave directions concerning it.

On the general ground, therefore, that the present case is not the case of fault or negligence by an independent contractor or tradesman, over whom and over whose workmen the employer has no personal control, but the case of employers or masters hiring servants through a contractor, over whom they maintain entire control, I am of opinion that the commissioners are liable for the damages which have, I think, been very moderately assessed by the Lord Ordinary.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Find that under the terms of the statute 13 and 14 Victoria, c. 33, the police commissioners were bound to remove, or cause to be removed, all refuse or obstructions on the public streets of the burgh: Find that on the day libelled a quantity of refuse was removed from the premises of the witness Galloway, and placed on the public street, and left there without any fencing or lighting

Shand.

The petitioner reclaimed, and argued, that by the Act of 1875, 38 and 39 Vict. c. 61, he was entitled to disentail without the consent of any heir other than the nearest heir, and that he ought not to be prejudiced by a change of circumstances occurring after the date of his consent.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—The position of this petitioner was such that if he had presented his application under 11 and 12 Vict. c. 36, he must have come under the provision in section 3, which requires that an heir "shall have obtained the consents of the three nearest heirs who at the said dates are for the time entitled to succeed to such estate in their order successively immediately after such heir in possession." Now, passing over in the meantime the Act of 16 and 17 Victoria, and looking to the provisions of the Act of last session, we find it is enacted by section 5—"Whereas it is expedient that section 3 of the Act of the 11th and 12th years of the reign of Her Majesty, chapter 36, should be amended: Be it enacted as follows:—(1) In any application to the Court of Session for authority to disentail an entailed estate in Scotland, holden by virtue of any tailzie dated prior to the 1st day of August 1848, the consent of any of the heirs of entail mentioned in the recited section entitled to succeed to such estate may competently be given after such application has been presented to the Court, and in the course of the same: (2) In the event of any of the foresaid heirs, except the nearest heir for the time, whether an heir-apparent or not, entitled to succeed, declining or refusing to give or being legally incapable of giving his consent, the Court may dispense with such consent in terms of the provisions following (that is to say)—(a) When any of the foresaid heirs entitled to succeed, except the nearest heir for the time, declines or refuses to give, or is legally incapable of giving his consent, the Court shall, on a motion to that effect by the petitioner in the application, and on a statement by him of the declinature or refusal or incapacity of such heir or heirs aforesaid, and after such intimation to the heir or heirs so declining or refusing, or to the guardians or other persons interested in the heir or heirs incapacitated as aforesaid, as the Court shall think necessary, ascertain the value in money of the expectancy or interest in the entailed estate with reference to such application of such heir or heirs declining or refusing, or incapacitated to give consent as aforesaid; (b) Upon such value in money being ascertained to the satisfaction of the Court, the Court shall direct the sum so ascertained to be paid into bank in name of the heir or heirs the value of whose expectancy or interest has been ascertained as aforesaid, or that proper security shall be given over the estate which is the subject of application for the amount so ascertained in favour of the heir or heirs aforesaid; (c) Upon such value in money being so paid or secured to the satisfaction of the Court, the Court shall dispense with the consent or consents of the heir or heirs the value of whose expectancy or interest has been ascertained as aforesaid, and shall thereupon proceed as if such consent or consents had been obtained: Provided always, that nothing herein contained shall render it competent to dispense with the consent of the nearest heir for the time entitled to just construction seems to be that the equivalent shall be taken to be a consent given at the date of the interlocutor dispensing with the consent. For it is only after such an interlocutor has been pronounced that the Court can proceed as if the consent had been obtained.

"The Lord Ordinary has therefore refused the petition."

succeed to any entailed estate sought to be disentailed." Now, the change which this introduced into the law, as under 11 and 12 Victoria, is simply that an heir of entail in possession proceeding to disentail instead of having to buy off the whole three next heirs is enabled as to the second and third heirs to take their interests compulsorily upon a valuation being obtained.

The petitioner presented his petition, stating to the Court the position in which he stood, and the position of the three next heirs of entail. He obtained the consent of the first heir of entail, and stated that the second and third declined to consent, although he afterwards obtained the consent of the second. It therefore was necessary to ascertain the value of the interest of the third heir. The proceedings for obtaining this value were in progress. A report had been prepared, but was not presented to the Lord Ordinary. At that time a new heir came into existence, a daughter being born to the heir in possession. The value in money of the interest of the third heir in existence had neither been paid into the bank nor secured, and it seems to me quite clear upon the statute that it is only when this has been done that the Court have it in their power to dispense with consents, and to proceed as if these had been obtained.

Now, it is clear that under 11 and 12 Victoria, if before one of the consents had been obtained, an heir was born, that would have put an end to the procedure, because the third heir would not have been one of the three heirs whose consent was required. The dispensation with consent under the Act of last session is just as essential as the consent was under the previous Act of 11 and 12 Victoria.

It was suggested that some aid might be got from section 19 of 16 and 17 Vict. c. 94, which provides—"The date of presenting any application under the said recited Act or under this Act shall be held to be the day on which the first interlocutor under such application has been or shall be pronounced, and no alteration of circumstances which has occurred or which shall occur subsequent both to the date of presenting such application and to the last date of the consents required to the same, whether by the birth of any intervening heir or by the death of any granter of such consent, or otherwise, except as hereinbefore specially provided, shall be deemed to have or shall have any effect upon the rights of the party who shall present or who has presented such application, or shall affect the procedure taken therein." But to my mind the difficulty is not removed by that section, because if the purchase and dispensation with consents is a necessary preliminary, and comes in place of the consents themselves, this section must be construed as requiring that the date of the petition and the date of the dispensation with consents must have passed before the clause in question can have any effect so far as to validate the petition.

I am prepared to adopt the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD DEAS.—The petitioner duly obtained the consent of the two first heirs of entail, Mr Kynoch junior and Mr Shand Turner. But the third, Mr Bentham Rae, being resident abroad, his consent was not obtained. It was therefore necessary that we should have the statutory equivalents. The statute fixes what is to be done in such a case. The Court is first to ascertain what is the value in money of the heir's expectancy. On that being done, which it could only be by interlocutor (not yet pronounced), the Court is then to direct that the money be paid into bank, or security found for it. On the money being so paid or security found, the third thing the Court is to do is to dispense with the consent, and then (but then only) the Court may proceed as if the consents had been obtained. But before any one of these three things had been done the petitioner's daughter was born, and her birth has given rise to the present question. I am clearly of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that we had not here the equivalents for the consent of Mr Bentham Rae before the birth of the petitioner's daughter, and therefore that the enactment relied on by the petitioner is not applicable. The consequence is that the Lord Ordinary is right in refusing the petition.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—Where consent is necessary, no consent can avail unless it has been granted, or unless a substitute for consent has been obtained through the medium of a statutory proceeding of the nature of compulsitor on valuation. The requirements of the statute for valuation of interest and dispensing with consent had not been complied with, and no sufficient consent had been obtained. At this point of time, and under these circumstances, the infant heir was born. I concur in your Lordships' opinion that we cannot grant this petition.

I have some doubt whether, if the procedure under the statute for valuing and discharging the interest had been completed before the child was born, we could have granted this petition, seeing that the child was in utero, and its birth expected immediately. But on this point I merely reserve my opinion.

LORD MURE concurred.

Bankruptcy—Trust-Deed—Principal and Agent—Right in Security.—A granted a trust-deed for behoof of all acceding creditors in favour of B, and afterwards entered into an arrangement to pay a composition in four instalments, he being allowed to carry on his business, but subject to the supervision of B until the first instalment should be paid. The first two instalments were paid, but when A failed to pay the third B took possession of his shop and goods, and sold off everything for behoof of the creditors in the trust-deed. A had in the period after granting the trust-deed purchased and paid for some goods from C, but at the date when B took possession he was owing C the price of certain other goods, a portion of which were then in his shop. C, after obtaining decree against A for the price of the goods, sued B also for the price as really the principal in the transaction. Held that A not having been divested, and the trust-deed having been a mere security for payment of the composition, B was not in any sense a principal in the transaction, and that A alone was liable for the price of the goods.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire. I.

DAVID BROWN, baker, Cathcart Road, Glasgow, having got into difficulties, granted, on 13th November 1872, a trust-deed conveying all his estate to Robert Downie, accountant, Glasgow, for behoof of all his creditors acceding thereto, with full powers. On 23d November Brown agreed to pay a composition to his creditors in four instalments, the first of 3s. 6d. in the pound on 13th December 1872, the second of 1s. 6d. on 13th February 1873, the third of 2s. 6d. on 12th April 1873, and the fourth of 2s. 6d. on 13th June of that year. It was also arranged "that Mr Downie intromit with the estate funds until the first instalment of 3s. 6d. was paid."

In consequence of this arrangement Brown continued to carry on his business, and until 13th December 1872, when the first instalment fell due and was paid, he accounted daily to Downie for the drawings of his shop. The second instalment was also paid on 13th February 1873, but the third, which fell due on 12th April, was not paid. Downie thereupon, on 16th April, went to Brown's shop, and getting possession of everything in it, sold off the perishable goods at once, and subsequently disposed of the whole fittings, &c., by auction.

William Miller, a flour merchant, who had supplied Brown with flour after the date of the trust-deed, raised an action against him for the price of the flour in the Sheriff Court, and obtained decree.

Brown, however, having in the meantime been incarcerated by another creditor, and being in course of suing a cessio, Miller raised this action for the price of the flour against Downie, as Brown's trustee, averring that Brown had been employed and authorised by Downie to carry on the business for his behoof as trustee for the creditors acceding to the trust-deed, and that Downie had adopted and homologated all Brown's actings and dealings.

Downie defended the action.

Pleaded for Miller, inter alia ;—(1) The goods sued for having been sold by the pursuer to the defender through David Brown, the pursuer is entitled to decree. (2) The defender having homologated and adopted the actings of David Brown, and received and appropriated the goods bought by him and the proceeds thereof, is liable for the price of the same. (4) Separatim, the pursuer not being a participant under the trust-deed, is entitled to be ranked in full primo loco on all the assets taken possession of by the defender which did not belong to Brown at the date of the trust-deed, and if such assets are not now distinguishable he is entitled to payment in full.

Downie pleaded, inter alia ;—(4) The goods, the price of which is sued for, not having been sold or delivered to the defender, as trustee for Brown's creditors or as an individual, the defender is not liable for the price of the same. (5) The dealings and actings of Brown having been without the defender's knowledge or sanction, and not having been adopted or homologated by him, and the defender not having ordered, received, or used the goods sued for, or the proceeds thereof, the defender is entitled to decree of absolvitor, with expenses.

The Sheriff-substitute allowed a proof, from which it appeared that Brown had not applied to Downie for written orders when obtaining more flour for use in his business, as was usual in cases where the trustee and creditors carried on a business for their own behoof. Moreover, Brown stated that he had informed Miller that he had executed a trust-deed in favour of creditors. It was proved that Brown had paid Miller for certain quantities of flour supplied to him after the date of the trust-deed out of his own funds. It was also proved that after the payment of the first instalment Downie had in no way interfered with Brown until he took possession of his shop and stock on 16th April on his failure to pay the third instalment. It also appeared that at the date when Downie took possession of Brown's stock a considerable quantity of Miller's flour was in the shop unworked up, and this Downie sold along with the other goods for behoof of the creditors under the trust-deed, of which Miller was not one. There had been, however, at the date of the trust-deed, a considerable amount of flour in stock, which had since been worked up and sold by Brown in carrying on his business.

On 22d February 1875 the Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray) pronounced this interlocutor :—" Finds (1) that David Brown, baker, Cathcart Road, Glasgow, having got into difficulties, granted, on 13th November 1872, the trust-deed No. 7/1 of process, conveying all his estate to

had been obtained. But before any one of these three things had been done the petitioner's daughter was born, and her birth has given rise to the present question. I am clearly of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that we had not here the equivalents for the consent of Mr Bentham Rae before the birth of the petitioner's daughter, and therefore that the enactment relied on by the petitioner is not applicable. The consequence is that the Lord Ordinary is right in refusing the petition.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—Where consent is necessary, no consent can avail unless it has been granted, or unless a substitute for consent has been obtained through the medium of a statutory proceeding of the nature of compulsitor on valuation. The requirements of the statute for valuation of interest and dispensing with consent had not been complied with, and no sufficient consent had been obtained. At this point of time, and under these circumstances, the infant heir was born. I concur in your Lordships' opinion that we cannot grant this petition.

I have some doubt whether, if the procedure under the statute for valuing and discharging the interest had been completed before the child was born, we could have granted this petition, seeing that the child was in utero, and its birth expected immediately. But on this point I merely reserve my opinion.

LORD MURE concurred.

ROBERT DOWNIE, Defender and Respondent.—Balfour—Moncreiff.

Bankruptcy—Trust-Deed—Principal and Agent—Right in Security.—A granted a trust-deed for behoof of all acceding creditors in favour of B, and afterwards entered into an arrangement to pay a composition in four instalments, he being allowed to carry on his business, but subject to the supervision of B until the first instalment should be paid. The first two instalments were paid, but when A failed to pay the third B took possession of his shop and goods, and sold off everything for behoof of the creditors in the trust-deed. A had in the period after granting the trust-deed purchased and paid for some goods from C, but at the date when B took possession he was owing C the price of certain other goods, a portion of which were then in his shop. C, after obtaining decree against A for the price of the goods, sued B also for the price as really the principal in the transaction. Held that A not having been divested, and the trust-deed having been a mere security for payment of the composition, B was not in any sense a principal in the transaction, and that A alone was liable for the price of the goods.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
I.

DAVID BROWN, baker, Cathcart Road, Glasgow, having got into difficulties, granted, on 13th November 1872, a trust-deed conveying all his estate to Robert Downie, accountant, Glasgow, for behoof of all his creditors acceding thereto, with full powers. On 23d November Brown agreed to pay a composition to his creditors in four instalments, the first of 3s. 6d. in the pound on 13th December 1872, the second of 1s. 6d. on 13th February 1873, the third of 2s. 6d. on 12th April 1873, and the fourth of 2s. 6d. on 13th June of that year. It was also arranged "that Mr Downie intromit with the estate funds until the first instalment of 3s. 6d. was paid."

In consequence of this arrangement Brown continued to carry on his business, and until 13th December 1872, when the first instalment fell

due and was paid, he accounted daily to Downie for the drawings of his shop. The second instalment was also paid on 13th February 1873, but the third, which fell due on 12th April, was not paid. Downie thereupon, on 16th April, went to Brown's shop, and getting possession of everything in it, sold off the perishable goods at once, and subsequently disposed of the whole fittings, &c., by auction.

William Miller, a flour merchant, who had supplied Brown with flour after the date of the trust-deed, raised an action against him for the price of the flour in the Sheriff Court, and obtained decree.

Brown, however, having in the meantime been incarcerated by another creditor, and being in course of suing a cessio, Miller raised this action for the price of the flour against Downie, as Brown's trustee, averring that Brown had been employed and authorised by Downie to carry on the business for his behoof as trustee for the creditors acceding to the trust-deed, and that Downie had adopted and homologated all Brown's actings and dealings.

Downie defended the action.

Pleaded for Miller, inter alia ;—(1) The goods sued for having been sold by the pursuer to the defender through David Brown, the pursuer is entitled to decree. (2) The defender having homologated and adopted the actings of David Brown, and received and appropriated the goods bought by him and the proceeds thereof, is liable for the price of the same. (4) Separatim, the pursuer not being a participant under the trust-deed, is entitled to be ranked in full primo loco on all the assets taken possession of by the defender which did not belong to Brown at the date of the trust-deed, and if such assets are not now distinguishable he is entitled to payment in full.

Downie pleaded, inter alia ;—(4) The goods, the price of which is sued for, not having been sold or delivered to the defender, as trustee for Brown's creditors or as an individual, the defender is not liable for the price of the same. (5) The dealings and actings of Brown having been without the defender's knowledge or sanction, and not having been adopted or homologated by him, and the defender not having ordered, received, or used the goods sued for, or the proceeds thereof, the defender is entitled to decree of absolvitor, with expenses.

The Sheriff-substitute allowed a proof, from which it appeared that Brown had not applied to Downie for written orders when obtaining more flour for use in his business, as was usual in cases where the trustee and creditors carried on a business for their own behoof. Moreover, Brown stated that he had informed Miller that he had executed a trust-deed in favour of creditors. It was proved that Brown had paid Miller for certain quantities of flour supplied to him after the date of the trust-deed out of his own funds. It was also proved that after the payment of the first instalment Downie had in no way interfered with Brown until he took possession of his shop and stock on 16th April on his failure to pay the third instalment. defender, Robert Downie, accountant, Glasgow, for behoof of his creditors at the date thereof and acceding thereto, with full powers: Finds (2) that several meetings of creditors took place, at the third of which, on 23d November 1872, as appears by the minute thereof, 7/2, Brown agreed to pay a composition by four instalments, the first at 3s. 6d. per £ on 13th December 1872, and a second of 1s. 6d. on 13th February 1873, a third of 2s. 6d. on 12th April, and a fourth of 2s. 6d. on 13th June thereafter, which the meeting agreed to; and 'it was resolved that Mr Downie intromit with the estate funds until the first instalment of 3s. 6d. was paid:' Finds (3) that accordingly till the first instalment was paid Brown regularly accounted to defender daily for the drawings of the shop: Finds (4) that the second instalment was also paid, but Brown failed to pay the third: Finds (5) that between the time of the first and third instalments Brown himself managed the shop, kept the proceeds thereof, ordered flour, &c., paid (in full) for various quantities of flour got by him for the purposes of the shop from pursuer, William Miller, and others, and also ordered and received from the pursuer the goods mentioned in the account, which were not paid for: Finds (6) that at the time of his failing to pay the third instalment defender took possession of the balance of cash in Brown's hands and the stock in the shop, including some bags of pursuer's flour, turned Brown out, and proceeded to collect the accounts, and realise the estate, which action was approved of by the creditors at a meeting on the 18th April 1873, conform to minute 7/4: Finds (7) that pursuer raised an action against Brown and got decree for the amount of his account, but got nothing thereby; and Brown, after being in prison some time under a decree at the instance of another party, obtained decree of cessio, and the pursuer has now raised this action against the trustee: Finds on the whole case and in law that in the circumstances defender has made himself liable qua trustee for the creditors for the amount of pursuer's account: Therefore decerns against defender as libelled," &c.*

Downie appealed, and the Sheriff (Gillespie Dickson), on 18th June 1875, adhered to his Substitute's interlocutor.†

Miller appealed to the Court of Session against the finding of the Sheriff that Downie was only liable qua trustee.

Argued for him;—At the time when the composition contract was entered into there were not assets sufficient to pay the composition. To do that the business had to be carried on successfully. The real interest was therefore in the trustee for the creditors. The true relation of the parties was that of principal and agent. The circumstances required that this was either a case of partnership or one of principal and agent, and it was clear from the evidence that from the way in which Downie drew the proceeds of the business that it was really a case of principal and

* "NOTE.—If the trust-deed had not been enforced it was Brown rather than defender to whom pursuer had to look for payment, in consequence of the composition arrangement. But by defender's putting in force at the time of the third instalment the trust-deed, it must be held that Brown was merely managing the business for his creditors all along. Either it was theirs or it was not theirs. If it was theirs he was simply manager; if it was not theirs they had no right to take it back. To assume that it was still theirs assumed that Brown's subsequent liabilities were the liabilities of their own manager."

† "NOTE.—There is no doubt that the defender incurred liability as trustee for the debt in question. The pursuer contended that he is also liable therefor personally.

agent. Downie was therefore liable, at all events in the first place, as an individual.[1]

Argued for Downie;—The flour was clearly the property of Brown; he had purchased it on the same footing as the other flour, for which he had paid out of his own funds. In any view this flour just came in place of what had been in stock at the time of the granting of the trust-deed. This was not a rei vindicatio, but a petitory action for the price of goods sold. All along Brown was acting for himself and not for the trustee and creditors. The fact of Downie entering into possession when he did shewed that he had had no true interest before.[2]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This claim does not rest on direct contract between pursuer and defender. It is conceded, and indeed clearly proved, that Miller knew no one in the transaction, and trusted to no one but Brown. He now, however, says that he has discovered since that Brown was really the agent of Downie—the trustee under a private trust conveyance for creditors—and claims against him as an undisclosed principal. He was not an undisclosed principal, for if Brown's evidence is to be trusted the pursuer was perfectly aware of Downie's title under the trust-deed, and therefore he did not regard Downie as principal at the time of this contract, and this of itself would go far in the solution of this case. But the ground of action is that the trustee was, in point of fact, the principal in this transaction, disclosed or undisclosed, and that the ostensible purchaser had no personal interest in the transaction, but was only an agent for the trustee. I am very clear in the general case that a trust-deed for security and payment of debt does not of itself divest the granter, or render the trustee and acceding creditors liable for the subsequent contracts made by the granter, unless they have by the nature of their proceedings acted as principals in the contracts themselves, or in the subjects to which these contracts relate. Their primary position is that of creditors only; and as long as they act in consistency with that character they will not be liable in any other. Even a creditor in legal possession under a specific security, while he will be liable for subsequent contractions, if these proceed on his mandate, express or implied, will not be liable simply in respect of his possession in security. But this case raises no such question. When these goods were ordered the trust-deed remained as a mere security for the payment of certain specific instalments of the composition; the debtor remained in undisturbed possession by the express consent of the creditors. He alone made the purchase for his own behoof, and the creditors could not have interfered either with the making or the fulfilment of the contract. It is a very clear case. The subsequent taking possession by the trustee, when the debtor failed to pay the third instalment, cannot possibly affect this question, whatever other rights might emerge out of it; but I am not prepared to say that the trustee had not a right to take the step which he did, and that solely in the character of a creditor holding a specific security, and without implying any other relation existing previously between him and the debtor.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I have come to the same conclusion, and agree with your Lordship that the Sheriff's judgment cannot stand.

Miller v. Downie.

The action is brought on the ground that as the trustee carried on the business through the agency of Brown, the bankrupt, he is liable for the debts incurred by Brown in so carrying on the business. That is the only ground of action libelled.

On the proof there is no sufficient evidence that Miller, when he sold flour to Brown, relied on the credit of the trustee at all. He himself gives very equivocal evidence on the point. I think it is clear, however, that he relied solely on Brown. He rendered no account to the trustee; he rendered it to Brown, and sued him for payment of it, and then, after getting his decree and finding it unavailing, he comes against the trustee. If he had made out that Brown was allowed to retain possession of his shop and bakery as the agent of the trustee and creditors, without doubt the trustee would have been liable. But, unfortunately for him, he has not made that out. On the contrary, it is clear, I think, that Brown was acting for himself, and that he alone is liable for the purchases he made. It was five weeks after the purchase and delivery of the last lot of flour that the trustee took possession of the shop and its contents. But the purchase had been previously made, and the flour delivered at a time when Brown was acting for himself. That being so, it is conclusive of the case. It is a mere question on the evidence, was Brown agent for the trustee and creditors or not? I can come to no other conclusion on the proof than that he was not.

The taking possession of the flour ultimately by the trustee raises a point on which I have some doubt. It was a sort of vitious intromission. The flour was not transferred to him, and could not have been by the trust-deed. But it was argued very ingeniously that the time for taking possession under the trust-deed was postponed, and that the flour ultimately taken delivery of by the trustee came into the place of what was in the shop at the date when the trust-deed was executed. But whatever doubt may attend this matter, I am satisfied that it cannot be dealt with under the present action as laid.

Lord Gifford.—I have formed the same opinion, and latterly with no difficulty whatever.

The action is for the price of flour sold and delivered by Miller to Brown. There is no direct contract between Miller and Downie,—they were never together in the matter. They never met. They never had any correspondence, and it is not pretended that Downie either directly or indirectly ordered the flour. He did not even know that it was being furnished by Miller, the pursuer. The only ground of the pursuer's claim against Downie is that although he had no contract with Downie he had one with Brown, who acted for Downie. It is urged that Brown had a mandate from Downie, and had power and authority to bind him.

This resolves the case into a question of fact, and it must be decided on the proof. The question is, whether or not it is established by the proof that Downie authorised Brown to buy flour, for the price of which he (Downie) would be responsible. I can see nothing in the evidence to shew that that was ever the position of parties, or that any such authority was ever given by Downie to Brown either directly or by implication. Brown became insolvent, and entered into a composition contract with his creditors, Downie having been appointed trustee. When a debtor enters into an arrangement to pay a composition to his creditors, and they agree to accept of the composition, the general rule is that the debtor gets back his estate, out of which, or by means of which, he is to pay the composition. The meaning is that the bankrupt is to be allowed to carry on or resume his business, paying therefrom the composition at the stipulated times. The creditors usually ask security for the composition, but they may do as they please in this respect. If Brown had paid all his instalments when they fell due I cannot see what liability the trustee and creditors would have been under to the subsequent creditors of Brown during the currency of the composition contract. The bankrupt resumed his business for his own behoof. The whole profit of it was his own, and neither the trustee nor the creditors had any responsibility therefor, unless they expressly interposed their credit. Now, there is not a particle of evidence that in the present case, and in regard to the flour sold and delivered by the pursuer to Mr Brown, either the creditors or the trustee, Mr Downie, interposed their credit, or, indeed, interfered in any way whatever. No doubt until the first instalment was paid Downie, as trustee for the creditors, called frequently at the shop and got the proceeds of the drawings of the business in order therewith to pay the composition, but there is nothing to suggest that he directed Brown in his purchases or gave him any orders of any kind. He only superintended and received the weekly drawings, but these were merely voluntary payments made to him by Brown towards payment of the first instalment of the composition, and even this course of dealing and these weekly payments came to an end when the first instalment of the composition was paid; nothing further occurred, and, in particular, Downie, the trustee, did nothing until Brown paid the second instalment due under his composition contract. It was during the interval between the paying of the first and the second instalments of the composition, and when Brown was in the full, absolute, and unlimited management of his own business, that this flour was purchased from the pursuer Miller. This was not the first purchase so made. There had been former purchases, and Brown had paid the price. Downie never heard of the transactions. Brown had the whole business, and he could do what he liked, provided he paid the instalments when they fell due. The pursuer himself admits that it was not on the credit of Downie that the flour was furnished, and that he looked for payment of the price, and rendered the account to Brown himself, so that if Downie has become liable therefor he has done so without the knowledge of the pursuer himself.

The only semblance of a difficulty in the case arises from what Downie did when he took possession under the trust-deed after Brown had failed to pay the third instalment. Now, it is possible that Downie, apart from Brown's consent, had no right to take possession of estate acquired by the bankrupt after the composition contract; but this is really immaterial in the present question. The flour undoubtedly was Brown's property, and if he did not object, no one else had any right to do so. The mere act of taking possession of the only two bags out of the whole quantity sold and delivered by the pursuer, cannot alter the state of matters between the parties, or make Downie liable for the whole debt due to the pursuer. Even as to the value of these two sacks, which is comparatively a very small sum, I do not think there are termini habiles for any claim against Downie. These two sacks had been absolutely out and out delivered to Brown, and Brown was entitled to apply them as he pleased.

I think the whole grounds of the present action are bad, and that the defender is entitled to absolvitor.

SIR WILLIAM DUNBAR, Bart., (Curator Bonis to ——).—Lee.

Mar. 7, 1876. Dunbar.

Special Powers—Insanity—Aliment—Nobile Officium.—An application by the curator bonis of a person incapax, for authority to pay out of the surplus income of the ward's estate an alimentary allowance to the only brother and heir-at-law of the ward, who was in destitute circumstances, refused, on the ground that this was a matter in which the Court would not interfere with the discretion of the curator.

2D DIVISION. Lord Rutherfurd Clark. R.

THIS was an application by Sir William Dunbar, curator bonis of Mr —— for authority to pay out of the surplus income of the ward's estate a yearly alimentary allowance to the only brother of the ward, and the heir-at-law to his estates, so long as he was in circumstances to require it.

The circumstances set forth in the note for special powers were shortly as follows:—

The ward's estates yielded a clear rental, after deducting all burdens and expenses, of about £2000 a-year; and the expenditure on the ward's account was about £1500 a-year—leaving a surplus of about £500 a-year.

The ward's brother, who was twenty-six years of age, had, on attaining majority, received payment of the sum of £10,000 provided to him under his father's settlements. He entered into speculative transactions, the result of which was that he lost his whole patrimony, and in July 1875 he was adjudged bankrupt in the London Court of Bankruptcy. He was thus left entirely destitute. He was of weak constitution, and had not been brought up to any profession.

The curator further stated;—"The curator bonis is apprehensive that if the ward (who is fully aware of his brother's unfortunate position, and is most anxious to help him), were to be told that he was powerless to afford him any assistance out of his surplus income, it will, in all probability, operate very injuriously upon his health. He has a great affection for his brother; is keenly alive to his destitute condition; and knows that he himself has sufficient income to enable him to give assistance. Though not capable of managing his own affairs, the ward is possessed of considerable intelligence, and quite comprehends the position of matters. He has strong feelings, and rational wishes on this and many other subjects, and, indeed, is not insane in the ordinary sense of the word. But he is excitable, and with little or no power of self-control, and requires care and assistance. His sisters (who are his next of kin), quite concur in the proposed authority."

* (After stating the facts, and that the ward's estate would probably be sufficient to afford the proposed allowance):—"The Court have frequently interponed their authority to advances by a judicial factor to sons and daughters of a lunatic, for their education, outfit in life, or aliment; and in some cases the Court have authorised a curator to continue to a brother or sister allowances which the lunatic had been in the practice of making to them, and which there was reason to believe it was intended to continue. Such authority was given in the cases of Duguid, Allardice's curator bonis, 1865 (n. r.), and in Carmichael, curator bonis to Hugh Scott, 1874 (n. r.).

"The Accountant, however, is not aware of any case in which the Court have authorised payment of an alimentary allowance to a brother, under circumstances similar or analogous to those involved in the present application, while there are several reported cases in which such authority has been refused. Reference may be made to the following:—Court, curator bonis to John Smith, Feb. 29, 1848, 10 D. 822; petition withdrawn, on opinion from the Court adverse to the application. Stewart, curatrix bonis to Stewart, Scot. Jur., Nov. 20, 1852, p. 30;[1] the Court refused the application. Robertson, curator bonis to Sinclair, Scot. Jur. 19th July 1853, p. 554; though the Accountant of Court reported favourably the Court refused the application.

"The special circumstances in the present case are, that the ward's brother received from his father an ample provision, all of which has been lost, either by misfortune or mismanagement; that he has not been educated for any profession through which he can now maintain himself, and that at the age of twenty-six he is entirely destitute. He is the heir-at-law of the lunatic ward, and the petitioner proposes, if he be authorised to make him an alimentary allowance, to take such obligation as shall secure repayment in the event of his succeeding to the estates now belonging to the ward, but such obligation can only be operative on the contingency of his surviving his brother."

† "This case is so peculiar that, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, it should be disposed of by the Court.

"If it had not been for the allegation that the refusal of the power would injure the ward, he would have refused it, for he thinks that, in ordinary circumstances, the Court cannot authorise a curator bonis to apply the estate under his charge in the support of the brother of his ward.

"But the curator alleges that the health of the ward would suffer if he were told that the surplus income of his estate could not be applied in the maintenance of his brother. Accordingly the application is made, not in the interest of the brother only, but in the interest of the ward. The Lord Ordinary was pressed to make inquiries into this allegation before reporting the case to the Court; but he has thought it to be the more proper course to report it as it stands, in order that the Court may direct such inquiry as it thinks proper to order, as well as the form of inquiry."

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Perthshire. I.

THIS action was raised in March 1874 in the Sheriff Court of Perthshire at Dunblane by James Buchanan, Callander, against his brothers, Thomas and Walter, as trustees of their father, the late Walter Buchanan, who died 12th May 1870. The conclusions of the summons were for count and reckoning for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of legitim due to the pursuer.

The defence was that the deceased had absolutely denuded himself of his personal estate during his life, and the question at issue was, whether a certain sum of £1000 was in bonis of the deceased at the time of his death.

From the proof it appeared that Walter Buchanan senior was in August 1869 possessed of about £1000 in money (of which £700 was lent to his son Thomas, and £300 deposited in bank), and also of house property to the value of about £40 a-year. He was then about seventy-three years of age, and, so far as it appeared, in good health. His only surviving children at that date were the pursuer, the two defenders, and two daughters, Isabella and Elizabeth, the latter being deaf and dumb. The evidence shewed that Mr Buchanan senior was desirous of excluding the pursuer from all share in his estate. On 5th August 1869 a meeting took place in Thomas's shop, at which Mr Buchanan senior, his sons Thomas and Walter, and his daughter Isabella, were present. On that occasion, according to the evidence of the defenders and their sister Isabella, he expressed his intention of dividing his personal estate among his children who had not already got their shares, and said that James (the pursuer) had already got his full share. Thomas then paid the sum due by him, and his father gave him a receipt therefor, which was produced in the present action. Nothing more appears to have been done upon that occasion, but about two days after a second meeting took place, of the same persons, also in Thomas's shop. What passed is thus described by the witnesses:—

Isabella Buchanan, examined for the defenders—"A day or two after that my father came again to the shop with £1000, which he said was all he had, and that he thought it would be better to give the £1000 to Thomas to keep and put out to interest on behalf of the rest of us. At the same time, Thomas, at my father's request, granted an I O U in favour of Elizabeth Buchanan for £400, and an I O U in favour of Isabella Buchanan for £300, and also an I O U in favour of my brother Walter for £300." Cross.—"When Thomas paid up the £700, he made the payment in money. My father told me that it was paid, and I supposed that it was paid in money. I did not see any money paid. My father spoke about it not being necessary to pay legacy-duty in consequence of the division he was making. I saw my father give £300 to Thomas on the day that the I O U's were written out. I cannot say that I then saw the notes of the £700 that my brother Thomas had got from my father. I knew when the I O U's were written out that I was to get a share, under my father's settlement, of the rents of his heritable property. I did not keep my I O U, but at once gave it back to my father to keep as he wished. My sister Elizabeth was not present when the I O U's were granted."

Thomas Buchanan,—"My father, at the time of division, asked me to write out the I O U's; and he told me what names and sums to put in them. I wrote them, and handed them to my father, and then he handed them to Isabell, who gave them back to my father, who handed them across the counter to Walter, who finally returned them to my father. They were then all on one sheet of paper. The I O U's were all on a single sheet of paper till after my father's death, when they were separated."

Walter Buchanan deponed that on 9th August 1869 (two days after this) his father gave him the paper containing the I O U's, and then took it back again, saying,—"Now, you can state after I am dead that I have given away all my money in my lifetime."

The paper containing the I O U's was placed by Walter Buchanan senior in a locked box, which he gave to his daughter Isabella a few days before his death, but without any instructions as to what was to be done with it. The key of the box he gave to his wife, who retained it till after his death, when the box was opened, and the paper in question found therein, along with the titles to his property and other documents.

It was stated in evidence that Thomas Buchanan paid interest on the £700 lent to him by his father until that sum was repaid, but there was no evidence as to whether or not any interest was paid by him to any one upon the £1000 handed to him by his father on or about 7th August 1869.

Mr Buchanan senior, as before-mentioned, died on 12th May 1870, survived by his five children before-mentioned, and his widow. The latter made no claim under her jus relictæ, and she died in 1872.

The Sheriff-substitute (Grahame) pronounced an interlocutor, of which the principal finding was as follows:—"That in August 1869, about nine months previous to his death, the said Walter Buchanan is proved to have paid over to the defender, Thomas Buchanan, the sum of £1000." He therefore found that the only sum available for legitim was a trifling sum, consisting of the value of the deceased's household furniture, and a proportion of the current half year's rent of his house property.

The Sheriff (Adam), on appeal, recalled the interlocutor of his Substitute, "and in place thereof, finds that, on the 7th August 1869, the said deceased Walter Buchanan paid to the defender, Thomas Buchanan, the sum of £1000, receiving from him in return three I O U's for the sums of £400, £300, and £300 respectively, in favour respectively of Elizabeth, Walter, and Isabella Buchanan: Finds that the said sum of £1000 was the property of the said deceased Walter Buchanan, and that no part of it was the property of the said Elizabeth, Walter, or Isabella Buchanan: Finds that the said I O U's were in possession of the said deceased Walter Buchanan at the time of his death, and that it is not proved that they were ever delivered to the said Elizabeth, Walter, or Isabella Buchanan respectively: Finds, therefore, that the said sum of £1000 formed part of the deceased's personal estate at the time of his death, and that the defenders, as his trustees, are bound to account for it, with

No. 91. interest at the rate of five per cent from the said 7th August 1869 to the date of the deceased's death."

Mar. 7, 1876. Buchanan v. Buchanan.

The amount of legitim due to the pursuer having been fixed by a subsequent interlocutor at £70, 17s. 5¼d., the defenders appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for the appellants;—This case was entirely different from cases in which the person, who went through the form of giving away his property, afterwards dealt with it as his own by receiving interest or otherwise, and in which cases it was accordingly held that there was no real divestiture. In the present case Mr Buchanan senior survived the transaction in question nine months, and it was not proved that he ever claimed the money or exercised any control over it. His expressed intention was to give away his entire moveable estate to his children in his lifetime. No doubt the object he had in view was to defeat the pursuer's claim to legitim, but that was not an unlawful object. The only question, then, which remained, was whether the form of the transaction was effectual to carry out that intention. There was a distinct delivery of the documents of obligation to two of the persons in whose favour they were granted, and the absence of the third (Elizabeth) was explained by her being deaf and dumb. As soon as the documents of debt passed out of the hands of the granter, Thomas Buchanan, the obligations therein contained became effectual, and it must be presumed, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, that the documents were handed to the father and retained by him as custodier for the creditors.[1]

The pursuer supported the judgment of the Sheriff, and argued that at most there was only a gift mortis causa of the £1000 in question, which could not affect the legitim fund.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—(After stating the facts)—There are two questions here, which are distinct—(1) whether the right conveyed ex facie of these obligatory writings was incomplete by reason of their not being delivered; and (2) whether, assuming that the forms of law have been sufficiently complied with, that which was done was intended to take effect during the lifetime of the father.

On the first of these questions, although it is narrow enough, I should hesitate to say that the obligation was ineffectual for want of formal completion. The ordinary rule of law is that an obligatory writing found in the hands of a third party is presumed to be held for the creditor, as it is beyond the control of the granter. A strong example of the rule, where it is very explicitly enunciated, will be found in the case of Turner, M. 11,582, in which a bond granted by a purchaser for the price of lands sold, taken in the name of the son of the seller, was found effectual against the father, having been delivered to a third party.

Buchanan v. Buchanan.

No doubt an exception has been admitted in some cases in which a father has taken rights purchased with his own money in the name of his children, and has retained the written obligations in his own custody. The cases in the Dictionary are numerous, and far from being consistent, the cases of Hill, in 1756, M. 11,580, and of Holwell, in 1796, M. 11,583, being apparently in contradiction to the prior case of Hamilton, in 1741, M. 11,576, and the case of Turner, in 1782. Even in such cases, however, it must be shewn that the father was the real creditor, and that fact, along with the retention of the bond, raises a presumption against the form of the obligation and the ordinary rule, and that no immediate gift was intended. But whenever the father has communicated the right to his children, and has intentionally so written, spoken, or acted as to lead to the inference that he regarded the right as transferred, that will be sufficient to remove the presumption, and his retention will be in the character of trustee only.

The real question, therefore, is the second,—not what was done in form, but what was intended in substance. Was the form of delivery which was gone through with the children intended to operate an instant completion of the gift, or was it only intended to make an apparent and simulate completion of it? If the first was intended I think the form was sufficient,—but the mere form must yield to the actual purpose.

I have found difficulty on this question also, but, on the whole, I have come to the conclusion that this case belongs to the same category as those of Hog v. Lashley, and Millie v. Millie; and that the intention of all the persons engaged was to give an appearance of immediate right so as to exclude the legitim and the legacy-duty, while the actual command of the whole fund remained, and was meant to remain, with the father. I have come to this conclusion mainly and almost solely from the fact that these obligations were retained by the father, a proceeding for which no reason has been suggested, if an immediate and instant right was really contemplated. The avowed object was to disappoint the legitim and the legacy-duty, not to make over the money; and it being an attempt to reconcile objects which were incompatible, it must necessarily fail.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I have come to the same result, although, at first, I must own that the case appeared to me to be attended with considerable difficulty. I am now satisfied, however, upon the principles stated by your Lordship, that the case really depends on an issue of facts, in regard to which the Sheriff has determined rightly.

The action is brought at the instance of one of the sons of Walter Buchanan against two of the pursuer's brothers, as trustees of their father, in the shape of a count and reckoning, and the object of the action is to obtain a share of the personal estate of the father as legitim. I do not find in the record any defence stated that the pursuer is not entitled to legitim in consequence of being forisfamiliated, or on any other ground, apart from the allegation that no fund or estate, except a trifle, was left, out of which legitim is due. In regard to this allegation, the question on the proof is, whether the contents of the three I O U's really did or did not form part of the father's personal estate at his death, or had been previously disposed of by him. The whole matter of the making over and delivery before his death of these I O U's to some members of his family is, to say the least of it, attended with a good deal of suspicion. In the first place, I can hardly understand how the old man should have thought of divesting himself of his whole personal estate at the time he is said to have done so, leaving only for his support a pittance of £40 a-year from some heritable property he had. Then, when we come to the transaction itself, we find it to be one of a very singular description. The old man had received payment from his son Thomas of a debt of £700 two days before; he not only returns the £700 to Thomas, but gives him £300 in addition. This being done, he next takes from Thomas the three I O U's upon the same piece of paper, and delivers them, it is said, in that form to three of his children as their own. If that was really his object, and if the three favoured children were to get the full command of the money, why, it may be asked, did he not pay it at once to them as money instead of putting or leaving it in the hands of Thomas, taking from him three I O U's? Or, if Thomas was not ready to pay up all the money, why, in that view, it may be asked, did not the father at all events divide among the children the £300 which he had in hand? All this goes far to satisfy me that the transaction was a mere form or device for the purpose of defeating the pursuer's legitim, and also, it may be, preventing a claim being made as for succession-duty at the instance of the Inland Revenue officers. He may have been entitled to accomplish both of these objects, provided he really did divest absolutely himself in his lifetime. But, looking at the evidence as a jury, I have come to the conclusion that the transaction was a mere bit of acting; that the old man intended to retain control of the money himself, and that his children should not have it till after his death. He retained the I O U's himself, having immediately got them back from his children, and locked them up in a box, giving the key not to any of the children, the nominal creditors in them, but to his wife. Accordingly the box, and the I O U's, do not again appear till after his death. But a father is not entitled to defeat either legitim or succession-duty by any scheme or device having the appearance merely of disposing of his means and estate inter vivos, but in reality not doing so till after his death. A mortis causa disposal of a man's estate can never defeat claims either of legitim or succession-duty. It therefore, on these grounds, appears to me that the Sheriff has taken the right view of this case, and that his judgment ought to be affirmed.

Buchanan v. Buchanan.

LORD GIFFORD concurred.

The Lord Justice-Clerk intimated that Lord Neaves, who had heard the debate, concurred in the judgment.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that, at the date of the obligatory writings in question, the appellant, Thomas Buchanan, was indebted to the deceased Walter Buchanan in the sum of £700, and that on the same date the deceased advanced £300 to the said Thomas Buchanan: Find that the said obligatory writings were prepared and delivered by Thomas Buchanan at the request of the deceased: Find that the deceased never parted with the said documents during his life, and that it is not proved that the deceased ever effectually became bound to hold these obligations in trust for the appellants, or intended that the same should be paid or exacted during his own life: Therefore dismiss the appeal, affirm the judgment, and decern: Find the appellants liable in expenses," &c.

Succession—Testament—Conditio si sine liberis decesserit.—A truster bequeathed the liferent of her estate to her grandson A, with power to the trustees to make payments to him out of capital, and on his death the fee of the estate, or of so much as should remain, to A's issue, whom failing, to one of her nephews W, whom failing, to his two children nominatim, "and to the survivor of them, and failing both, to my own nearest heirs and assignees whomsoever." A died without issue. W and his children predeceased A, but W's children were survived by issue. Held, in a competition between W's grandchildren and the representatives of the next of kin of the truster, that the conditio si sine liberis did not apply.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Craighill. R.

ON 27th May 1811 Mrs Jean Hepburn or Weir, widow of John Weir, merchant, Edinburgh, executed a trust-disposition and settlement in favour of certain trustees.

At the date when the deed was signed Mrs Weir's nearest relatives were—(1) two sisters, Ann and Elizabeth Hepburn; (2) a grandson, Alexander Mercer; (3) three nephews, of whom one was William Hepburn of St Vincents; and (4) two children of William Hepburn, named respectively William and Harriet Hepburn. Mrs Weir died on 24th January 1813, survived by the above mentioned relatives.

The trust-deed provided, after the usual clause as to payment of debts, &c., in the second place, that the trustees should pay to each of the truster's sisters £100, "and failing any one of them the survivor is to have right to the other's legacy." It was provided, in the third place, that the annual produce and interest of the truster's property should be paid to her sisters "in liferent equally betwixt them during their lives, and to the survivor of them." The deed then proceeded as follows:—"In the fourth place, that after the death of the survivor of the said Ann and Elizabeth Hepburn the said trustees shall pay the yearly produce and interest of my said property, sums of money, and effects, to Alexander Mercer, only surviving child procreate of the marriage betwixt the deceased Captain John Mercer, and Elizabeth Weir, my daughter, with power, however, to the said trustees, if they shall think advisable, to assign and pay over to the said Alexander Mercer the whole or any part of my said property, sums, and effects. In the fifth place, that the said trustees, on the death of the said Alexander Mercer, shall pay over and convey my said property, sums, and effects (unless they shall have assigned and paid the same to himself in his own lifetime), or what part thereof which shall remain after any partial payment thereof to him, and that to the child or children lawfully to be procreated of his body, equally amongst them, if more than one, share and share alike, whom failing, to William Hepburn of St Vincents, my nephew, and failing him, to William and Harriet Hepburn, his children, equally betwixt them, and to the survivor of them, and failing both, to my own nearest heirs and assignees whomsoever."

The longest liver of the truster's sisters died in 1825, and from that date the produce of the estate was paid to Alexander Mercer till his death on 5th July 1869. He was predeceased by his wife and children, and left no descendants.

William Hepburn of St Vincents had had other children besides William and Harriet mentioned in the trust-deed, but they had died before the date of the trust-deed. William and Harriet, as well as their father, predeceased Alexander Mercer. William was survived by two children, William and Mary, and Harriet by one daughter Henrietta.

In an action of multiplepoinding raised in 1874 for distribution of the estate competing claims were lodged for—

1. William and Mary Hepburn, the children of William Hepburn junior, and Henrietta Hill or Reilly, the daughter of Harriet Hepburn, who claimed (1) the provisions in favour of their parents, on the plea that the conditio si sine liberis applied, and alternatively (2) &c.

2. The marriage contract trustees of Mrs Hutchinson and others claimed as representing certain of the truster's "nearest heirs."

On 19th October 1875 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the residuary bequests in the trust-deed left by the truster, the late Mrs Jean Hepburn or Weir,—by which she appointed her trustees, in case of the failure of a child or children of the body of her grandson, Alexander Mercer, to pay over and convey, at his death, the trust-estate, or such part as should remain after any partial payment thereof, under the provisions of the will, 'to William Hepburn of St Vincents,' the truster's nephew, and failing him, to 'William and Harriet Hepburn, his children, equally betwixt them, and to the survivor of them, and failing both, to the truster's own nearest heirs and assignees whomsoever,'—is not qualified by the conditio si sine liberis decesserit: Therefore repels the first plea in law for the claimants, William Hepburn and others, and also repels the first and second alternatives of their claim: Ranks and prefers the claimants, Lieutenant-General William Nelson Hutchinson, and others, in terms of their claim; and likewise the claimants first mentioned, the aforesaid William Hepburn and others, in terms of the third alternative of their claim, and decerns: Finds the claimants, the said William Hepburn and others, liable in the expenses of the competition; allows an account," &c.*

* "NOTE.—The question here at issue is the construction of the latter part of the residuary bequest in the trust-disposition left by Mrs Jean Hepburn or Weir, who died so long ago as 1813. Her settlement was made in 1811; and then, as well as at her death, there were alive, of her near relatives, two sisters, a grandson, three nephews, a niece, and a grandnephew and grandniece, the children of William Hepburn, one of the three nephews. Each of her two sisters was a legatee to the extent of £100 under the second purpose of the trust; and failing 'any one of them,' the survivor was to have right to the other's legacy, which was to be payable six months after the death of the truster. These sisters were also liferenters of the trust-estate under the third purpose of the trust. The longest liver of the two survived till 1825, and on her death a grandson of the truster, Alexander Mercer, became entitled to the liferent of the estate. He survived till 1869. When he died, the right to the fee became vested in the fiars. Upon this point the competing claimants are agreed.

"There are two sets of claimants. The one consists of or represents the next of kin of the truster as at the date when the residue vested. The other consists of or represents the children of William and Harriet Hepburn, son and daughter of the truster's nephew, William Hepburn; and the bequest of the residue, as set forth in the fifth purpose of the settlement, is the subject of the present litigation.

"The children of William and Harriet Hepburn claim the fund on the ground that they are to be held as instituted in place of their parents by virtue of the condition si sine liberis decesserit. The next of kin of the truster, on the other hand, contend that the case is not one in which the condition referred to can be

William Hepburn and others reclaimed, and argued;—This was one of the cases where the conditio si sine liberis clearly applied. The whole of William Hepburn's children were called, so they were called as a class. The truster was in loco parentis to them. The gift was also one of the universitas of an estate. Moreover, it was much more likely that applied; and consequently, as William and Harriet Hepburn died before the period of vesting, that the residue now belongs to the next of kin. The Lord Ordinary thinks that the latter view is the sound one; and his reasons for this opinion can be briefly explained.

"A dispute as to the import of a will, it need hardly be said, is a dispute as to the intention of the testator. This is as true in a case, such as the present, where the question turns upon the existence of an implied condition, as it would be in a case where the controversy related to the interpretation of obscure, or, it may be, apparently contradictory provisions. Did the testator intend that the children of William and Harriet Hepburn should take the residue in room of their parents, if the latter died before the period of vesting? That, truly, is the issue now under trial. There are two ways, and only two ways, by which such an intention could be established. The first and most obvious, as assuredly it is the most satisfactory, is the testator's appointment. There is nothing of that kind here. On the contrary, the tenor of the clause is such as seems naturally to lead to the opposite conclusion. The father is to take, should he be alive at the death of Alexander Mercer, the truster's grandson. Should he fail, his children, William and Harriet, are to take. Should one of these two fail, the survivor is to take, and should both fail, the residue is to go to the next of kin of the truster. A bequest so framed seems almost inconsistent with the idea that there was in the contemplation of the testator any contingency by which the course of her succession, so clearly marked out, might be diverted.

"The other way by which the testator's intention may be shewn is the invoking of a presumption which in certain cases is afforded by the relation in which the testator stands towards the legatee. The law in these cases does not exactly make a will for the testator, but it supplements the will which has been made, by recourse to a presumption as to what would have been done had his will upon the point been expressed. The doctrine referred to has long been recognised, and is firmly established, but the cases to which it applies are limited, and their number ought certainly not to be increased. The present is a bequest to collaterals. A grandnephew and a grandniece are the legatees. Had they been called to the succession as a class the conditio si sine liberis decesserit might have been applied. This is proved by numerous decisions. These legatees, however, were called, not as a class, but individually by name; and for this reason the Lord Ordinary thinks that the doctrine in question has no application. The counsel for the unsuccessful claimants contended that, as William and Harriet Hepburn were, at the date of the will, the only surviving children of William Hepburn, they, though named, must be regarded as the whole members of a class, or, in other words, as a class. The Lord Ordinary doubts whether, in any circumstances, the suggestion here presented would be warrant for extending the operation of the condition; but be that as it may, it cannot, as he thinks, be viewed as such upon this occasion, because William Hepburn, the father, was alive at the date of the will, and, for anything that appears, his family might have been increased by the birth of other children.

"The cases referred to by the counsel for the claimants who have been successful, were Fleming, Mor. 8111, and Hamilton, 16 S. 478. Those referred to on the other side were, Wallace, Mor. Appx., voce 'Clause,' No. 6; Ross and others (Thomson's Trs.), 13 D. 1326; Scott and others (M'Gown's Trs.), 8 Macph. 356; M'Call and others, 10 Macph. 281; and Irvine, 11 Macph. 892. The Lord Ordinary thinks it right also to cite the case of Chancellor, 10 Macph. 995, as there are dicta in the report which seem to recognise the views of the law by which he has been influenced in pronouncing the foregoing interlocutor."

she would prefer the children of her institute to her own heirs whatsoever.[1]

Argued for Mrs Hutchinson's trustees;—The truster was never in loco parentis to the children of her nephew William. Their father survived her. This was not a bequest in favour of a class. William might have had other children, and they would not have taken. There was here also a survivorship clause, which was against the presumption of the conditio applying.[2]

LORD ORMIDALE.—I need not enter into an examination of the general principles of law applicable to this case, as we had occasion to do so very recently in the case of Blair's Trustees.

In the present case there are some of the specialties or peculiarities which occurred in the case of Blair's Trustees, and which appear to me to be sufficient for its decision. We have, in the first place, a destination to William Hepburn of St Vincents, who was to take as conditional institute on the death of Alexander Mercer, the grandson of the testator, in the event of there being any residue, which there might not be, as the trustees had power to assign and pay over the whole estate to Alexander Mercer during his lifetime. It so happens that we have in this destination an undoubted case of selection. At the date when the deed was executed William Hepburn had two brothers living, and yet he is the brother alone selected and preferred by the testatrix; and it will be also remarked that she carries her predilection further in favour of his children nominatim. Now, in the case of Blair's Trustees I founded strongly on a similar circumstance, and so, I think, did your Lordship in the chair. It was the distinguishing feature in that case, as also in some of the earlier decisions; and it is a prominent feature of the present case. Children are not called as a class, but only two nominatim. William Hepburn might have had more children either by his then subsisting marriage or a subsequent one.

I go also upon what immediately follows, viz., the destination to these two children "equally betwixt them, and to the survivor of them, and failing both, to my own nearest heirs nnd assignees whomsoever."

The intention of the testatrix is the guiding rule, and I cannot read the deed here without being satisfied that it was not her intention to leave her property to any one who was not named by her.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion, but I have arrived at it with some hesitation. My leaning has always been towards the views formerly expressed by Lord Benholme, and towards the extension of the rule under which, when a bequest or provision is made in favour of near relatives of the testator, there is an implied provision that if the legatee predecease the testator leaving children, these children shall take the legacy or provision as conditional institutes to their parents. I think that this will in general be more in accordance with a testator's intentions than that such legacy should simply lapse. But the current of recent decisions has been rather adverse to the extension of this implied institution of children, and in deference to these judgments I concur in the decision now proposed. In the recent case of Blair's Trustees I was for holding that there was an implied condition that if the legatees called predeceased, their children should take, but I was in the minority, and I hold myself now bound by the judgment in that case, and that decision goes in an opposite direction, having the effect of narrowing the application of the rule.

You must look to the terms of the testator's deed, to the whole expressions made use of, and to the whole circumstance, taking them all into view, before you can say that the conditio si sine liberis was intended by the testator to apply. The question is always what was the intention of the testator. In the present case, when we look at the circumstances, the grounds and reasons for implying the substitution or conditional institution of children are weaker than occurred in many cases where the Court have refused to apply the conditio si sine liberis. The testator here selects a nephew, and provides that, if he fails, two of his children called nominatim are to take up the succession. No doubt they were the only children of the institute in life at the time, but there might have been more, and I think this must be held to have been in the testator's view. She does not go on to add the words used by her immediately before, "to the child or children to be procreated of his body." I do not think the Court can be called upon to insert for the the testator words which the testator might so easily have used if her intention had been what these words express. That would be making a will for the testator which she has not made for herself. The Court are not vaguely to guess at what the testator might probably have intended, but simply to gather the intention from the words used.

ALEXANDER M'CUTCHEON (Carson's Trustee), Real Raiser and Claimant.—D.-F. Watson—M'Laren.
ROBERT M'WILLIAM, Claimant.—Burnet—Low.

Right in Security—Assignation.—The creditor in a bond and disposition in security granted an assignation, inter alia, of the heritable subjects disponed in the bond, but did not expressly assign the bond itself or the debt; the assignation, however, bore to be "in real security of" the sum in the bond. The assignation contained an assignation of writs conform to inventory, in which inventory the bond was included. The bond was not delivered to the assignee, but a copy was. Three years after the date of the assignation the estates of the creditor were sequestrated, and his trustee completed his title to the bond by recording a notarial instrument two years after the assignee had been infeft in the subjects. In a competition between the assignee and the trustee, held (rev. judgment of Lord Curriehill) that the assignation was valid and effectual to convey the debt as well as the security.

Statute 37 and 38 Vict., cap. 94, sec. 25—Sasine—Recording.—The 25th section of the "Conveyancing and Land Transfer (Scotland) Act," 1874, abolished the distinction between burgage and feu-holding, and provided also that owners of lands held burgage might grant feus, and that "the titles of all such feus granted before the commencement of this Act shall be unchallengeable on the grounds that such feus are of land held by burgage tenure, or that such titles have been recorded in the Burgh Register of Sasines."

Where the holder of a security over certain heritable subjects, originally burgage but feued out by the magistrates, had, prior to the Act, recorded his infeftment in the Burgh Register, and his title was therefore objected to, opinion (per Lord Curriehill) that the provisions of the above section applied, and that the title was a good one.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Curriehill. I.

BY bond and disposition in security, dated 11th July 1853, James Brown, mason, Wigtown, in consideration of £100 advanced to him by Mr Carson, writer there, disponed and made over to and in favour of Mr Carson in security certain heritable subjects in Wigtown. Carson was infeft on the security, and on 22d June 1870, by disposition and assignation, in consideration of £700 advanced to him by Robert M'William, S.S.C., Edinburgh, "he sold, alienated, assigned, disponed, conveyed, and made over" to Mr M'William various heritable subjects, including, inter alia, "sixth, all and whole that piece of ground, &c. (being the subjects disponed to him in Brown's bond) . . and that in real security, to the said Robert M'William, of the sum of £100 sterling, interest and penalty, borrowed by James Brown . . . from me, the said William Carson, conform to bond and disposition in security, dated 11th July 1853, and recorded," &c. The assignation also contained an assignation of all right, title, or interest which Carson had in the whole subjects disponed, and a clause of warrandice, and an assignation of writs, which were stated to be delivered "according to inventory, so far as in my possession." Brown's bond to Carson was No. 10 of the inventory, but it did not appear to have ever been delivered to M'William, who only got a copy of it. M'William expede an instrument of sasine on the assignation, and recorded it in the Register of Sasines for the burgh of Wigtown on 11th March 1872. Carson died on 23d November 1871, and his estates were sequestrated on 17th March 1873, and Alexander M'Cutcheon, banker, Newton-Stewart, was appointed trustee thereon. M'Cutcheon discovered Brown's bond in Carson's repositories, and proceeded to make up a title to it in his own person, as trustee, on 17th December 1874, by expeding a notarial instrument in accordance with the "Titles to Land Consolidation Act," 1868, which he recorded in the General Register of Sasines applicable to the county of Wigtown.

Brown subsequently executed a general disposition of his whole estates in favour of trustees, and a Mr Douglas purchased the subject from the trustees. An action of multiplepoinding was raised in Douglas's name, and M'Cutcheon and M'William both claimed the amount in the bond.

It appeared that the subjects disponed by Brown, though properly burgage subjects, had been held by Brown in feu from the magistrates of Wigtown, and Brown's infeftment was recorded only in the Particular Register of Sasines for the shire of Wigtown. The bond in favour of Carson was, however, recorded both in the burgh and county Register of Sasines, but M'William, as above stated, did not record his assignation in any Register of Sasines, but expede an instrument of sasine more burgi in the whole subjects, which he recorded in the Burgh Register of Sasines.

M'Cutcheon pleaded;—(1) The claimant, by the act and warrant of confirmation in his favour, is vested in the real security constituting the fund in medio. (2) The deed founded on by the claimant M'William being disconform to the statutes regulating the transmission of heritable securities, and being ineffectual at common law or by statute to transfer such securities, did not divest the bankrupt of his right and interest in the fund in medio. (3) Assuming that the deed in favour of M'William was effectual to transfer to him a personal right to the fund in medio, such personal right is ineffectual as a preference in competition with the present claimant's infeftment. (4) The infeftment of the claimant M'William, being dated prior to the passing of the "Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874," is null, (and liable to be set aside by exception under the Bankruptcy Act, 1856), in respect that while the subjects disponed in security are held feu, the infeftment is not registered in the General Register of Sasines, but is registered in the Burgh Register of Sasines of Wigtown.

M'William pleaded;—(1) The late Mr Carson having disponed and assigned to the claimant the subjects in question, and his whole right, title, and interest therein, and having granted warrandice, and assigned the writs, including the bond in his favour, and the claimant having been infeft thereon, he thereby became vested with all Mr Carson's rights. (2) The trustee in bankruptcy being only vested with the bankrupt estate tantum et tale as it existed in the person of the bankrupt, he has no good claim to the fund in medio.

On 3d November 1873 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the sum of £100, and interest thereon, contained in the bond and disposition in security mentioned in the summons, and the lands thereby conveyed in security thereof by James Brown, the granter of said bond, to the late William Carson, also mentioned in the summons, and forming the fund in medio in this action, were not effectually transferred to or vested in the claimant Robert M'William by the bond and assignation, of which No. 8 of process is an extract, granted by the said William Carson to the claimant Robert M'William, dated 22d June 1870, or by the instrument of sasine thereon, No. 11 of process, expede by the said Robert M'William, and recorded in the Register of Sasines: Finds that the said debt and security are now vested in and belong to the claimant Alexander M'Cutcheon, as trustee on the sequestrated estate of the said William Carson, in virtue of the act and warrant of confirmation, and of the notarial instrument expede by him, No. 33 of process: Therefore repels the claim of the said Robert M'William: Sustains the claim of the said Alexander M'Cutcheon, and ranks and prefers him upon the fund in medio in terms of said claim, and decerns: Finds the said Robert M'William liable in expenses to the said Alexander M'Cutcheon: Appoints an account thereof," &c.*

* NOTE.—(After narrating the facts)—"The sole grounds on which the trustee in the sequestration objects to the claim of Mr M'William, and himself claims the debt and security in question as part of the bankrupt estates, are—(1) that the disposition and assignation is, in consequence of defects in form, not a valid and effectual transference of the debt and security from Carson to M'William; (2) that even assuming the disposition and assignation to have been in proper form, M'William has never been validly infeft in the security, and is now excluded from claiming the debt in consequence of the trustee having completed a feudal title thereto in his own person.

"1. The first question is the most important. It is, whether Brown's security was validly transferred by Carson to M'William by the disposition and assignation already mentioned? That deed includes, as has been mentioned, several heritable subjects and other securities. It proceeds thus:—'I, William Carson, &c., in consideration of the sum £700 sterling paid and advanced for me by Robert M'William, S.S.C.' &c., 'have sold and disponed, and hereby sell, alienate, dispone, assign, convey, and make over to the said Robert M'William, his heirs and assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably.' . . . . . .

M'William reclaimed, and argued;—The assignation founded on, though not in accordance with the schedule annexed to the statute of 1868, was tions mentioned in a contract of feu, dated the 21st day of March 1853, entered into between the magistrates and council of the burgh of Wigtown, on the one part, and the said John Adamson, on the other part, and that in real security to the said Robert M'William of the sum of £100 sterling, interest and penalty, borrowed by James Brown, mason and house builder in Wigtown, proprietor of said subjects, from me, the said William Carson, conform to bond and disposition in security, dated 11th July 1853, and recorded in the Register of Sasines for the burgh of Wigtown 19th November 1855.' These words, it is maintained on the part of Carson's trustee, do not in form or in substance constitute a valid or effectual assignation to Mr M'William of the security in question. I think the trustee's contention is sound. The debt is not assigned,—the bond itself is not assigned,—and nothing in short purports to be conveyed but the subjects over which the debt is secured. There can be no doubt that the debt as well as the security was intended to be assigned; and as in a question with Carson himself or his representatives (in the absence of insolvency), M'William could have insisted upon Carson granting a valid and formal assignation of the debt, and failing that, he could have adjudged the same in implement. But I do not think that the debt itself, which is not in terminis assigned, and to which the subjects are merely accessory as security, can be held to have been by implication assigned to Mr M'William in such a manner as to enable him to complete a title thereto, by simply recording the disposition and assignation, or even by expeding and recording an instrument of sasine, or other notarial instrument, thereon.

"In the first place, the assignation, neither in form nor in substance, follows the schedule (G.G.) in the 'Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868,' which, substantially re-enacting the corresponding provision of the Heritable Securities Act of 1845, allowed securities which had once been constituted by infeftment to be transferred in the short form set forth in the schedule; it being declared that on such assignation being recorded in the appropriate Register of Sasines the security 'shall be transferred to the assignee as effectually as if such security had been disponed and assigned, and the disposition and assignation or conveyance had been followed by sasine duly recorded according to the law and practice prior to the 1st day of October 1845, at the date of recording such assignation or conveyance.' But it will be seen at a glance that the disposition and assignation in question does not conform to the schedule, in respect—(1) that it does not assign or bear to assign the bond and disposition in security itself; and (2) that even when the bond is referred to it does not specify the names of either the granter or the grantee, all of which are particulars required by the schedule, and the failure to insert which is, in my opinion, a fatal omission. It is only on condition of following the new statutory forms that parties are allowed to dispense with the forms in use under the older law and practice.

"On the other hand, it is impossible to maintain that the security has been validly assigned in the form required by the law and practice prior to 1845. That practice required a disposition and assignation expressly assigning—(1) the sum due and interest; (2) the bond and disposition in security itself; and (3) the lands in real security to the assignee of the sums, principal and interest, &c., and containing an obligation to infeft, a procuratory of resignation, and a precept of sasine; and to complete the transference an instrument of sasine had to be expede and recorded in favour of the assignee. But there is not in the present deed any substantial adherence to the old form; and I am therefore of opinion that the security in question was not assigned by Carson to M'William in such a manner as to enable the latter to complete a feudal title thereto as assignee under any of the forms known to or recognised by the law and practice prior to 1845, or sanctioned by the statute of that year and by subsequent legislation.

"But apart from these considerations, I think that Mr M'William's case must fail on more general grounds. The debt must be regarded as the principal, and effectual to convey the debt and security to the assignee. It was not compulsory to follow the forms prescribed by the statute. The bond was the lands as merely accessory as security. It is indeed true that where a debt has been rendered heritable by being secured over land, it cannot be effectually transferred so as to entitle the assignee to prevail in a competition with a subsequent adjudication or assignation completed by sasine, unless the heritable subjects, as well as the debt, are conveyed to the first assignee with a proper warrant for sasine followed timeously by infeftment.—Anstruther v. Black, Mor. 829. But this case gives no support to the view that the conveyance of the lands held by the cedent in security of a debt due to him by the owner of the lands will transfer the debt. On the contrary, the import of the decisions appears to me to be, that where a debt is heritably secured and the creditor is duly infeft, the debt itself and the subjects over which it is secured are held to be so inseparably connected that in order effectually to assign the debt both it and the lands must be expressly conveyed by a deed adapted to convey heritable property.

"It is said, however, by Mr M'William that, in virtue of the clause of 'assignation of writs' contained in the disposition and assignation, the debt itself, and the bond and disposition constituting it, have, as well as the lands, been validly assigned to him. The clause is in the following terms:—'And I assign the writs, and have delivered the same according to inventory, so far as in my possession;' and in the inventory, which is a separate document, the bond and disposition in security in question is set forth as being article 10 thereof. But it is also a fact in the case that the bond was not delivered to Mr M'William, but remained in Mr Carson's possession until his death; that it has never been in the possession of Mr M'William; and that it is now in the possession of the trustee. Besides all this, it cannot be said that the insertion of a writ in an inventory, which is a separate document from the disposition and assignation, is equivalent to a specification and assignation of the debt and grounds of debt, either according to the old established form of conveyancing, or the short form introduced and sanctioned by the recent statutes. It appears to me, therefore, that the original defect in the dispositive clause of the deed is not remedied by the clause assigning the writs.

"But it is further maintained by Mr M'William that esto there has been a failure here to comply with the rules of conveyancing, and that he was not in a position, without farther procedure, to make up a valid feudal title in his own person to the debt and security, still, as the security only vests in the trustee in the sequestration tantum et tale as it stood in the person of the bankrupt, and as the bankrupt was bound to give a good title to M'William, therefore the trustee can take the subject only under the like obligation. I am of opinion that this contention of the claimant cannot be sustained. It is true that in some cases where the bankrupt's right to an heritable subject, or an interest in heritable property, was at the date of the sequestration a mere personal right, a security granted prior to the sequestration over that right, in the belief that the bankrupt's feudal title was complete, will not necessarily be defeated merely because the granter's own right is afterwards found to have been a personal right. The security will be sustained, provided actual or constructive intimation of the assignation has been made; and in such cases registration of the deed or of sasine thereon in the Register of Sasines, though unavailing as the completion of a feudal title, has been held equivalent to intimation.—See the cases of Paul v. Turnbull, 13 Sh., p. 818; Edmond v. The Magistrates of Aberdeen, 18 D., p. 47. But the present case is in no way analogous to either of those referred to, for here Carson, the cedent, was himself feudally infeft in the heritable security; the only proper and competent mode of divesting himself thereof was by a formal assignation in one or other of the well known forms, and completed by infeftment; and if he failed so to transfer, the assignee, who is himself a law-agent, and who seems to have himself prepared the deed, must bear the consequences of taking a defective assignation. This is just the ordinary case of a security being blundered by careless conveyancing, and thereby losing in a included in the inventory of writs assigned in the assignation, and so was assigned along with the subjects. The assignee had, in any view, a right to have compelled Carson to give up the bond, and M'Cutcheon, as Carson's trustee, could not be in a better position than the bankrupt, as he only took the estate tantum et tale as it stood in the bankrupt.

Argued for M'Cutcheon;—As the assignation followed neither the new form nor the old, it was invalid and ineffectual to convey the debt and security. No mention was made of the debt, so it could not be held to have been assigned. A mere assignation of a security was of no avail sequestration the preference to which its priority in date might otherwise have entitled it. In short, the question simply is, was Brown's security, or was it not, a part of the estate of Carson at the date of the sequestration? In my opinion it remained so, because the disposition and assignation in favour of M'William was inhabile to denude Carson. This being the case, the trustee, who has expede a feudal title to the security by notarial instrument following on his act and warrant of confirmation, has now fully vested himself with the debt for behoof of the general creditors, and the claimant M'William cannot successfully compete with him for the amount.

"2. If I am right in the view now indicated, it is unnecessary to dispose of the other question raised in the record, which is, whether, assuming the assignation of the security not to be inept from defect of form, the infeftment which Mr M'William expede is inept in consequence of being recorded in the Burgh Register of Sasines, instead of in the General County Register of Sasines, being the appropriate register for writs affecting subjects which, like those in question, are held in feu? If this objection be well founded, Mr M'William cannot now, by any new procedure, make his right preferable to the real right completed by the trustee. Prior to the passing of the Conveyancing Act of 1874 this objection would have been formidable. But I think it is obviated by the 25th section of that statute, which abolishes the distinction between the tenures of feu and burgage, and provides, inter alia, that the 'proprietors of estates in land which were held burgage shall be entitled to grant feus of the same, in the same manner and to the like effect as if such estates in land had been held by feudal tenure; and the titles of all such feus granted before the commencement of this Act shall be unchallengeable, on the grounds that such feus were of land held by burgage tenure, or that such titles have been recorded in the Burgh Register of Sasines.'

"The facts upon which the present question depends are as follows:—(1) The parties agreed in stating at the bar that the subjects, which are situated within the burgh of Wigtown, are part of the burghal territory granted to the burgh by the royal charter in their favour; (2) That these subjects, though properly burgage subjects, were granted in feu by the magistrates to Brown or his predecessor, and that the infeftment in favour of Brown was recorded in the Particular Register of Sasines for the shire of Wigtown; (3) That the bond and disposition in security granted by Brown to Carson was recorded by Carson both in the Burgh Register and the County Register of Sasines; and (4) That the claimant, Mr M'William, did not record his disposition and assignation in any Register of Sasines, but expede an instrument of sasine more burgi in the whole subjects conveyed to him by that deed, including the subjects in Brown's security, and recorded that instrument in the Burgh Register of Sasines. It appears to me that such a case is one of those provided for by the recent statute. The assignation is a title,—no doubt a security title, but still a title,—to a feu granted before 1st October 1874, of land which was originally held burgage, but which has been feued out. Such a title is by the Act declared to be unchallengeable, although recorded in the Burgh Register of Sasines.

"As my opinion, however, is adverse to Mr M'William on the main branch of the case, it follows that his claim must be repelled, and the claim for Mr M'Cutcheon, the trustee in the sequestration, sustained, with expenses."

without an assignation to the debt also.[1] The doctrine of tantum et tale did not apply to such a case as this.

No argument was addressed to the Court upon the second question referred to by the Lord Ordinary.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The only question which it is necessary for us to decide is whether the disposition and assignation in favour of M'William is effectual as an assignation of the debt, in security of which the granter held the lands which are conveyed.

There is no question that in point of feudal form the lands are validly conveyed; and the question whether the debt was at the same time assigned is a mere question of the intention with which the words of this deed were used by the granter. If the granter did not mean to assign the debt, it may be that the conveyance of the heritable subject would be nugatory; but if he did mean to assign it, the expressions in the conveyance are abundantly sufficient to give effect to that intention.

That the granter meant to assign the debt admits, I apprehend, of no doubt. The conveyance is granted in security of a debt of £700, and the property in question is disponed in security of that sum to the extent of £100, which sum of £100 the deed proceeds to narrate had been borrowed from the granter by the owner of the subjects, which were held by him in security thereof. The only meaning of this is that the transferee is to hold the security to the same effect and for payment of the same amount as the granter could have done; and this is neither more nor less than the effect which an assignation would operate.

But the conveyance does not stop there, for it proceeds to make over all right, title, and interest which the granter had in the premises. This, I apprehend, covered, in words and in effect, not only the granter's interest in the heritable subjects, which indeed would be sufficient, but his interest in the debt also; and then he assigns the writs, the inventory of which includes the bond and disposition in security, which contains not only the conveyance but the personal obligation for the debt. This ought to have been delivered with the disposition, and if it had been I do not see how the trustee ever could have maintained his claim.

The Lord Ordinary has taken great pains with the case; but his view seems too strict. Any words which express a present intention to transfer are sufficient as an assignation, apart altogether from forms of style or the schedules of the recent statute. This is a very inartistic and careless piece of conveyancing, but on this point I entertain no doubt of its being effectual.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I am of the same opinion and on the same grounds. There can be no doubt that there was a disposition of the subjects themselves; but such a disposition without a transference of the debt would place matters in a very anomalous position. The security could be worth nothing to Carson if the debt merely remained with him, while the subjects forming the security were disponed to M'William without the debt.

It may be said that the deed, so far as the £100 is concerned, is a nullity altogether, on account of the informal and confused manner in which it is framed.

M'Cutcheon v. M'William.

But I cannot hold that. The latter part of the deed bears, not only by the strongest implication, but, I think, by express words, that both the debt and the bond were conveyed to M'William. The conveyance might not be valid in terms of the recent Act, because it is not in the statutory form requisite under that Act; but according to the old methods of conveyancing, which may still be used, no statutory form was enjoined or indispensable. Now, although in either view the conveyance here is very peculiar in its terms and style,—certainly anything but commendable,—it is, I think, sufficiently clear in regard to its meaning and effect to enable the Court to give judgment in favour of the reclaimer, Mr M'William.

Lord Gifford.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and I cannot say that after a little consideration I have found any difficulty in the case. It is quite true that this conveyance in favour of Mr M'William is a very ill-expressed and ill-drawn deed.

The question, however, is what is the real meaning and effect of the deed as it stands? What is the legal right which it confers upon the disponee? If its meaning is plain, and if it contains all statutory requisites, it must receive effect, notwithstanding all fault or inaccuracies of expression. Now, I think it is quite clear that the deed conveys to Mr M'William all the right which Carson, the disponer, had himself to the subjects in question. Clearly Carson intended to put M'William in his place, and this is sufficiently expressed. Carson himself had merely a security right, so he says in the deed, "in real security to the said Robert M'William," his disponee, who was his creditor for £700. Then he specifies the debt of £100 borrowed by Brown, the proprietor of the subjects; and it seems to me that this is quite sufficient to give to M'William for his security every right which Carson had over the subjects conveyed to him by Brown. Carson held the subjects in security of £100, and stood validly infeft therein. He dispones and conveys them to M'William "in security." I cannot read this otherwise than as an assignation of Carson's security right. But it is said that Carson should have expressly assigned the debt due to him by Brown, and, no doubt, this would have been more formal and regular, but I think that the conveyance of the debt is implied necessarily in conveying the subject of the security. If this were not so, the conveyance would mean nothing, and effect would be denied to the words used. But there is no rule of law which drives the Court to so inequitable a result. A creditor who hands over for value a pledge which he holds from a third party necessarily empowers the assignee to make the pledge effectual, and especially when the pledge is a heritable subject which makes the debt a heritable debt. But even in strict interpretation of the words I think the debt is conveyed. The subjects are disponed to M'William "in security" of the £100 due by Brown—that is, in security to M'William that he, M'William, shall receive this £100. The words can have no other meaning, and I think we must read them so as to be grammatical. No verba sollemnia are required in a conveyance like this. If the meaning of the deed is plain any kind of expression will do, and the solemn words of conveyance are complete.

It is impossible to read the sentence as it stands without seeing what it means. The writs are assigned, and the bond is included in the inventory of writs. In short, Carson, being largely indebted to M'William, conveys to him the security which he, Carson, held from Brown, and he specially assigns to him Brown's bond. That bond then belonged not to Carson but to M'William. Carson could not have kept it back from M'William, so his trustee cannot. The meaning of the deed is so plain that it does not need even implication strong to carry Brown's debt. It would be to deny the deed any meaning to allow the trustee to take what M'William had completed a title to long before. I think M'William being undoubtedly vested with the feudal title to the subjects, —and this was admitted in argument,—he is the only person who is entitled to discharge the incumbrance thereon, that is, to receive payment of and discharge Brown's bond.

Smyth v. Smyth.

JOHN SMYTH, Pursuer.—Darling.
PATRICK SMYTH, Defender.—Scott—Lang.

Writ—Attesting Witnesses—37 and 38 Vict., c. 94, sec. 39.—The Conveyancing and Land Transfer (Scotland) Act, 1874, sec. 39, enacts that "no deed, instrument, or writing subscribed by the granter or maker thereof, and bearing to be attested by two witnesses subscribing, and whether relating to land or not, shall be deemed invalid or denied effect according to its legal import because of any informality of execution, but the burden of proving that such deed, instrument, or writing so attested was subscribed by the granter or maker thereof, and by the witnesses by whom such deed, instrument, or writing bears to be attested, shall lie upon the party using or upholding the same."

Held that the clause did not apply to a case where the signatures of witnesses bearing to attest the subscription of the granter of a deed were adhibited before the subscription of the granter, and where the witnesses neither saw the granter sign nor heard him acknowledge his subscription.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Curriehill. I.

THIS action of reduction was raised by John Smyth, Glasgow, against Patrick Smyth, Glasgow, to reduce "a pretended assignation bearing to be dated 1st June 1874, and to be granted by the deceased Francis Smyth in favour of the defender of a debt of £20."

The pursuer averred;—"The said pretended assignation is deficient in the statutory solemnities of execution, in respect that the alleged witnesses neither saw the alleged granter sign nor heard him acknowledge his signature;" and pleaded, that the assignation was consequently null, and ought to be reduced.

The defender founded on sec. 39 of the Act 37 and 38 Vict., c. 94.*

A proof was allowed.

Mar. 9, 1876. Smyth v. Smyth.

Bernard Gallagher, whose name appeared on the deed as an attesting witness, in his examination as a witness for John Smyth, stated,—"I see the signature of the witnesses to this deed. I see the name Bernard Gallagher. It is my signature. I remember the circumstances connected with the signing of the deed. It was signed in the house of Patrick Smyth, in Sandyfaulds Street in Glasgow, on the evening of Monday, June 1st 1874. In consequence of a message which I received through my wife I went down to Patrick Smyth's house that night, and when I went the document No. 7 of process was handed to me by Patrick Smyth. At that time there was no signature to the paper, but it bore two pencil marks indicating where the witnesses were to sign their names. . . . The pencilled markings were rubbed out by Patrick Smyth. When the paper was handed to me I read it over. Smyth's house consisted of a room and a kitchen. All this happened in the kitchen. The deceased was in the inner room, and when I had read the paper I took it in my hand and went into the inner room. As far as my judgment goes deceased was then in a dying state. He died on Thursday, the 4th of June 1874. I asked Francis Smyth, 'Is it your wish that I should sign this?'—shewing him the paper. He turned round and gave me a nod, which I took to be in the affirmative. He did not say anything. Nothing more passed.

"By the Court.—When I went into the room with that paper it was not read over by me or anybody else in the hearing of Francis Smyth. I just held it up. He did not read it himself. I understood he knew the nature of the paper.

"Examination continued.—I then left the room and went into the kitchen, and signed my name in presence of Robert Gallagher and his wife, Patrick Smyth and his wife, Patrick Smyth's aunt, and my own wife. These were all the persons in the kitchen at the time. I then handed the paper to my brother and told him to sign his name. I saw him sign his name immediately after I had done so. When I signed my name to the paper the name 'Francis Smyth' was not upon it, and I did not either then or afterwards hear him acknowledge his signature. I did not see Francis Smyth sign his name to the document."

Robert Gallagher gave similar evidence, with this difference, that he did not go into the room, nor did he see Francis Smyth that night at all.

Patrick Smyth, and his wife and her aunt, all deponed to the fact that Francis Smyth duly signed the deed in their presence after it had been signed by the Gallaghers, but not before the Gallaghers.

The Lord Ordinary, on 22d October 1875, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds in point of fact—(1) that the assignation, No. 7 of process, sought to be reduced, bears to be subscribed by the deceased Francis Smyth, as granter, and to be attested by Bernard Gallagher and Robert Gallagher, as instrumentary witnesses; (2) that the said assignation was subscribed by the said Bernard Gallagher and Robert Gallagher; (3) that it was so subscribed by them outwith the presence of the said Francis Smyth; (4) that at the time of their said subscription the assignation had not been subscribed by the said Francis Smyth, the alleged granter; (5) that the said Bernard and Robert Gallagher did not see the said Francis Smyth subscribe the said assignation; and (6) that the said Francis Smyth did not at the time of the said Bernard and Robert Gallagher subscribing the said assignation, or at any other time, acknowledge his subscription:

tion the defender in any such application resides, to have it declared that such deed, instrument, or writing, was subscribed by such granter or maker, and witnesses."

Finds in point of law that the said assignation is null and void: Therefore repels the defences, and reduces, decerns, and declares in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Finds the defender liable to the pursuer in expenses: Appoints an account," &c.*

Smyth v. Smyth.

* "NOTE.—The pursuer, John Smyth, seeks to reduce and set aside an assignation bearing to be dated 1st June 1874, and to be granted by his deceased brother, Francis Smyth, in favour of Patrick Smyth (the defender), another brother, and to assign to Patrick a debt of £20, alleged to be due by the pursuer to the said Francis Smyth.

"The assignation is ex facie probative. It bears to be signed by Bernard and Robert Gallagher as instrumentary witnesses, and the writer and witnesses are all properly designed. The pursuer, however, alleges that these witnesses neither saw the alleged granter sign the deed, nor heard him acknowledge his subscription. The proof which has been led establishes the facts to be as alleged by the pursuer. It is clearly proved that the deed was prepared by a law-agent on the instructions of the defender, Patrick Smyth; that, at the request of the defender, his brothers-in-law, Bernard and Robert Gallagher, came to his house in Sandyfaulds Street, Glasgow, in which the deceased Francis Smyth then resided with the defender, and that they there signed the assignation as witnesses outwith the presence of the said Francis Smyth; and that the deed had not then been subscribed by Francis Smyth. It is also clearly proved that these persons did not see Francis sign the deed, and that they neither at the time of their so subscribing as witnesses nor at any other time heard him acknowledge his subscription. In this state of facts the assignation, unless it can be aided by the provisions of the recent Conveyancing Act, is plainly null and void under the various earlier statutes relating to the execution and testing of deeds, as these have been interpreted by numerous decisions.—See particularly Young v. Ritchie, 2d February 1761, M. 17,047; Allan v. M'Kean, 21st December 1803, Hume, 914; and Earl of Fife's Trustees v. Duff, 22d December 1825, 4 Sh. 340.

"The defender, however, maintains that the law which had thus been settled has been entirely altered by the 39th section of the recent Conveyancing Act, 1874, quoted supra, p. 573.

"The defender admits that, by the proof which the pursuer has led, the onus of establishing the validity of the deed is shifted from the pursuer to himself; but he maintains that if he can prove that the deed was in point of fact subscribed by the person bearing to be the granter, and by the persons bearing to be the attesting witnesses—whether the subscription of the granter was made or acknowleged in their presence or not—he must prevail under the provisions of the recent Act above quoted. And in the course of the proof he examined himself, his wife, and his wife's aunt, in order to prove that the deceased Francis Smyth did in point of fact sign the deed after the so-called witnesses had signed it; but they failed, and indeed did not attempt to prove, the subscription was either made or acknowledged in the presence of the Gallaghers.

"I am of opinion that the construction which the defender seeks to put upon the Act of 1874 is wholly untenable. I do not think that the Legislature intended to dispense, or have by the statute in question dispensed, with the presence of witnesses as a solemnity at the execution of deeds, or that they have repealed the clause of the Act 1681, c. 5, which declared that none but the subscribing witnesses should be probative of the execution of writs, and, inter alia, of 'assignations.' It is indeed most obvious that unless the persons who bear to attest a deed see the granter subscribe, or hear him acknowledge his subscription, they are not 'witnesses.' Their presence is required to enable them to attest the fact that the granter subscribed the deed, and they cannot legally attest as a fact an act which they did not see the alleged actor perform, or hear him acknowledge. Whatever may have been the intention of the Legislature in enacting the 39th clause of the recent statute, it appears to me to be clear that that enactment has not subverted the former law and practice, which required

Patrick Smyth reclaimed.

Argued for him;—Under the provisions of the 39th section of the Conveyancing Act of 1874,[1] it was sufficient for the party founding on a deed to prove that the signature of the granter was a real signature, and had been actually adhibited to the deed by the granter. That had been proved here. All the signatures to the deed were authentic, and had been appended to it in bona fide. It was true that no one relying on a deed tainted with fraud could take benefit by that deed; but here there was the bona fide real signature, and no attempt at fraud.

Counsel for John Smyth was not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have no doubt as to the correctness of the Lord Ordinary's judgment.

It would be a different matter if the Act of Parliament had allowed proof that the granter of a deed had really signed it. But it has not done so; it has only provided that where there is an informality in the execution of a deed bearing to be attested, the person upholding the same may prove that it was duly signed by the granter and witnesses.

The clause in the Act founded on deals only with deeds bearing to be attested by two witnesses to the signature of the granter. In that case the onus is laid on the party using the deed to prove that it was duly executed. But, clearly, that party must prove that the persons bearing to have signed as witnesses did so sign. Here it has been clearly proved that the pretended witnesses were not witnesses at all; that they witnessed nothing, and could attest nothing.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I concur. It is proved very distinctly that the deed was signed by the granter after the two persons who bear to be witnesses to his signature had subscribed it; and it is also proved that they neither saw him sign nor heard him acknowlege his signature. The Act of Parliament was not intended to validate such a deed. It may be true that the signatures of the parties said to be the witnesses are genuine, but they testified to nothing. In short, they were, in no correct sense, witnesses at all to the execution of the deed.

the subscription of the granter of a deed to be attested by subscribing witnesses, who either saw the granter sign the deed or heard him acknowledge his subscription. And as it is clearly proved that the persons, Bernard and Robert Gallagher, who bear to be attesting witnesses of the execution of the assignation sought to be reduced, were not in point of fact 'witnesses' in any sense of the word to the alleged subscription of the granter, it follows that the assignation must be reduced as null and void."

JAMES SDEUARD, Liquidator of the Western Isles Steam Packet Company (Limited), Petitioner.—Mackintosh—Lang.
ARCHIBALD GARDNER AND SON, Respondents.—R. V. Campbell.

Statute 25 and 26 Vict. c. 89 (Companies Act, 1862), secs. 129 and 51—Voluntary Winding Up—Liquidation—Notice—Special Resolution.—The 129th section of the Companies Act of 1862 enacts that a company may be wound up voluntarily "whenever the company has passed a special resolution requiring the company to be wound up voluntarily." Section 51 enacts that a special resolution can only be passed at a general meeting, of which "notice specifying the intention to propose such resolution" has been given. A notice was given of a meeting of a company "for the purpose of considering the present position of the company, and to consider and resolve whether, under existing circumstances, the company should be wound up, and, if so resolved upon, to decide in what manner this should be done." At the meeting a resolution was carried to wind up the company voluntarily. Held that the notice was sufficient.

Statute 25 and 26 Vict. c. 89 (Companies Act, 1862)—Voluntary Winding Up—Creditors—Powers of the Court to stay Actions, Suits, &c. at instance of Creditors against a Company in Liquidation.—The 138th section of the Companies Act, 1862, enacts that in voluntary windings up the liquidator may apply to the Court "to determine any question arising in the matter of such winding up, or to exercise, as respects the enforcing of calls, or in respect of any other matter, all or any of the powers which the Court might exercise if the company were being wound up by the Court." Held that this section did not give the Court power to stay proceedings by creditors against a company which was being wound up voluntarily.

JAMES SDEUARD, secretary of the Western Isles Steam Packet Company (Limited), on 25th January 1875 sent the following notice to the shareholders of the company:—"An extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders of this company will be held within the company's offices here on Thursday, the 4th day of February proximo, at twelve o'clock noon, for the purpose of considering the present position of the company, and to consider and resolve whether, under existing circumstances, the company should be wound up, and, if so resolved upon, to decide in what manner this should be done."

An extraordinary general meeting was accordingly held on 4th February, at which a resolution was unanimously carried to wind up the company voluntarily under the Acts 1862 and 1867, and Mr Sdeuard was appointed liquidator. A notice of these resolutions was inserted in the "Edinburgh Gazette" of 9th February, and notice of an extraordinary general meeting to be held on 19th February was sent to the shareholders, at which meeting the resolutions were unanimously confirmed.

Mr Sdeuard thereupon entered upon his duties as liquidator, and proceeded to realise the assets of the company.

Messrs Archibald Gardner and Son having obtained a decree in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire against the company, used arrestments on 14th and 18th December 1875 in the hands of debtors of the company. Mr Sdeuard presented a petition, founding on secs. 138 and 163 of the Companies Act, 1862, praying the Court "to declare the said arrestments used by the said respondents to be void to all intents, or to order the said respondents to withdraw the said arrestments, and to desist and cease from using arrestments or any other diligence to the prejudice of the general body of creditors of the company, and to acquiesce in and accept the same dividends as the said general body of creditors."

Messrs Gardner lodged answers to the petition, in which they stated;—"The respondents, looking to the defective terms of the minutes produced, do not admit that the company has validly gone into voluntary liquidation, nor that the petitioner is validly appointed. But apart from this objection, the respondents submit that the Companies Acts afford no authority for interfering with the ordinary diligence of creditors in deference merely to a voluntary liquidation of the company. They contend that interference with actions is only possible when the rights of creditors are protected by a winding up ordered by the Court, or subject to the supervision of the Court."

The petitioner argued;—(1) The notice was perfectly sufficient to shew what was to be proposed. No special form was prescribed by the statute,* and all that was required was sufficient notice to prevent surprise. The notice presented an alternative course,—either voluntary or judicial winding up. (2) The Court had power in the winding up of a company voluntarily under sec. 138 to exercise all or any of the powers which the Court might exercise if the company were being wound up by the Court, and, therefore, had power under sec. 87 to restrain the action or diligence of creditors of the company.[1] †

* Sec. 51 enacts,—"A resolution passed by a company under this Act shall be deemed to be special whenever a resolution has been passed by a majority of not less than three-fourths of such members of the company for the time being entitled, according to the regulations of the company, to vote, as may be present, in person or by proxy (in cases where by the regulations of the company proxies are allowed), at any general meeting of which notice specifying the intention to propose such resolution has been duly given, and such resolution has been confirmed by a majority of such members for the time being entitled, according to the regulations of the company, to vote, as may be present, in person or by proxy, at a subsequent general meeting, of which notice has been duly given, and held at an interval of not less than fourteen days, nor more than one month from the date of the meeting at which such resolution was first passed: At any meeting mentioned in this section, unless a poll is demanded by at least five members, a declaration of the chairman that the resolution has been carried shall be deemed conclusive evidence of the fact, without proof of the number or proportion of the votes recorded in favour of or against the same: Notice of any meeting shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to be duly given and the meeting to be duly held whenever such notice is given and meeting held in manner prescribed by the regulations of the company: In computing the majority under this section, when a poll is demanded, reference shall be had to the number of votes to which each member is entitled by the regulations of the company."

Sec. 87.—"When an order has been made for winding up a company under this Act, no suit, action, or other proceeding shall be proceeded with or commenced against the company except with the leave of the Court, and subject to such terms as the Court may impose."

Sec. 115.—"The Court may, after it has made an order for winding up the company, summon before it any officer of the company or person known or suspected to have in his possession any of the estate or effects of the company, or supposed to be indebted to the company, or any person whom the Court may deem capable of giving information concerning the trade, dealings, estate, or effects of the company; and the Court may require any such officer or person to produce any books, papers, deeds, writings, or other documents in his custody or power relating to the company; and if any person so summoned, after being tendered a reasonable sum for his expenses, refuses to come before the Court at the time appointed, having no lawful impediment (made known to the Court at the time of its sitting, and allowed by it), the Court may cause such person to be apprehended, and brought before the Court for examination; nevertheless, in cases where any person claims any lien on papers, deeds, or writings or documents produced by him, such production shall be without prejudice to such lien, and the Court shall have jurisdiction in the winding up to determine all questions relating to such lien."

Sec. 117.—"The Court may examine upon oath, either by word of mouth or upon written interrogatories, any person appearing or brought before them in manner aforesaid concerning the affairs, dealings, estate or effects of the company, and may reduce into writing the answers of every such person, and require him to subscribe the same."

Sec. 118.—"The Court may, at any time before or after it has made an order for winding up a company, upon proof being given that there is probable cause for believing that any contributory to such company is about to quit the United Kingdom, or otherwise abscond, or to remove or conceal any of his goods or chattels, for the purpose of evading payment of calls, or for avoiding examination in respect of the affairs of the company, cause such contributory to be arrested, and his books, papers, monies, securities for monies, goods, and chattels to be seized, and him and them to be safely kept until such time as the Court may order."

Sec. 121.—"Where an order, interlocutor, or decree has been made in Scotland for winding up a company by the Court, it shall be competent to the Court in Scotland during session, and to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills during vacation, on production by the liquidators of a list certified by them of the names of the contributories liable in payment of any calls which they may wish to enforce, and of the amount due by each contributory respectively, and of the date when the same became due, to pronounce forthwith a decree against such contributories for payment of the sums so certified to be due by each of them respectively, with interest from the said date till payment, at the rate of £5 per centum per annum, in the same way and to the same effect as if they had severally consented to registration for execution, on a charge of six days, of a legal obligation to pay such calls and interest; and such decree may be extracted immediately, and no suspension thereof shall be competent, except on caution or consignation, unless with special leave of the Court or Lord Ordinary."

Sec. 133.—"The following consequences shall ensue upon the voluntary winding up of a company. . . . . (7) The liquidators may, without the sanction of the Court, exercise all powers by this Act given to the official liquidator."

Sec. 138.—"Where a company is being wound up voluntarily the liquidators or any contributory of the company may apply to the Court in England, Ireland, or Scotland, or to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills in Scotland in time of vacation, to determine any question arising in the matter of such winding up, or to exercise, as respects the enforcing of calls, or in respect of any other matter, all or any of the powers which the Court might exercise if the company of a resolution to be proposed that the company should be wound up voluntarily.[1] (2) The English Equity Courts had held that it was competent to stay actions in voluntary windings up, but the common law Courts took a different view, which was the correct view.[2]

LORD PRESIDENT.—The questions before us have arisen in the voluntary winding up of the Western Isles Steam Packet Company (Limited), and they are of considerable importance. But I confess that I do not think that they are attended with much difficulty. This voluntary winding up professes to have been conducted under section 129, sub-section 2, of the Companies Act of 1862, which enacts that a company may be wound up voluntarily "whenever the company has passed a special resolution requiring the company to be wound up voluntarily." It is objected by the respondents that the resolution of the com-were being wound up by the Court; and the Court or Lord Ordinary in the case aforesaid, if satisfied that the determination of such question, or the required exercise of power, will be just and beneficial, may accede, wholly or partially, to such application, on such terms and subject to such conditions as the Court thinks fit, or it may make such other order, interlocutor, or decree on such application as the Court thinks just."

Sec. 148.—"A petition, praying wholly or in part that a voluntary winding up should continue, but subject to the supervision of the Court, and which winding up is hereinafter referred to as a winding up subject to the supervision of the Court, shall, for the purpose of giving jurisdiction to the Court over suits and actions, be deemed to be a petition for winding up the company by the Court."

Sec. 151.—"Where an order is made for a winding up, subject to the supervision of the Court, the liquidators appointed to conduct such winding up may, subject to any restrictions imposed by the Court, exercise all their powers without the sanction or intervention of the Court, in the same manner as if the company were being wound up altogether voluntarily; but, save as aforesaid, any order made by the Court for a winding up subject to the supervision of the Court shall for all purposes, including the staying of actions, suits, and other proceedings, be deemed to be an order of the Court for winding up the company by the Court, and shall confer full authority on the Court to make calls, or to enforce calls made by the liquidators, and to exercise all other powers which it might have exercised if an order had been made for winding up the company altogether by the Court; and in the construction of the provisions whereby the Court is empowered to direct any act or thing to be done to or in favour of the official liquidators, the expression official liquidators shall be deemed to mean the liquidators conducting the winding up subject to the supervision of the Court."

Sec. 163.—"Where any company is being wound up by the Court or subject to the supervision of the Court, any attachment, sequestration, distress, or execution put in force against the estate or effects of the company after the commencement of the winding up shall be void to all intents."

pany is not special, as defined by section 51 of the same Act, and they contend that the company is not therefore validly in liquidation at all, and therefore object to the appointment of the liquidator, and to his title to present the present application. Sec. 51 enacts,—"A resolution passed by a company under this Act shall be deemed to be special whenever a resolution has been passed by a majority of not less than three-fourths of such members of the company for the time being entitled, according to the regulations of the company, to vote, as may be present, in person or by proxy (in cases where by the regulations of the company proxies are allowed), at any general meeting of which notice specifying the intention to propose such resolution has been duly given, and such resolution has been confirmed by a majority of such members for the time being entitled, according to the regulations of the company, to vote, as may be present, in person or by proxy, at a subsequent general meeting, of which notice has been duly given, and held at an interval of not less than fourteen days, nor more than one month from the date of the meeting at which such resolution was first passed." Now, there are several requirements to constitute a special resolution. There must be two meetings, and a notice calling the first meeting must specify an intention to propose a resolution for voluntarily winding up the Company. At the first meeting a resolution must be passed by three-fourths of the members present or voting by proxy. Then there must be an interval of at least fourteen days, and not more than one month, and due notice must be given of the subsequent meeting, and at that meeting the resolution must be confirmed by a majority. I think it has been conceded that all these requirements have been complied with, except as regards the notice calling the first meeting. This notice, which is dated 25th January 1875, is in these terms:—"An extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders of this company will be held within the company's offices here on Thursday, the 4th day of February proximo, at twelve o'clock noon, for the purpose of considering the present position of the company, and to consider and resolve whether, under existing circumstances, the company should be wound up, and, if so resolved upon, to decide in what manner this should be done." No doubt this is not a literal compliance with section 51, because it does not specify an intention to propose a resolution for voluntarily winding up the company. But the question is, whether there is not a substantial compliance with the statute—whether it would not indicate to any one receiving it the intention that a proposal of voluntary winding up was to be considered. I do not think it would detract from the validity of the notice of a resolution if it intimated that some other resolution was also to be proposed. Suppose the notice stated that one member would propose that the company should be wound up voluntarily, and another would propose that it should be wound up under orders of the Court, that would be a perfectly good notice, because there would be a notice of a resolution to wind up voluntarily, and the addition of a notice of another resolution would not detract from it. The question, then, comes to be, whether the notice does not state the same thing in substance. The first question stated is, whether the company is to be wound up. The second question is, in what way this is to be done. Now, I think that there are only two ways of winding up. The one is voluntarily, the other under the orders of the Court. No doubt it may be done voluntarily under supervision of the Court; but that cannot be done unless it be first resolved to wind up voluntarily. At the first meeting the question was between voluntary winding up and winding up under orders of the Court. I think, therefore, that the notice was a good one. No shareholder who read it could doubt what the question to be considered would be, besides the primary question whether there should be a winding up at all. I do not think it was intended that the notice should be strictly construed. If sufficient information be given to satisfy the policy of the statute that is sufficient. I think, therefore, that the objection to the resolution to wind up voluntarily is unfounded. The company is, therefore, in liquidation, and the liquidator has a good title to present the petition.

Whether he has a good title to prevail is another matter, and gives rise to the second question. The petitioner prays the Court to "declare the said arrestments used by the said respondents to be void to all intents, or to order the said respondents to withdraw the said arrestments, and to desist and cease from using arrestments or any other diligence to the prejudice of the general body of creditors of the company, and to acquiesce in and accept the same dividends as the said general body of creditors." Now, this petition is founded on section 138, taken in connection with section 163, of the Act of 1862. Section 138 provides —"Where a company is being wound up voluntarily the liquidators or any contributory of the company may apply to the Court in England, Ireland, or Scotland, or to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills in Scotland in time of vacation, to determine any question arising in the matter of such winding up, or to exercise, as respects the enforcing of calls, or in respect of any other matter, all or any of the powers which the Court might exercise if the company were being wound up by the Court; and the Court or Lord Ordinary in the case aforesaid, if satisfied that the determination of such question, or the required exercise of power, will be just and beneficial, may accede, wholly or partially, to such application, on such terms and subject to such conditions as the Court thinks fit, or it may make such other order, interlocutor, or decree on such application as the Court thinks just." The power of the Court under this section is to determine any question in the matter of such winding up. I do not think that these words cover the case before us, as I do not understand that any question in the winding up has arisen. What has happened is, that a creditor has taken measures to enforce his debt, and is proceeding as if the winding up did not exist. We are asked to interfere in virtue of the words, "to exercise, as respects the enforcing of calls, or in respect of any other matter, all or any of the powers which the Court might exercise if the company were being wound up by the Court." This raises the very important question as to what are the powers contemplated. The 163d section appears to have no application,—"Where any company is being wound up by the Court or subject to the supervision of the Court, any attachment, sequestration, distress, or execution put in force against the estate or effects of the company after the commencement of the winding up shall be void to all intents." That is not a section which gives any power, yet the petitioner asks that under it we shall here exercise a power.

We are referred to other sections which are said to give us the necessary power. Section 85 was referred to. But that refers to a period between the time of presenting a petition for winding up and an order for winding up being pronounced. But there is no corresponding period in voluntary windings up. There is no petition, and no order by the Court. Everything is done by the company itself. Therefore it is impossible to bring this section within the reference in section 138.

We were also referred to section 87,—"When an order has been made for winding up a company under this Act, no suit, action, or other proceeding shall be proceeded with or commenced against the company except with the leave of the Court, and subject to such terms as the Court may impose." But this is not a section which directly confers a power on the Court. It provides that, when an order for winding up has been pronounced by the Court, no creditor shall be allowed to raise an action without the leave of the Court. That may be a good reason for restraining a creditor from doing, without leave, that which he is only entitled to do with leave of the Court, and the power necessary is implied in the section. But the important question is, whether it is one of the powers contemplated by section 138. The words are, "to exercise, as respects the enforcing of calls, or in respect of any other matter, all or any of the powers which the Court might exercise if the company were being wound up by the Court." There is here, it must be observed, a specification of one matter in respect of which the Court may interfere, viz., the enforcement of calls. The true construction of the section is, that the Court is to enforce orders for payment of calls and other orders of the same kind. The enforcement of calls is regulated by section 121. Sections 115, 117, and 118 confer similar powers. All these provisions, one can see very well, are just as useful and applicable to a voluntary winding up as to a winding up by the Court. Therefore the 138th section says that the liquidators may come to the Court and ask to have these powers exercised. I think the reasonable construction is to refer section 138 to a certain class of powers only. If you extend it to give the Court power to restrain the actions and diligence of creditors, the result will be serious. We must look ahead and see what would be the result. The liquidators in a voluntary winding up are placed in this position, that they may, under section 133, sub-section 7, without the sanction of the Court, exercise all the powers given to the official liquidator. The liquidator, without the sanction of the Court, may take any measures against creditors. But the creditors, it is contended, are not to be entitled to take any measures against them. I do not see, if the statute is construed as the petitioner contends, any mode by which the creditor can come to the Court. But he may be brought here by the liquidator. If the prayer of the petition were granted the position of a creditor would be, that the liquidator might do anything he liked against the creditor, whereas the creditor could do nothing against the liquidator or the company. This would be a very anomalous state of matters. Very important questions, requiring judicial intervention, may arise on both sides. That appears to me to be one of the results which would follow if the petitioner's argument were sound. In a judicial winding up the position of the creditors and liquidator is this: The creditors are restrained from doing anything without leave of the Court, but the liquidator may not, without the sanction of the Court, take any measures against the creditors; but in a voluntary winding up the liquidator is to have all the power without the sanction of the Court, while the creditors' hands are to be tied up. The result would be to enable the liquidator to do just what he liked. But any doubt is removed by a reference to two other sections (148 and 151), which, as a matter of construction, afford as strong an argument as could be imagined. They occur in a part of the statute dealing with voluntary winding up under supervision of the Court. The 148th section enacts,—"A petition, praying wholly or in part that a voluntary winding up should continue, but subject to the supervision of the Court, and which winding up is hereinafter referred to as a winding up subject to the supervision of the Court, shall, for the purpose of giving jurisdiction to the Court over suits and actions, be deemed to be a petition for winding up the company by the Court." But for this section we must assume that, in a voluntary winding up under the supervision of the Court, the Court would have no jurisdiction; and, if so multo magis, it can have no jurisdiction in the voluntary winding up. Sec. 151 enacts,—"Where an order is made for a winding up subject to the supervision of the Court the liquidators appointed to conduct such winding up may, subject to any restrictions imposed by the Court, exercise all their powers, without the sanction or intervention of the Court, in the same manner as if the company were being wound up altogether voluntarily; but, save as aforesaid, any order made by the Court for a winding up subject to the supervision of the Court shall for all purposes, including the staying of actions, suits, and other proceedings, be deemed to be an order of the Court for winding up the company by the Court, and shall confer full authority on the Court to make calls, or to enforce calls made by the liquidators, and to exercise all other powers which it might have exercised if an order had been made for winding up the company altogether by the Court; and in the construction of the provisions whereby the Court is empowered to direct any act or thing to be done to or in favour of the official liquidators, the expression official liquidators shall be deemed to mean the liquidators conducting the winding up subject to the supervision of the Court." This section not only repeats what is in section 148 in different words and with a different application, but it says, "the Court are to exercise all other powers which it might have exercised if an order had been made for winding up the company altogether by the Court," shewing that there are powers which the Court may exercise in a winding up under supervision of the Court which they cannot exercise in a voluntary winding up.

No. 95.

Sdeuard v. Gardner.

No. 95.

Sleuard v. Gardner.

I am therefore of opinion, 1st, that there are powers which the Court may exercise in a voluntary winding up under supervision of the Court which they cannot exercise in a voluntary winding up; and 2d, that one of these powers is to stay actions, suits, &c. which is confined to voluntary windings up under supervision of the Court.

I have been anxious to explain the grounds upon which I think we ought to proceed, because I wish to avoid going into the English cases which have been quoted to us on the question whether creditors have anything to do with a voluntary winding up. That is a large and important question, and has never been decided or even raised here until the present petition. It is not necessary for the decision of the present case. Whatever may be the decision of that question the Court has no jurisdiction under section 138 to stay suits or actions in voluntary windings up. I therefore think the petition should be refused.

LORD DEAS.—The objection taken to the notice is that it does not say that the meeting was called for the purpose of passing a special resolution. But no form of notice is prescribed by the statute, and, looking to the definition of a special resolution in section 51, I do not see how the notice could contain such an intimation—(His Lordship here read section 51, quoted supra). Until you have the resolution passed by three-fourths of the members present in person or by proxy at that meeting, and confirmed by a majority of members present at a subsequent meeting, you have not got the elements which constitute a special resolution. But it is impossible to say that the notice given was not such as entitled the meeting to pass the resolution which was carried.

The second objection taken to the notice is that it did not sufficiently specify the motion which was to be proposed. The objection amounts to this, that there could be no good notice unless it specified one thing only as what was proposed to be done. There might thus have required to be three or four meetings—one to consider whether the company should be wound up at all, a second to consider whether it was to be wound up by the Court,—if not, a third to consider whether it was to be wound up voluntarily, and, if that was carried, a fourth to consider whether it was to be so wound up under the supervision of the Court. It was not the meaning of the statute that there should be numerous meetings required. When the notice distinctly presents the alternatives of winding up in one or other of certain specified modes which are sanctioned by the statute that is enough.

No. 95.

Mar. 10, 1876.
Sdeuard v. Gardner.

The next question is, whether we can be called upon to stop the proceedings of this creditor. The result I have come to is that by sections 85 and 148, taken together with section 151, there is a power given to the Court to stay proceedings in judicial windings up, and also in voluntary windings up under the supervision of the Court. But I am of opinion that section 138 does not give the Court jurisdiction to stay proceedings in voluntary windings up. The words are—(reads section 138, quoted supra). In voluntary windings up the creditors are no parties to the proceedings, and it is prima facie improbable that jurisdiction should be given to the Court to stay proceedings which a creditor thinks it right to take for his interest. Accordingly I do not find that power in the words of the statute. If the members or any of the other creditors object to these proceedings their remedy plainly is to apply to the Court for supervision of the voluntary winding up, and they may then obtain a stay of these separate proceedings. That is quite a sufficient remedy. It would, I think, be extravagant to hold that the only power of coming to the Court was left in the hands of the company, and I do not take that view. But, confining myself strictly to the terms of the statute, I do not think we have power to grant the prayer of this petition.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—This is an application by the liquidator in a voluntary winding up to stay the proceeding of a creditor. I think the notice of the meeting to be held on 4th February 1875 is sufficient. No particular terms of notice are directed by the statute, and all the intimation required is given. I have nothing to add to what your Lordship has stated on this point.

The second question, viz., the interposition of this Court to stay the diligence of creditors in a voluntary liquidation is important. I am of opinion that when a company is wound up judicially, or where a winding up, voluntary at its commencement, is placed under judicial supervision, the rights and interests of creditors may be brought within the jurisdiction of the Court.

But a voluntary winding up is just an arrangement by contributories—that is, by the debtors. The creditors are not parties; they cannot apply to the Court for interposition in their favour; nor can the company or the contributories or the liquidator obtain the interposition of the Court against them.

The case of a contributory required to pay calls, and meeting a demand for calls by setting against that demand a claim as a creditor, has occurred in England. I do not think that case is in point, because, as a contributory, he is within the scope of the voluntary liquidation.

But a creditor of the company is outside of the procedure for voluntary liquidation, and the provisions of the 138th section are, I think, limited to "the matter of the winding up," or the exercise of powers in the enforcement of calls, or in the winding up, and within the scope of it. The creditor not being a contributory, not being liable to a demand for calls, not requiring leave to proceed, and not liable to be restrained from proceeding without leave, is, in my view, beyond the scope of the voluntary winding up. In order to obtain the authority of the Court to control his proceeding the winding up must be judicial, or brought under judicial supervision.

No. 95.

Mar. 10, 1876. Sdeuard v. Gardner.

Several decisions in England have been urged on us as authorities.

I agree with your Lordship in your view of the 87th, 148th, and 151st sections, and I agree also that in declining to interfere with this creditor, who is not a shareholder under this voluntary winding up, we are acting on a sound principle, and not running counter to these English decisions.

LORD MURE.—I have very little to add, for I agree with your Lordship in the chair that these notices ought not to be construed too critically; and I think that the notice of 25th January may on fair construction be read as meaning that a resolution to wind up the company voluntarily was to be proposed.

Upon the second point I had at first some difficulty, because of the very broad and general terms of the 138th section of the statute, on which the petition is rested. But, after careful consideration of the other provisions of the statute to which your Lordship has referred, I have come to the conclusion that no power is conferred on the Court by this statute to stay proceedings in the case of a voluntary winding up. The 163d section, upon which the petition is also rested, has plainly no application, and, as regards section 138, I am satisfied that there are other matters, besides that of restraining proceedings at the instance of individual creditors, to which that section may be held to apply. But what I desire to be understood as resting my opinion mainly upon are the provisions of section 148 and section 151, by which special power is given to the Court, in voluntary windings up under supervision of the Court, to exercise such powers as those here in question, viz., the same powers as to staying proceedings as are given where a company is being wound up "altogether by the Court." These provisions would, I conceive, have been unnecessary upon the supposition contended for by the petitioner, and are altogether inconsistent with the notion that by section 138 these same powers had already been conferred upon the Court in all cases of voluntary winding up.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Refuse the petition, and decern: Find the petitioner liable in expenses, and remit," &c.

The proceeds were employed by the clerk in paying a balance due by D P on the Stock Exchange. to their account with the Clydesdale Bank. Ten days afterwards the Clydesdale Bank discovered that the signatures of the drawer and endorser of the cheque were forged, and intimated that they would hold the Royal Bank responsible. Held that, according to the pursuers' averments, the Royal Bank had only acted as the agent of D P, and was not liable.

1st Division. Lord Rutherfurd Clark. R.

THE CLYDESDALE BANKING COMPANY raised this action against the Royal Bank of Scotland and Daniel Paul, stock-broker, Glasgow, and afterwards insisted in it against William Mackinnon, trustee on his sequestrated estate, for payment of £4800.

The pursuers alleged that on 30th November 1875 a crossed bank cheque for £4800 was presented to them at the Clearing House, Glasgow, by the Royal Bank, for which the Royal Bank received credit in their account with the pursuers. The said cheque bore to be drawn upon the Clydesdale Bank by Dixon Brothers, who were customers of the Clydesdale Bank, in favour of Daniel Paul (who was a customer of the Royal Bank) or bearer. The cheque bore to be endorsed by Daniel Paul.

The pursuers further averred;—(Cond. 2) "Previous to its presentment, the said bank cheque or draft had been delivered by the defender, Daniel Paul, or by a clerk or servant for whom he is responsible, at the office in Royal Exchange Square, Glasgow, of the defenders, the Royal Bank, and the person by whom the same was presented received in exchange therefor from the defenders, the Royal Bank, the sum of £4800 therein contained. The words 'Royal Bank of Scotland, Glasgow Clearing House, 30th November 1875,' were impressed on the front or face of said bank cheque or draft previous to the same being presented to the representative of the pursuers in the Glasgow Clearing House. It is believed and averred that the proceeds of the said cheque were, on or about the 30th November last, paid by the defender Paul, or by some one acting on his behalf, to the secretary of the Glasgow Stock Exchange, of which exchange he was at the time a member. The day on which the money was so paid was 'settling day' on the Glasgow Stock Exchange; and on that day there arose a balance against Paul on the statement made up by the exchange officials, which balance, according to the rules of the exchange, it was necessary should be paid before a stated hour on that day. Failing payment Paul would, in accordance with the rules of the exchange, have been declared a defaulter, and expelled. At all events, the proceeds of the said cheque were paid to, or applied on behalf of the defender Paul, and he received the full benefit of the entire amount thereof. The cheque in question being crossed, should not have been paid by the Royal Bank in cash, but should have been put to the credit of the account of Mr Paul, and had this course been followed the fraud would have been detected."

The defender Paul in his answer "denied that it was negotiated or presented by or paid to the defender Paul, or any person having his authority, or was applied for his behoof, or that he received any benefit therefrom. Quoad ultra denied. Explained that the defender Paul never knew or heard of the existence of the document till on or about 10th December 1875, after Alexander Martin, a clerk, who had been in the said defender's employment, and who, as the said defender afterwards discovered, had been engaged in extensive and unprofitable speculations on his own account, had absconded. The defender believes and avers that the contents of the pretended cheque, if paid by the Royal Bank of Scotland, were applied by the said Alexander Martin to his own purposes."

The pursuers further averred that they had subsequently discovered that the signature of the drawers, Dixon and Company, and of the indorser, Paul, were forgeries.

No. 96.

Mar. 11, 1876. Clydesdale Bank v. Royal Bank.

The Royal Bank in their defences stated,—"After passing through the Clearing House the documents are forthwith examined at the offices of the banks respectively, and, if found to be regular and in order, the vouchers are placed to the debit of the proper accounts, and the negotiation as between the delivering and receiving banks is completed. Further, by the usage of bankers, and by the regulations of the Glasgow Clearing House, cheques or drafts, and other documents negotiated as aforesaid, and which are not in order or irregular, must, to preserve recourse, be returned in the course of the day on which they are received to the bank by or through which they were delivered at the Clearing House. The explanation in answer is denied. The defenders had no intimation of the claim now made until 10th December 1875, of which date they received a letter from the pursuers enclosing the said cheque, and stating that the signature of Dixon Brothers had been discovered to be a forgery. Dixon Brothers were customers of the pursuers on and after 30th November 1875. It is now believed and averred that the signature of Dixon Brothers, as drawers of the said cheque, was forged by a clerk (formerly in the employment of the defender Mr Paul), who absconded prior to 10th December 1875. The defenders have been deprived of means of recovering the money, which they would have had but for the pursuers' delay in giving notice of the forgery, and returning the cheque."

The pursuers stated in answer,—"The usage and practice here stated is substantially correct; but it is explained that the regulations of the Glasgow Clearing House, in regard to cheques and other documents, apply only to genuine, and not to forged or fabricated documents."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The said bank cheque or draft having been paid or accounted for, as condescended on, on the faith and understanding that the same was the genuine cheque or draft of the parties by whom it purports to be drawn and endorsed, and the signature of the drawer on said cheque having been discovered not to be genuine, but forged or fabricated, the pursuers are entitled to repayment of the sum contained therein, with interest, as concluded for. (2) Separatim, Assuming the signature of the endorser to be a forgery as alleged, the Royal Bank were guilty of negligence in cashing the cheque, and their defences ought to be repelled.

The defenders, the Royal Bank, pleaded;—(1) The pursuers' averments on record are irrelevant. (2) The pursuers are precluded from maintaining their claim against the Royal Bank by their delay in intimating the alleged forgery; and, separatim, by their failure timeously to return the cheque libelled to the said bank, in accordance with the usage of bankers and the regulations of the Clearing House.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Assoilzies the Royal Bank of Scotland from the conclusions of the libel, and decerns: Finds them entitled to expenses, allows an account, &c.: And, as regards the case between the pursuers and the defender Paul and his trustee, before answer, allows the parties a proof of their respective averments." *

* "NOTE.—In the opinion of the Lord Ordinary no relevant case is stated against the Royal Bank.

"A crossed cheque, purporting to be drawn by Dixon Brothers on the Clydesdale Bank, in favour of Daniel Paul or bearer, was presented to the Royal Bank. It was, as the pursuers allege, so presented by 'Daniel Paul, or by a clerk or servant for whom he is responsible.' The pursuers did not dispute that Paul was a customer of the Royal Bank. The cheque being crossed could not, according to rule, be paid otherwise than through a banker.

"The Royal Bank regarded the cheque as in order, and paid the contents to

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—When money was paid by mistake, and when the consideration wholly failed, the money fell to be repaid. A bank which took a crossed cheque from a customer acted as the agent of their customer, and as the principal would have been responsible the agent could not be in a better position.[1]

Senior counsel were not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a question of some interest and importance, and if I had entertained any doubt of the soundness of the Lord Ordinary's judgment I should have desired to hear farther argument, but the case is, I think, free from difficulty. The cheque bears to be for the sum of £4800, drawn by Dixon Brothers on the Clydesdale Bank in favour of Daniel Paul or bearer. It was crossed "generally," as it is called, which means that "and Co." was written between the two lines, and according to the usage of bankers such a cheque cannot be paid except through a bank. The meaning of that is that the party in whose favour the cheque is drawn must go to his own banker and get him to obtain payment of the contents of the cheque. This law stood upon custom for a long time, but in 1856 it was recognised by statute. It is important to observe the words of the enactment.[2]—"In every case where a the person by whom it was presented. It was thereafter presented for payment to the pursuers, on whom it was drawn. It was paid, and the cash was retained by the Royal Bank.

"The Royal Bank were, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, the mere agents for recovering payment of the cheque. That they paid in anticipation does not, he thinks, affect the position. They took the risk of the cheque being honoured by the pursuers. But when it was honoured, they received the money on account of the person who presented it to them; and having already paid him the money, they are in the same position as if they had first presented the cheque for payment, received the money, and then handed it over to him. There is no allegation that they were not in good faith, or that they were in any way richer by the transaction.

"The question is, on whom the loss shall fall? The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that it cannot fall on the Royal Bank. It was the duty of the pursuers, before they paid the cheque, to satisfy themselves that it was genuine. They accepted it as genuine, and accordingly paid the money. They cannot recover the loss from the person, who, as the Lord Ordinary thinks, was the mere agent for collection.

"It is said that before it was presented to the pursuers the cheque had the name of the Royal Bank impressed on its face. This, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, does no more than charge the bank with the receipt of the money.

"Further, it was admitted that the pursuers did not give notice to the Royal Bank that the cheque was forged till 10th December. The delay in giving notice is, as the Lord Ordinary thinks, sufficient to absolve the Royal Bank.

"It was maintained that a distinction might be taken, inasmuch as the signature of Paul was forged as well as that of Dixon. The Lord Ordinary does not think so. If the Royal Bank had any reason to think that the cheque was irregular the pursuers would have had something to say. But there is no allegation to that effect.

"The cases referred to were Cox, 9 B. and C., 902; and Smith, 1 Marshall, 453, and 6 Taunton, 76.

"As regards the other defender, the Lord Ordinary has before answer allowed a proof."

draft on any banker made payable to bearer, or to order on demand, bears across its face an addition, in written or stamped letters, of the name of any banker, or of the words 'and company,' in full or abbreviated, either of such additions shall have the force of a direction to the bankers upon whom such draft is made that the same is to be paid only to or through some banker, and the same shall be payable only to or through some banker." It does not mean that the banker who is to obtain payment of the cheque is to be in right of the cheque; rather he acts for his own customer. This cheque was paid to Daniel Paul, who was a customer of the Royal Bank. The Royal Bank advanced the amount of the cheque at once. The circumstance of their doing so only shews that whether the Clydesdale Bank had any funds of Dixon Brothers or not the Royal Bank had faith in the solvency of their own customer. Their having advanced money to Paul does not alter their position with regard to the Clydesdale Bank, because when they go to it they go as representatives of their own customer, Paul. They act only as the hand or agent of Paul. The Clydesdale Bank, on the other hand, when the cheque was presented, paid the money on the understanding and belief that this was the genuine signature of Dixon Brothers. It turned out that this was not a genuine signature, and the question is, who is to bear the loss? The Clydesdale Bank, when they paid money on a draft of their own customer, were bound to satisfy themselves that the signature was genuine. The Royal Bank, which presented the cheque, had not necessarily any knowledge of the signature, but the Clydesdale Bank must have known the signature of their own customer. They were in the everyday habit of cashing his cheques. It seems to me that in a question between the two banks the Clydesdale is liable.

We have nothing in the meantime to do with the case between the Clydesdale Bank and Paul, which must be determined according to the facts as they shall appear in the proof.

Lord Deas, being a shareholder of the Royal Bank, declined.

Lord Ardmillan.—I have come to the same conclusion. The Lord Ordinary has put the case well. Of course it is distressing to decide, when the loss must fall upon one or other of two innocent parties; for there has been entire good faith.

The Royal Bank were not bound to know, and could not be expected to ascertain the genuineness of the signature, as the cheque was drawn by persons who were not their customers. The cheque was drawn on the Clydesdale Bank and presented to the Royal Bank, and the Royal Bank merely acted as the medium for cashing it. The signature has turned out to be a forgery, and the question is on whom the loss is to fall. There is no ground for holding that the Royal Bank acted otherwise than in regular course, and in good faith, and they merely were the hands through which the crossed cheque, drawn on the Clydesdale Bank by their customer, found its way to the Clydesdale Bank.

Lord Mure.—I concur. I think the case is ruled by the doctrine in the case of the Caledonian Insurance Company, 21 D. 1197, and 23 D. (H. L.) 3.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Rutherfurd Clark. B.

IN 1830, by disposition and deed of tailzie, the late General Home of Broomhouse conveyed, under the fetters of a strict entail, the estate of Broomhouse to a series of heirs. The lands were conveyed "with and under the condition, as it is hereby expressly provided, that the heirs-male of my body, and the whole other heirs of tailzie above mentioned, shall be obliged constantly to use, bear, and retain the surname of Home, and arms and designation of Home of Broomhouse, and none other, in all time after their succession or attaining possession of the said estate; but with power to the heirs-male of my own body, and the other heirs-male of tailzie above mentioned, to conjoin any other arms therewith, but no other surname; and in case any of my heirs-male of tailzie have already succeeded or shall succeed to another estate, where they shall be obliged by the entail thereof to assume another name and designation than 'Home of Broomhouse,' then and in that case he or they shall forfeit, amit, and lose all right, title, and interest which they can have to my lands and estate, and shall be holden and obliged immediately thereupon to denude themselves of my said lands and estate hereby disponed, and to convey and dispone the same habili modo to the next heir-male called to the succession of the said lands and estate by these presents, unless they choose to relinquish the said other estate and continue 'Home of Broomhouse,' which they are at liberty to do in their option: Excepting always in the cases of titles of honour conferred by the King's Majesty on any of my said heirs-male of tailzie, which they shall be at liberty to use and conjoin with the said name and designation of Home of Broomhouse; and with and under this further condition, that in case any of the heirs-male of my body, or of the other heirs-male of tailzie above mentioned, have already succeeded or shall succeed as heirs to any other heritable estate than the lands and others above disponed, of the annual value of three hundred pounds sterling or upwards, then and so often as the same shall happen, such heir-male of tailzie so succeeding shall forfeit, amit, and lose all right, title, and interest in and to my said lands and estate above described; and the same shall fall, accresce, and devolve to the next heir-male hereby called to the succession thereof, in the same manner as if the heir-male succeeding as aforesaid to such other estate had been naturally dead: Declaring, nevertheless, that this irritancy shall not be incurred, if the heir-male who has already succeeded or so succeeding to another heritable estate, of the value above mentioned, shall renounce and relinquish the same within a year and day after his succession to and possession of the same, jointly with my foresaid lands and estate hereby disponed."

The entailer died in 1850, and was succeeded in the estate of Broomhouse by his nephew, Colonel George Logan of Edrom, who assumed the additional surname of Home, and in accordance with a relaxation in his favour of the provisions of entail contained in a deed of revocation and alteration, held the two estates of Broomhouse and Edrom till his death on 28th June 1870.

Colonel Logan Home possessed Edrom under a disposition and deed of taillie which contained the following condition:—"First, That the said George Logan, my eldest son, and the whole heirs of taillie and heirs whomsoever succeeding to the said lands and barony of Edrom, shall be bound and obliged to use, bear, and constantly retain, in all time after their succession thereto, the surname of Logan, and arms and designation of Logan of Edrom, with power, nevertheless, to conjoin any other surnames, arms, or designations therewith if they shall think fit."

Colonel Logan Home's eldest son, William James Logan Home, succeeded on his father's death to both estates, but not being able to hold both under the entail of Broomhouse, he gave up the name of Logan, and conveyed Edrom to his younger brother, George John Ninian Logan Home, who, in accordance with the entail of Edrom, took the name and designation of Logan of Edrom.

William died on 29th September 1875, and the succession to the estate of Broomhouse opened to his brother George, who adopted the name of Home.

George attained the age of twenty-one years on 30th January 1876, and thereafter he presented a petition for disentail of the estate of Broomhouse. Ferdinand Cospatrick Logan Home, the petitioner's immediately younger brother, and his curator, lodged answers. They stated,—"The petitioner is thus not heir of entail in possession of Broomhouse in the sense of the 2d section of the Act 11 and 12 Vict. cap. 36. He possesses the estate not 'by virtue of' the tailzie, but in violation of it. He has taken no steps to perform the condition under which alone he is entitled to retain Broomhouse, viz., that of relinquishing Edrom in favour of the next heir of entail, as his elder brother relinquished it in the petitioner's favour in similar circumstances. Nor has he, though continuing his possession of Edrom, conveyed Broomhouse to the respondent. An action against the petitioner, raised on 28th January 1876, is at present depending in the Court at the instance of the respondent for the purpose of vindicating his right to the estate of Broomhouse."

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the petition cannot proceed until the petitioner has judicially declared that he elects to take the estate of Broomhouse and to surrender the estate of Edrom." *

* "NOTE.—This petition has been presented with the view of disentailing the estate of Broomhouse. It is not disputed that the petitioner is the heir under the destination. But it is maintained that he has forfeited the estate; or otherwise, that he has no right to disentail it until he declares his election to take it, and surrender the estate of Edrom.

"Accordingly the respondent has raised an action to have it declared that the petitioner has forfeited the estate of Broomhouse; or otherwise, that he is bound to convey Edrom to the respondent. The respondent pleads that the petition should be sisted to await the issue of the declarator.

"The petitioner does not disguise that he intends, if possible, to retain both estates. His purpose is by disentailing to get rid of the condition in the Broomhouse entail, which disables him from holding Edrom along with Broomhouse. He urges that the object of the respondent might be gained if the petition were sisted, and asks that his right to proceed with the disentail shall be decided in the petition itself. It is plain that the petition may be defeated by mere efflux of time, and the Lord Ordinary is not disposed to allow this to happen. He thinks that he is bound to consider at once whether the petitioner is entitled to go on with the proceedings which he has instituted.

"At the date when the succession to Broomhouse opened to him the petitioner was heir of entail in possession of Edrom. By that entail he is bound to bear the surname and arms of Logan of Edrom.

"It is clear from that clause that the petitioner could not, so long as both entails stood, hold both estates. But if he could disentail the estate of Broomhouse he might get rid of the condition, and thus retain the entailed estate of Edrom."

The petitioner reclaimed, and argued;—The possession of the character of heir of entail was enough to entitle him to disentail.[1] In any case the entail allowed him a year to make his election.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I do not think there can be any doubt about the soundness of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor in this case. It is necessary to attend at once to the precise words of the clause and the state of the facts. The petitioner's father, Colonel George Logan, possessed both estates, although under the entail of Broomhouse it is impossible for the heir of entail in possession to hold both the estates of Broomhouse and Edrom, an exception having been made in his favour. Upon his death in June 1870 his elder son William took Broomhouse, but he conveyed Edrom to his younger brother, the present petitioner, who has been in possession of the latter estate since 1873. William died in September 1875, and thereupon the succession to Broomhouse opened to the petitioner, who now proposes to make up a title to that estate and then to disentail it under the second section of the Act 11 and 12 Vict. cap. 36. In this way he wishes to get rid of the fetters of the Broomhouse entail, and to relieve himself of the obligation which lies upon him, upon his succeeding to Broomhouse, either to give up Edrom on the one hand, or to forfeit Broomhouse and remain in possession of Edrom.

The question is whether he is entitled to do this. The obligation in the Broomhouse entail relating to this must be read by itself, and the clause which follows, providing for the event of the heir of Broomhouse succeeding to

"The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the petition cannot be allowed to proceed until the petitioner elects to take the estate of Broomhouse and relinquish the estate of Edrom. The petitioner has not declared his election, and refuses to declare it. The Lord Ordinary put it to the petitioner's counsel whether he had elected to take Broomhouse, and the counsel declined to answer the question. This was quite right, because an answer in the affirmative would involve the petitioner in an obligation to denude of Edrom, which he is anxious to avoid.

"The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the petitioner is entitled to proceed with the disentail of Broomhouse, provided that he declares his election to take that estate and surrender Edrom. But the petitioner maintains that he is not bound to make any declaration one way or another, and that the consequences of his proceeding with the disentail must be made the subject of another action with reference to the estate of Edrom. The Lord Ordinary has not been able to adopt that view.

"It is quite true that an heir can disentail, though liable in a certain event to denude. No better illustration can be given than the case of Preston Bruce. But here there is a material difference. The event has arisen which forces the petitioner to surrender the one estate or the other. He may take the estate of Broomhouse, or he may retain Edrom. He cannot, under the entails, retain both. He is thus put to his election. Before he can deal with Broomhouse, he must, as the Lord Ordinary thinks, declare that he elects to take it, and that in such a manner as to ensure that all the legal consequences of the election shall follow. In the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, he has not forfeited his right to Broomhouse. But he cannot, it is thought, be considered the heir in possession of that estate until his election is declared. It is possible that, on a construction of the clause above quoted, the petitioner may not be put to an immediate election. But until it is made, his rights as heir, except for purposes of mere administration, must remain in abeyance.

"The Lord Ordinary has, for the reasons above stated, thought it right to decide the question rather than sist the petition until the issue of the declarator."

another estate of the annual value of £300, in which case the heir is allowed a year and a day before making his option, has nothing to do with the present matter. It is unquestionably true that the present petitioner has already succeeded to an estate other than Broomhouse, which obliges him to assume another name than that of "Home of Broomhouse," and there cannot be a doubt that he is in the predicament contemplated in the clause of the entail. He has succeeded to Edrom, and entered into possession of it; the succession has now opened to Broomhouse, which compels him to take the name of "Home of Broomhouse" and deprives him of the name of "Logan of Edrom."

The obligation is to the effect that the heir must denude of Broomhouse when the succession opens, and if he does not denude the only other alternative is that he must give up Edrom. It is plain that the option must be exercised immediately, equally in the one case as in the other. The election must take place the moment the succession to Broomhouse opens. That is the conclusion of the whole question. The petitioner is not entitled to make up a title to Broomhouse. The deed of entail excludes him from doing so, unless upon a condition which he will not purify. I think that if the next heir had applied for an interdict to prevent the petitioner making up his title I should not have hesitated to grant it.

While denuding is a thing which does not require to be done in a few days or in an unreasonably short time, it is plain that the petitioner is not entitled to do anything with the estate beyond what is necessary for purposes of administration. He cannot make up a title, and I am therefore clearly of opinion that the Lord Ordinary is right.

LORD DEAS concurred.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—This is a clear case. I cannot say that I entertain any doubt upon it. The latter clause, which has been mentioned, does not touch the point now before us. It does not relate to succession to Edrom, or to an estate held on an entail requiring the adoption of a different name and arms. As your Lordship has explained, it has nothing to do with this question.

Before this petition was presented the petitioner had succeeded to Edrom, another estate, of which it was a condition that the name of the heir in possession should be other than "Home of Broomhouse." In that case he must elect. He must either forfeit Broomhouse, or, taking it, must relinquish Edrom to the next heir of entail.

In that position, the petitioner holding Edrom, also claims Broomhouse, and being in the course of making up a title to Broomhouse, he declines to elect, and occupies the period during which he may elect in proceedings intended and calculated to get rid of the obligation altogether. He is proceeding to make up a title to Broomhouse without surrendering either estate, and without electing,—a proceeding to get rid of the express provisions of the entail, and to defeat the rights of succeeding heirs which I do not think the petitioner is entitled to adopt.

The case of Preston Bruce was different from the present. In that case there was no heir in existence, and no present date of election; and the event contemplated in the entail had not arisen as it has here.

Agent and Client—Ad Valorem Fees.—Held that any person (not prohibited by the Stamp Act of 1870) may charge the same ad valorem and other fees for preparing conveyances as members of any of the incorporated societies of law-agents are entitled to charge.

1st DIVISION. Sheriff of Midlothian and Haddington.

THOMAS AITKEN, who designed himself as "accountant and notary-public, 51 Hanover Street, Edinburgh," raised an action under the Debts Recovery Act in the Sheriff Court of Midlothian against James Kirk, merchant, Edinburgh, concluding for payment of £34, 17s. 3d., being the amount of an account. The account, inter alia, contained entries for several meetings which were not charged, and then was as follows:—

"Nov. 27. Drawing disposition by Mr David Millar Dunlop in favour of Mrs Caroline Neville or Kirk, .	£9	9	0

The defence was that to the extent of these sums the account was "not due."

The Sheriff (Davidson) remitted the account to the Auditor of the Court of Session "to consider, tax, and report." The Auditor reported that on the assumption that the pursuer was entitled to charge for the conveyancing business according to the table of fees of the societies of W.S. and S.S.C., the account was correct.*

* "NOTE.—. . . None of the business charged in the account is of a notarial character; but it is maintained by the pursuer, that, holding a certificate as a notary, he is entitled to perform business of every description except Court business, and to charge therefor in accordance with the table of fees in force for the time regulating the charges of members of the societies of W.S. and S.S.C. The Auditor does not consider it within his province to dispose of this question, which is one of very considerable importance, and he has therefore reserved it for the decision of the Sheriff. The Auditor believes that many persons, even without the qualification of a certificate as notary, act as conveyancers, and charge the conveyancing fees under the table of the societies of W.S. and S.S.C. He is not prepared to hold that persons so acting are entitled to charge the conveyancing fees; and it appears to him questionable how far a notary-public (even though certificated by the Inland Revenue) is entitled to more than a quantum meruit for any business transacted by him other than business of a proper notarial character. If the pursuer's contention be well-

The Sheriff pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer is not entitled to charge for the conveyancing business in the account sued for under the table of fees allowed to Writers to the Signet and Solicitors before the Supreme Courts of Scotland; and with regard to the sum which he ought to receive for the said business, remits again to the Auditor of the Court of Session to tax that part of the account in question, on the footing that the pursuer is only entitled to charge quantum meruit, and report."

The Auditor having reported,* the Sheriff pronounced the following in-founded, the expenses attending the professional education, apprenticeship, and entrance of the members of the societies of W.S. and S.S.C., and other chartered or incorporated bodies of legal practitioners, appear to the Auditor to be very much money thrown away, in so far as the matter of professional emolument is concerned.

"The portion of the account covered by the reservation is the branch headed, 'title in Mrs Kirk's favour to Warrick Villa, and loan thereon,' and the amount is £26, 1s. 3d. It is proper to note that the defender, in settling with the seller of the property, has been allowed deduction from the price of £8, 13s. 6d., being one-half of the items of £9, 9s., £7, 10s., and 8s., and that the sums of £7, 10s. and 8s. are outlays. For the business detailed in the other branches of the account the charges made and sustained do not amount to more than a quantum meruit."

* "When the renewed remit was made, the Auditor requested the pursuer to give him a detailed note of his time and trouble in connection with the deeds mentioned in the account. This the pursuer declined to give, on the ground that, notwithstanding the judgment of the Sheriff as to the principle of charge, he intended to maintain his right to the full ad valorem charges made by conveyancers in Edinburgh. . . . . .

"In the absence of details other than those given in the account, the Auditor cannot form any accurate estimate of the time during which the pursuer was engaged in the business of the defender; and it has been with some difficulty that he has ascertained the length of the deeds not stated in the account. The purchase of the house appears to have been made by the defender himself, and the pursuer was instructed to prepare the conveyance, and accompanied the defender to the office of the investment company to arrange for a loan. The Auditor has no information as to the extent of the progress of titles of the property, or as to the time occupied in their examination. The conveyance was a short one, and its preparation simple. The revisal of the security deeds was also a simple matter. If time alone were to be regarded, the pursuer would, in the opinion of the Auditor, be suitably remunerated by what are known as the regulation fees of the deeds, viz.:—For drawing the conveyance, 28s.; and for revising the other deeds, 20s., 5s., and 26s.—together, £3, 19s. But the element of responsibility is not to be disregarded, and it is in respect of this element that the members of the societies of W.S. and S.S.C., who have tables of fees, state their charges ad valorem. The Auditor does not regard the ad valorem charges in the account as too high to cover the responsibility of an educated and qualified conveyancer. The question remains, and it is stated without any reference to the status of the pursuer—Is every man who undertakes the responsibility of preparing deeds entitled to the same remuneration as the conveyancer who has had a full professional education, and, after examination, has been admitted a member of a body recognised as conveyancers? The pursuer, as a notary-public after examination, and holding a certificate from the Inland Revenue as a notary, is undoubtedly in a more favourable position than a person acting as a conveyancer without any recognised qualification whatever; but it may be held that the pursuer's qualification is a limited one, and confines him to proper notarial business. This, however, is a question for the Sheriff. If he shall be of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to be remunerated as a general conveyancer, not by time merely but by ad valorem fees, then it seems to the Auditor that the terlocutor:—"Finds that, from the branch of the account sued for which relates to the 'title in Mrs Kirk's favour to Warrick Villa, and loan thereon,' and amounting to the sum of £26, 1s. 3d., there falls to be deducted the sum of £7, 13s. 3d., thus leaving as a proper charge under the said branch of the account the sum of £18, 8s.: Therefore decerns against the defender for the sum of £27, 4s.: Finds no expenses due; and decerns."

The pursuer appealed.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—There can be no doubt of the general proposition that there is no set of men who enjoy a monopoly of conveyancing. A person who wishes to make up a title to an estate may employ any man he pleases if he has confidence in his skill. There was no limitation until the statute of 1870, and then, for revenue purposes, the classes of persons who were allowed to practise conveyancing were reduced to certain grades of the legal profession, who were required to take out licences annually It enacts by section 60,—"Every person who not being a sergeant-at-law, barrister, or a duly certificated attorney, solicitor, proctor, notary-public, writer to the signet, agent, procurator, conveyancer, special pleader, or draftsman in equity) either directly or indirectly, for or in expectation of any fee, gain, or reward, draws or prepares any instrument relating to real or personal estate, or any proceedings in law or equity, shall forfeit the sum of fifty pounds." The present pursuer and appellant escaped from the operation of the section because he belonged to a class exempted as notaries-public. It was quite lawful for this gentleman to accept the employment, but if Kirk was not well assured of his skill he acted very foolishly in employing him. Having employed him it is a strong thing for the client to turn round and say, "You are an ignorant man." If a man who is entitled to act as conveyancer is employed and does so act, are we to inquire if he is well educated, and, if not, how are we to inquire into his skilfulness?

It seems to me that this gentleman was just as much entitled to charge ad valorem fees as any practitioner. It is the client's business to see and know that the person he employs is properly skilled.

charges in the account may be allowed as the measure of the quantum meruit. If, on the other hand, the Sheriff shall be of opinion that the qualification is a limited one, the charges already indicated may be regarded as the proper allowance, but with an addition of £3, 6s. 6d., in so far as the conveyance is concerned, seeing that the defender has been relieved of one-half of the fee of £9, 9s. by the seller of the house. The outlays (£7, 10s., 8s., and 12s. 6d.) will, of course, be sustained; and the Auditor is also of opinion that the charges of £2, 2s., for warrant of registration, and 10s. for recording, should be allowed. The preparation of the warrant is not strictly proper notarial business; but the warrant and recording have come in place of the instrument of sasine, and may thus be held as within the province of the notary. If the latter view shall be adopted by the Sheriff, there will fall to be deducted from the fees of the conveyance £4, 14s. 6d., and from the fee for revisal of the disposition to the investment company £2, 18s. 9d., the other charges and outlays being sustained as stated."

Aitken v. Kirk.

LORD DEAS.—I am afraid there is no law to prevent any man from writing a disposition, if employed to do so, and the revenue laws are satisfied. It would be very wholesome if this were otherwise, for deeds unskilfully framed not only lead to expense in litigation, but tend to unsettle and render uncertain the law of heritable rights. If the party may be employed, it necessarily follows that he is entitled to be paid. If he is not a good conveyancer, and the deed is bungled, he will, of course, be liable for the consequences. I know of no way of estimating the rate of payment by the skill and education of the conveyancer.

The Stamp Act of 1870 requires a certificate or licence to be taken out before the writer of the deed can make a charge against his employer. But it is not said that anything of that sort is here wanting. A notary-public pays the same amount of licence as a writer to the signet.

The inexpediency of employing persons who are not properly qualified to write deeds is a matter for the employer. But I have no doubt that the examiners of notaries-public are entitled to ask, and do ask, questions calculated to test the ability to write dispositions. If any blunder occurs in a notarial instrument the notary is responsible, and how he could have sufficient skill to know the accuracy of such an instrument connected with heritable rights, without a knowledge of conveyancing, I do not well see. But that does not enter into the present question. It is enough that the notary has the licence.

The question of remuneration thus comes to be a question of quantum meruit, and on that point we might have required a report from the Auditor. But as he has already reported his opinion that on the footing of quantum meruit the pursuer is entitled to the ad valorem fees, it seems superfluous to require any further report.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I agree with your Lordships. There is only one point on which I have any doubt. A man may at his own risk employ a person not specially qualified. There is no monopoly of conveyancing. Were it not for the Act of 1870, that person might charge for his services. But that Act has the effect of limiting the number of persons who, being so employed, are entitled to charge. The pursuer is among the number of those who can so charge, and he holds a certificate. He is entitled to remuneration on the footing of quantum meruit. But to allow him to charge ad valorem fees is to permit him to adopt as the measure of his charges a table of fees framed by and for a different class of practitioners. It is here that I have a little doubt. I am not sure that a person who is not one of the class to which the table of fees applies is entitled to adopt the table of fees. I observe that a remark is made by the Auditor to the effect that if the pursuer is entitled to be remunerated as a general conveyancer, not by time merely, but by ad valorem fees, then it seems to the Auditor that the charges in the account may be allowed as the measure of quantum meruit. This remark appears to me important; and assuming the correctness of this opinion by the Auditor, it does not matter whether you reach the result by ad valorem fees or by the rule quantum meruit. The only thing I doubt is whether this gentleman can use the table of fees as the rule of his charges, but as the two modes of charging would in this case lead to the same result I think that the Auditor's report gets us out of the difficulty.

SIR GEORGE N. BROKE MIDDLETON, Bart., Appellant—Asher—Mackintosh.
THE LORD ADVOCATE, Respondent.—D.-F. Watson—Rutherfurd.

Property and Income Tax Act, 1842, 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, schedule B—Deer Forest—Assessment.—The lessee of a deer forest is liable to be assessed under schedule B of the Property and Income Tax Act, in respect of occupancy, to the extent of the rent actually paid, and not merely to the extent of the rent which the land would yield if let for pastoral or agricultural purposes.

1ST DIVISION. B.

AT a meeting of the Income Tax Commissioners for the county of Inverness, on the 2d December 1875, Sir George N. B. Middleton, Bart., appealed against the assessment of £4, 15s. (under schedule B of the Act 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, and subsequent Acts), on £1520, made on him as occupier of the deer forest of Invermoriston, &c. for the year ending 5th April 1876.

The following case was stated by the commissioners for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer:—"The appellant pays a rent of £2000 for the furnished house of Invermoriston, with deer forest, including the privilege of shooting deer thereon, and certain grouse shootings and fishings; and the assessor, in fixing the amount at £1520, allowed a deduction of £480 in respect of the houses, with the furniture, and the grouse shootings,—without, however, admitting that grouse shootings are not assessable.

"On behalf of the appellant, it was stated that the house, with furniture, and the grouse shootings, were under-estimated, and the assessor agreed to a further deduction of £320,—thus making the estimated rent of the deer forest, with the privilege of killing deer thereon, £1200.

"The appellant objected to this assessment, in respect that it included the portion of the rent paid by him for the privilege of killing deer within the forest, which portion of the rent, he maintained, was not assessable under schedule B, and claimed to have it reduced to the annual grazing value of the forest. He stated—and this was admitted by the surveyor—that the rent paid for the forest, including the privilege of killing deer thereon, was much above the rent that would be paid for it as a sheep farm. He referred to rule 7, under which the schedule B duty is charged, and rule No. 1, schedule A, of 5 and 6 Vict.,[1] where the properties to be charged are declared to be those 'capable of actual occupation,' and maintained that the forest was capable of actual occupation only in so far as the land was concerned (the mere privilege of shooting deer, for which so much was paid, not being capable of occupation), and that nothing beyond the ordinary value of the land could be charged for profits of occupation, the duty under schedule B being really chargeable in respect of profits only.

[1] The Act of 1842 directs, by section 63, rule 7, schedule B, that duties under schedule B shall be charged upon certain occupants according to the general rule in rule 1, schedule A, sec. 60, which enacts that "the rule shall be construed to extend to all lands, tenements, and hereditaments or heritages capable of actual occupation, of whatever nature and for whatever purpose occupied or enjoyed."

No. 99.

Mar. 16, 1876. Middleton v. Lord Advocate.

"In support of the assessment, the surveyor referred to rule 7, which provided for the schedule B duty being charged in addition to the duty to be charged under schedule A, 'according to the general rule in number 1, schedule (A), before mentioned, on the full amount of the annual value thereof.' That rule extended to all lands, 'for whatever purpose occupied or enjoyed;' and under the Property Tax Acts (and Valuation of Lands Acts, which rule the property tax valuations), the rent, where a bona fide rent is paid, is held to be the annual value.

"The appellant had the exclusive use or occupation of the forest, and the rent paid by him was its agreed-on actual value. He maintained, therefore, that the appellant was chargeable on the rent he actually paid under his lease, without reference to the rent the forest might bring if let as a sheep farm or otherwise.

"The commissioners found that the assessment appealed against was made according to the amount of rent fixed in terms of the lease between the appellant and the trustees of the late James Murray Grant of Glenmoriston, dated 18th June and 2d July 1872, therefore refused the appeal, but, in respect that the assessor consented to allow the sum of £800 as a deduction from the actual rent payable by the appellant to the said trustees, restricted the amount of the assessment to £1200."

Sir G. N. B. Middleton argued;—A deer forest was not included in "lands, tenements, and hereditaments or heritages capable of actual occupation," and, as matter of fact, was not occupied. There was an attempt here to assimilate the position of a tenant of a deer forest to that of an agricultural tenant. The tenant of a forest made no profit out of his tenancy, and it was upon profit that assessment under the Act was made. That constituted the difference between assessment under the Property and Income Tax Act and that under the Poor-Law Act, where a game tenant had been held to be in the occupation of land, and so assessable. The terms and objects of the two Acts were thus different.[1]

Lord President.—My Lords, it appears from the case before us that the appellant, Sir George Broke Middleton, pays a rent of £2000 for the furnished house of Invermoriston, with a deer forest (including the privilege of shooting deer), and certain grouse shootings and fishings; and the assessor, in fixing the assessable amount at £1520, which was his original charge, "allowed a deduction of £480 in respect of the houses, with the furniture and the grouse shooting, without, however, admitting that grouse shootings are not assessable."

The appellant maintained before the Income-Tax Commissioners that the house with the furniture and grouse shootings were under-estimated, and that the deduction should be larger; and it appears that the assessor agreed to a further deduction of £320, thus making the assessable rental £1200.

Now, it is to be taken into consideration in this question, that that rent of £1200 is paid for a deer forest, that is to say, it is a rent paid for the occupation of the ground of which that deer forest consists, and for the exclusive occupation of that ground for the purpose of sport; and the question is, whether the appellant is assessable under schedule B of the Income-tax Act for the forest. Schedule B grants to Her Majesty a duty for "all lands, tenements, and heritages in Scotland, in respect of the occupation thereof, for every 20s. of the annual value thereof the sum of 2½d." You will observe that it is in respect of the occupation of land, &c., in Scotland. In schedule A there is a corresponding sum charged against the owner of the land "in respect of the property thereof, for every 20s. of the annual value thereof the sum of 7d." So that every acre of land in Scotland is made the subject of assessment in this way to the amount of 7d. in the pound for every owner, and to the amount of 2½d. in the pound for every occupier of such subject. The two assessments plainly go together. They are intended to apply, and do apply, to the same subjects, and the tax is payable as assessment upon the annual value.

The way in which these assessments are to be laid on is regulated by the 60th and 63d sections of the statute. The first rule under the 60th section is this—"The annual value of lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages charged under schedule A shall be understood to be the rent by the year at which the same are let at rack-rent, if the amount of such rents shall have been fixed by agreement, commencing within the period of seven years preceding the 5th day of April next before the time of making the assessment; but if the same are not so let (at rack-rent), then at the rack-rent at which the same are worth to be let by the year, which rule shall be construed to extend to all lands, tenements, hereditaments, or heritages capable of actual occupation, of whatever nature, and for whatever purpose occupied or enjoyed, and of whatever value,"—excepting certain subjects which are specified in rules Nos. 2 and 3, which are not applicable to the present case.

The 63d section has this rule, No. 7—"The duties last before mentioned shall be charged in addition to the duties to be charged under schedule A on all the properties in this Act directed to be charged to the said duties, according to the general rule in No. 1, schedule A, before-mentioned, on the full amount of the annual value thereof, estimated as by this Act is directed."

In laying on these duties under this statute the question is to be considered—what is a heritage?—and there can be no doubt that according to the description of the statute the ground in question falls within that description. Then, in the second place, the annual value is to be ascertained by the actual rent, if it is the full rent of the subject. And we have in this case the rent ascertained in quite a satisfactory way. That, the Act says, is to be taken as the annual value; and the owner is to pay on that annual value 7d. in the pound, and the occupier is to pay 2½d. Now, surely all that is very clear and plain, and admits of no difficulty of construction at all. The only question raised here, as I understand it, is, whether this gentleman, Sir George Middleton, is the occupier of a heritable subject within the meaning of the statute. Now, I should have thought that it was too late to question that unless some distinction could be shewn between this statute and the Poor-Law Amendment Act; because the question has been settled under the Poor-Law Amendment Act by the case of Stirling Crawford v. Stewart, and settled upon this precise ground, that the tenant of a shooting is a person in the occupation of land, and is assessable as such. He is assessable as a tenant or occupier under the Poor-Law Amendment Act, and the occupier is a person assessable under this Act also. Therefore, unless some distinction can be pointed out between the one Act and the other, the present case is perfectly hopeless, for Mr Mackintosh, with all his ingenuity, has been unable to point out any distinction, unless it consists in this—that the present Act is intended as a tax upon profits, whether they arise from lands or from trades and professions. And that is quite true; but there is a material distinction between the provisions of the Act as regards profits arising from the one source and as regards profits arising from the other. In the case of profits arising from trades and professions, the Act says that there shall be an estimate made of what the profits are, and we know that it is a very rough and round kind of estimate that can be made in that case. But in the case of lands, the statute requires no such estimate of profits. It fixes the mode in which profits are to be estimated—a statutory mode of proving what the profits are,—and that is by taking the actual annual value of the land, which it defines to be the rent payable, if it be the full rent, or the rack-rent, as the statute calls it, or what the rent would be if it be not let. That is precisely the rule which is to be applied. So that, as far as lands and heritages are concerned, the rule of assessment under this statute, and the rule of assessment under the Poor-Law Act, are identical; and therefore I think the determination of the commissioners is sound.

Lord Deas.—There is, I think, some distinction between poor-law cases and the present case. Poor-rates are payable upon the annual value, taking one year with another, one-half by the landlord and the other half by the tenant. The first thing to be ascertained in such a case is, of course, the annual value of the lands and heritages. That can only be ascertained by taking the rent. When it is required that one-half shall be paid by the landlord and the other half by the tenant there is a division of liability between them upon the annual value—the annual value being what is paid by the tenant. But this was not a tax upon the profit made by the tenant, it was a tax upon the whole annual value of the subject.

In the present case the one-half was not payable by either the landlord or the tenant. There is a larger tax upon the landlord and a smaller one upon the tenant. The question, however, I think, comes to be, notwithstanding this mode of division, whether it is not really a division of the tax between the two of the whole annual value, just as under the Poor-Law Act, with the difference simply that in the one case the assessment is equally divided, while in the other case it is unequally divided. Although there is that difference, the assessment is laid on as in the Poor-Law Act itself, and if that be sound, it is no matter whether the tenant makes profit out of it or not. It is not on the footing of the amount of profit that the liability is laid on, but on the footing that the lands are of a certain annual value, to be divided in certain proportions between the landlord and the tenant. I have come to the same result as your Lordship in the chair.

Lord Ardmillan.—In the case before us I do not think there is any difficulty at all. The tax is partly on the profit of the property, and partly on the income. Schedule A is distinct as to its being a tax on "all lands, tenements, hereditaments, and heritages, in respect of property, for every 20s. of the annual value thereof 7d." Schedule B is in the same terms in regard to the occupation of lands, tenements, hereditaments, and heritages, the amount in that case, however, being only 2½d. in the pound. Then, when you proceed to the more detailed enactments on the subject, you have section 60, where the rules for estimating lands mentioned in schedule A—that is, for the ascertainment of the tax on the property—are laid down. You have it there again put expressly on the ascertainment of the annual value; and under section 63, which gives the detailed enactment for assessing and charging properties under the Act (schedule B) on the occupant, you have again the very same words—the annual value. Whatever the thing be, it is a tax both in regard to the proprietor and in regard to the occupant. Now, if there is in this case a rent accruing to the proprietor of the deer forest, it is the annual value of the property so far as it is paid for the deer forest. The rent is, besides, the annual value of the deer forest to the occupant. Both landlord and tenant are therefore within the enacting words of the statute. The time was when a difficulty was raised, which does not occur here at all, whether game was a fit subject of such enactment or of assessment at all, on the ground that game, or the shooting of game, was a personal privilege or enjoyment. That question has long ago been settled. There is a whole string of cases, and I think the case in which the subject was perhaps most deliberately and satisfactorily dealt with was the case of Menzies v. Menzies. So that, considering the numerous cases we have on that subject, it cannot be doubted that game let is property let. The privilege of shooting game let to a tenant is part of a right of property; unlet game raised a different question, and unlet game must be estimated as of so much annual value. The case of Crawford v. Stewart was of much the same character. The fact that under the poor-law the landlord pays one-half does not raise a different principle; for where the landlord pays on the annual value, and the tenant does the same, you may call it one-half, or the other the other half, which each pays, but it is the annual value still. It is the criterion of the landlord's and of the tenant's liability.

No. 99.

Mar. 16, 1876.
Middleton v. Lord Advocate.

In regard to a deer forest it is obvious that there is this other consideration, that there is no means of ascertaining, except by pure hypothetical conjecture, the rent of the land apart from the deer shooting. In the case of a grouse shooting, there may not be a very great sheep stock upon it, but there is a sheep stock often put upon it; and it is capable of being let for pasture for cattle and sheep, whether it is so or not. But in the case of a deer forest everything else is excluded. In order to make it a deer forest it is made a desert, where "nothing but the antler'd monarch roams." That is the very reason why it is impossible to reach the rent of the land, if it is merely a deer forest, otherwise than by taking the rent as the annual value, and the annual value as the rent.

The only difficulty suggested in dealing with the case is an attempt to say that if it is not done in regard to grouse, why assess in regard to deer? But we have not that before us. There have been distinctions drawn on such matters; and even in this case the assessor has very handsomely—if I may so say—lowered the assessment as far as he could go.

LORD MURE.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair that there is no substantial distinction in principle between this case and that of Crawford v. Stewart which has been referred to. The question was there raised under the Poor-Law Act; and as I understood the arguments of the appellant, the main ground on which it was contended that a different rule should be here applied was that the assessment in question is levied in respect of profits, and that a party holding a lease of a deer-forest makes no profit out of it in the ordinary sense of the expression. But this assessment, although it may be called a duty on profits, is appointed to be laid on upon "annual value" in respect of occupancy as well as property, and that whether the occupant actually makes a profit or not. It is levied in respect of the rent where there is a lease, and where there is no fixed rent in respect of the value which "one year with another" the property may be expected to yield, and although the occupant may in some years make no profit, or even a loss, he still pays, because it is presumed that one year with another he makes a profit. And so here it is, I think, to be presumed that a party who gives a large rent for a deer forest gets some benefit by it; and in this way makes a profit out of the enjoyment of the deer forest, and so comes within the very words of section 60 of the "Property-Tax Act," by which this matter is regulated, by the reference made to it in section 63, and which provides for the tax being levied on all lands "for whatever purpose" they may be "occupied or enjoyed."

Mar. 16, 1876. Middleton v. Lord Advocate.

LORD DEAS.—I should explain that in what I have said about the application of the poor-law case I am quite aware that the division there between the landlord and the tenant is not between individual landlords and individual tenants, but landlords as a class and tenants as a class. But that makes no difference in the principle, or in the result at which I arrive, as the principle I go upon is this—that it is a tax upon the whole of the annual value, and divided between the two in certain proportions. It does not, therefore, matter to the principle what the proportions are, whether one-half or some other proportion.

THOMSON AND COMPANY, Respondents.—Asher—Jameson.

Process—Interdict—Breach of Interdict—Note of Suspension and Interdict—Res Judicata—Patent.—The holder of a patent obtained interdict against a person to prevent infringement, the Court overruling an objection to the validity of the patent. Thereupon the respondent immediately assumed a partner. Another note of suspension and interdict was presented by the holder of the patent against the new firm. Held that the complainer's proper remedy was a complaint for breach of interdict against the respondent in the former process, and not a new note of suspension and interdict.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Rutherfurd Clark. B.

SEE 11 Macph. p. 863, 45 Scot. Jur. p. 528.

Mr Richard Dudgeon, who was the inventor of improvements in apparatus for expanding boiler tubes, obtained a patent for the exclusive using, exercising, and vending it in the United Kingdom. On 30th March 1872 he presented a note of suspension and interdict to prevent William Thomson, engineer in Glasgow, infringing his patent. The Lord Ordinary granted the prayer of his note, and his interlocutor was adhered to by the First Division of the Court. The report of this judgment (11 Macph. p. 863, 45 Scot. Jur. p. 528) fully sets forth the particulars of the patent.

The judgment of the First Division was given against Mr Thomson on 4th July 1873, and on the 30th Mr Thomson entered into an agreement of copartnery with Benjamin Donaldson, clerk in Renfrew, the partnership being for fourteen years. On 24th April 1874 William Thomson obtained letters-patent for a new or improved expander of boiler tubes, which he alleged was entirely different from the patent of Dudgeon.

On 30th November 1875 Richard Dudgeon brought a note of suspension and interdict against "William Thomson and Company" infringing his patent obtained in 1868 for "improvements in apparatus used in expanding boiler tubes." This prayer was identical with the prayer of the note of suspension and interdict against William Thomson presented in 1873. The complainer averred that the respondents were in the course of infringing the patent by making and selling tube expanders of the kind specified, and that these infringements "have been and are being carried on by the said William Thomson, or at least he has been and is actively participating in the said infringements."

The complainer pleaded;—(1) The respondents having infringed the complainer's patent rights, as above condescended on, and having refused to discontinue said infringement, the complainer is entitled to have interdict as craved. (2) The respondents' pleas are excluded exceptione rei judicatæ, in respect that the said pleas were either proponed and repelled or competent and omitted in the process mentioned in the complainer's statement. (3) At all events the judgments pronounced in the said process constitute res judicata against the respondent Thomson, and any firm of which he is a partner, and which makes tools under a title derived from him or with his authority or consent.

The respondents pleaded;—(2) The alleged letters-patent founded on by the complainer are null and void and invalid, in respect, &c. (3) Separatim, the suspension ought to be refused with expenses, in respect the respondents have not infringed the letters-patent founded on by the complainer.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the second and third pleas in law stated for the complainer; and in respect the complainer has intimated his intention of reclaiming against this interlocutor, finds him liable in the expenses since the closing of the record, and remits," &c.*

* "NOTE.—In this case the complainer seeks to have the respondents interdicted from infringing the letters-patent granted to him in 1866. As one of their answers the respondents allege that the letters-patent are invalid by reason of prior public use; but the complainer maintains that they are not entitled to assail the patent on this ground, because of the judgment which he obtained on the 4th of July 1873, whereby William Thomson, one of the partners of the respondents' firm, was interdicted from infringing the pursuer's patent.

"In the record the complainer alleges that William Thomson is the only partner of the firm of Thomson and Company, the respondents, but a contract of co-partnery is produced, which shews that that firm consists of two partners, viz., William Thomson and Benjamin Donaldson. In consequence the complainer did not press his allegation that Thomson was the sole partner of the firm. But he pointed out that the company was formed to carry on the business formerly carried on by Thomson, and to work certain patents which he has obtained.

"The question is, whether the judgment of 1873 can be pleaded against the respondents, so as to exclude them from entering upon the question of prior use. The Lord Ordinary thinks that it cannot. The respondents are not identical with William Thomson, and in particular, the rights of Benjamin Donaldson cannot be identified with his. The complainer has brought a new process against a different party, and the Lord Ordinary conceives that that party cannot be excluded by the previous judgment from stating any relevant defence. The opposite view would result in this,—that any firm, of which Thomson is a partner, would be bound by that judgment.

No. 100.
Mar. 17, 1876.
Dudgeon v. Thomson, &c.

The complainer reclaimed, and argued;—The plea of res judicata should have been sustained. The partnership was a mere device to get rid of the interdict formerly granted.[1] The effect of the Lord Ordinary's judgment would be that any person might get rid of the plea of res judicata by assuming a partner.[2] Identity of persons is not necessary for the plea of res judicata. Identity of interest was enough.[3]

Argued for the respondents;—The partnership was not a device to escape from the former interdict. It was a bona fide partnership. The respondents were in the position of pursuers in trying to shew the invalidity of the complainer's patent, and the plea of "competent and omitted" only applied to defenders. The grounds on which the respondents challenged the complainer's patent were different from those in the former process.[4]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an application for interdict on behalf of Mr Dudgeon, who is owner of a patent for improvements in apparatus used in expanding boiler tubes. The interdict asked against the respondents, Thomson and Company, is against their infringing the patent by "making, vending, or using, in whole or in part, the improvements in apparatus used in expanding boiler tubes, described in the specification filed on 30th August 1866, amended and altered as aforesaid, in pursuance of the proviso contained in the said letters-patent, and in particular from making, vending, or using any apparatus for expanding boiler tubes constructed or used in the manner described in the said specification, amended and altered as aforesaid, or in manner substantially the same, and from infringing the said letters-patent, amended and altered as aforesaid in any other manner of way." Now, it appears that there was a previous proceeding of the same kind directed against one of the partners of William Thomson and Company, and in that process the validity of the patent was called in question by the respondent. But the objection was not given effect to, and interdict was pronounced in the terms I am about to read:—"The Lord Ordinary sustains the reasons of suspension: Suspends, prohibits, interdicts,

"It was contended that the judgment was to be taken as res judicata against the respondents' firm, because they have acquired right to the patents held by Thomson. In the opinion of the Lord Ordinary this circumstance cannot enlarge the rights of the complainer. The judgment would not be binding on a simple assignee of the patents, and it cannot, it is thought, bind the company, merely because they are assignees.

"The complainer may enforce to all legal effect the existing interdict against Thomson. The present judgment does not affect his rights in that respect, but instead of enforcing that interdict he has raised a new process against the firm, which, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, must be dealt with independently of the previous case."

and discharges, in terms of the note of suspension and interdict." Now, your Lordships will not fail to observe that the words of the prayer of the note, which was granted by Lord Mackenzie, and afterwards affirmed by this Division of the Court, are identical with the words of the prayer of the note here.

The allegation of the complainers is this:—"The respondents, who carry on business as engineers in Glasgow, have since 28th May 1875 infringed, and they are at present in course of infringing, the said letters-patent, altered and amended as aforesaid, by making, vending, or using improvements in apparatus used in expanding boiler tubes of the description set forth in the said specification and disclaimer and memorandum of alteration, or of a description substantially the same. The respondents have, within the said period, made and sold, and still are making and selling in Glasgow and elsewhere, tube expanders of the description set forth in the said specification, as altered as aforesaid, or of a description substantially the same. The said infringements of the complainer's said patent have been, and are being, carried on by the said William Thomson, or at least he has been and is actively participating in the said infringements." Then he sets forth in the 12th statement:—"The complainer has repeatedly required the respondents to desist from infringing the complainer's said patent, but they refuse to do so, and the present action has therefore been rendered necessary. In particular the complainer's law-agents, of this date (10th November 1875), intimated to the respondents that they had been instructed by the complainer to call their attention to the respondents' infringement of the complainer's said patent, and to intimate that, failing their receiving from the respondents an undertaking immediately to discontinue the infringement, proceedings would at once be instituted against the respondents to enforce the complainer's rights. Of this date (25th November 1875), after further correspondence, the respondents, through their law-agents, wrote as follows, videlicet,—'In reply to yours of the 23d and 24th, we enclose (1) a cutting from a mechanical journal shewing on the left side a drawing of Mr Dudgeon's expander, and on the right side a drawing of Mr Thomson's expander; and (2) a separate drawing of "Thomson's new expander, patented in 1874." Our clients have made and sold expanders under their patent, conform to these drawings, but no expanders of any other sort, and certainly nothing at all resembling Mr Dudgeon's machine.'" Then in the 13th article he says:—"The drawings referred to in the said last-mentioned letter are herewith produced and referred to. The drawings marked A and B thereon represent machines or implements which are infringements of said patent altered and amended as aforesaid."

The respondents, in answer to this, say that they are not infringing. But they further plead the invalidity of the complainer's patent, and they plead that on different grounds from those stated in the former process. The complainer says that this is res judicata as being "competent and omitted" in the former process. The Lord Ordinary has repelled this plea, and this reclaiming note has been presented against his judgment.

But it appears to me that before considering that plea there is a preliminary question, and that is, whether the complainer has chosen the proper remedy. The complainer alleges that the firm of Thomson and Company is a mere name for William Thomson. But, whether that be so or not, if the allegations of the complainer are true, it is clear that a breach of interdict has been committed by Mr Thomson. Whether Mr Donaldson has been participant in the breach of interdict does not appear. It seems to me that we cannot allow the complainer to proceed unless he shall present a complaint against Thomson for breach of interdict. We ought not to grant a second interdict when the first has been broken. The interdicts of this Court must be obeyed.

The only course is that the present process should be sisted in order to allow the complainer to bring a complaint for breach of interdict.

LORD DEAS concurred.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—There are two questions raised here, but I quite agree that the preliminary question is whether the appropriate remedy has been taken. If Thomson be substantially the offender, if he has broken and is breaking the interdict, the proper proceeding is for breach of interdict. If the interdict is broken the proper remedy is against the breaker. Whether Thomson by taking a partner can get rid of the interdict is another matter. The question of res judicata is a separate matter. I may have formed an opinion on that matter, but I do not express it. All that we ought to do at present is to sist process. That is the proper procedure.

LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sist process to give complainer an opportunity of presenting a petition and complaint for breach of the interdict granted by the interlocutor of Lord Mackenzie, dated 31st January 1873, adhered to by this Division of the Court on 4th July following, reserving all questions of expenses."

C, by discounting B's bills, obtained full payment of B's debt; but in consequence of B and C afterwards becoming bankrupt, the bank with whom the bills had been discounted ranked on C's estate for the full amount of the bills and obtained payment of a dividend. Held that as C's estate had not lost any part of B's debt except the dividend repaid to the bank, his trustee could not claim more under the guarantee, and that A having become bankrupt, C's trustee could be ranked on A's estate for that amount only.

Bankruptcy—Double Ranking—Bill of Exchange.—A accepted bills for accommodation of B, who discounted them at a bank. A and B having become bankrupt the bank ranked on both estates for the full amount of the bills. A's trustee claimed to retain a debt due by him to B's estate as a security for the dividend on the bills paid by him on B's account to the bank on the ground that he was entitled to be reimbursed for his loss by B.

Held that the bank having been already ranked on B's estate for the full amount of the bills, A's trustee could not also be ranked for the same debt, and therefore was not entitled to retain the sums due to B's estate either in security or in satisfaction.

Bankruptcy—Double Ranking—Bill of Exchange—Cautioner.—A cautioner was called on to pay a debt on failure of the principal debtor. In an accounting between the estates of the principal debtor and of the creditor who had both become bankrupt the cautioner maintained that the debtor's estate was entitled to credit for sums lost through accommodation bills discounted for behoof of the creditor. Held that as the discounting banks had already been ranked for the bills on the creditor's estate there could not be a second ranking.

Anderson v. Mackinnon.

1ST DIVISION.

Sheriff of Renfrew.

M.

THE following questions arose in the sequestration of Alexander Crawford, timber merchant, Greenock, who was sequestrated on 14th August 1874. William Mackinnon was appointed trustee on his estate.

(1) On 22d February 1872 Crawford granted to Watson and Campbell, iron merchants, Glasgow, a letter of guarantee, bearing "I hereby undertake liability for and guarantee payment to you of all sums due or to become due to you by Messrs Thomas Shaw and Company, rivet manufacturers, Greenock, upon promissory-notes, bills, drafts, cheques, or other obligations made, granted, accepted, indorsed, or delivered, or hereafter to be made, granted, accepted, indorsed, or delivered by them to you or to any person or persons on your behalf, and also of all sums due or to become due by them to you upon accounts opened or to be opened for goods supplied or to be supplied by you to them." Watson and Campbell were sequestrated on 17th March 1874, and William Anderson was appointed trustee. Shaw and Company were sequestrated on 30th March 1874.

At the date of Watson and Campbell's sequestration there were bills drawn by them, and accepted by Shaw and Co., and indorsed to banks, amounting (less rebate of interest) to £11,025, 8s. 5d. Of these £3,402, 10s. 5d. were accommodation bills not falling under the guarantee, thus leaving £7,622, 18s. The banks ranked for the full amount of the bills on each of the bankrupt estates of Watson and Campbell and Shaw and Co. They were paid a dividend of 4s. 8½d. from Shaw and Co.'s estate. The amount of dividend on Watson and Campbell's estate had not been ascertained, but was expected to be about 2s. in the pound. The trustee on Watson and Campbell's estate claimed to rank on Crawford's estate under the guarantee for £7,622, 18s., less £2619, 2s., the dividend received by the banks from Shaw and Co.'s estate. Crawford's trustee maintained that Watson and Campbell's trustee was only entitled to rank on Crawford's estate for the amount of the dividend which they had paid to the banks on the bills.

(2) On 28th March 1873 the following agreement was entered into between Watson and Campbell and Shaw and Company:—"Thomas Shaw and Company having this day handed up to Watson and Campbell the acceptances of Alexander Crawford, timber merchant, Greenock, to the said Watson and Campbell, for the sum in cumulo of £8000, it is hereby declared and agreed that the proceeds of said acceptances, when discounted by the said Watson and Campbell, are to be applied to the uses and purposes of the said Watson and Campbell and the said Thomas Shaw and Company, in equal proportions, and the bills, when at maturity, are to be renewed upon the said Alexander Crawford granting fresh acceptances to the said Watson and Campbell for that purpose, and the said Watson and Campbell are to supply the said Thomas Shaw and Company with such sums as may be required for their business purposes from time to time, until the total amount so supplied shall amount to the half of the proceeds of said acceptances." Crawford granted acceptances to Watson and Campbell for £8000, and these were discounted and one-half of the proceeds paid to Shaw and Company, and the other half to Watson and Campbell. Crawford's trustee alleged that Crawford got no value for Watson and Campbell's half of these acceptances, but this was denied by Watson and Campbell's trustee. The banks who discounted the bills ranked on the estate of Watson and Campbell for the full amount of the bills. Crawford's trustee paid to the banks a dividend of £666, 13s. 4d. on the bills for £4000 received by Watson and Campbell, and he maintained that he was entitled, as Crawford received no value for his acceptances, to set off that sum against the claims of Watson and Campbell under the guarantee referred to in the first branch of the case. Watson and Campbell's trustee resisted this claim, on the ground that it would be a double ranking for the bills on which he had already paid a dividend to the banks.

(3) Crawford's trustee further maintained that, as £3402, 10s. 5d. of the £11,025, 8s. 5d. bills drawn by Watson and Campbell and accepted by Shaw and Company were for the accommodation of Watson and Company, that, as cautioner under the guarantee of Shaw and Company, he was entitled to see that Shaw and Company were allowed a proper amount of dividend for Shaw and Company's loss on these accommodation bills. Watson and Campbell's trustee having paid a dividend to the banks upon the £3402, 10s. 5d. resisted the claim, on the ground that to allow a dividend to Shaw and Company would be a double ranking for the same debt.

Watson and Campbell's trustee having claimed in Crawford's sequestration in accordance with his contentions mentioned in the preceding narrative, Crawford's trustee pronounced the following deliverance:—"The trustee calls upon the claimant to amend his affidavit in terms of the 51st section of the 'Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856,' to the extent of ranking on the bankrupt estate for the dividends actually paid from the estate of Watson and Campbell, on the amount contained in the bills referred to in his claim and affidavit, under the deductions mentioned therein. The claimant is called, in the event aforesaid, to free and relieve the trustee and the bankrupt estate of the sum of £666, 13s. 4d., being the amount of the dividend declared, and about to be paid, as well as the amount of any dividends hereafter to be declared on the sum of £4000, being one-half of the proceeds of certain acceptances, amounting in all to the sum of £8000, of the bankrupt to Thomas Shaw and Company, coppersmiths, Greenock, for which the bankrupt got no value, and which were granted to Watson and Campbell for their accommodation to the extent aforesaid of £4000, all in terms of an agreement between Watson and Campbell and Thomas Shaw and Company, of date 28th March 1873. He is further called to relieve the trustee and the bankrupt estate of the sum of £3402, 10s. 5d. of the acceptances referred to in the claimant's affidavit, in respect the acceptances were to that extent for the accommodation of Watson and Campbell, and have been paid by the said Thomas Shaw and Company, the parties for whom the bankrupt was cautioner."

Watson and Campbell's trustee appealed to the Sheriff, and pleaded;—(2) Alexander Crawford's obligation being to make good to Watson and Campbell whatever sum Thomas Shaw and Company failed to pay, it is jus tertii to the respondent what dividends Watson and Campbell's estate has paid, or may yet yield, to the indorsees of the bills in question. The appellant claims no more than Alexander Crawford undertook to pay. (3) The appellant having retired or secured the retirement of the bills in question, by allowing the indorsees to rank and draw dividends from Watson and Campbell's estate upon the full amounts thereof, is in titulo to enforce the obligation contained in said undertaking to the extent of his claim; and to confine the appellant's claim to a dividend upon a dividend, as contended for by the respondent, would be to violate the terms of the undertaking, and to relieve Alexander Crawford of his obligation at the expense of Watson and Campbell's creditors, and, inter alia, of the holders of said bills. (4) The respondent being no party to the agreement of 28th March 1873, cannot found upon it, and Watson and Campbell's estate having already been ranked on for the £8000 referred to in the trustee's deliverance, no second claim or double ranking can be made or given in respect of any part of it. (5) Watson and Campbell's estate having already been ranked on for the £3402, 10s. 5d. referred to in the deliverance appealed against, and the appellant having deducted it claiming upon this estate, it cannot be set against the appellant's claim a second time.

Crawford's trustee pleaded;—(2) The appellant being only entitled to rank on the estate of the bankrupt Crawford for the dividends paid, or that may be paid, from the estate of the said Watson and Campbell on the amount contained in the bills referred to in his claim and affidavit, less the deductions mentioned therein, the deliverance of the trustee ought to be sustained, and an amended affidavit lodged, or the appeal dismissed with costs. (3) The appellant, in the event foresaid, being bound to deduct from the amount of his claim the foresaid sum of £666, 13s. 4d., being the dividend paid from the estate of the bankrupt Crawford on the one-half of the foresaid sum of £8000 ranked thereon, and for which the bankrupt got no value, and also any further dividend which may be paid thereon, the deliverance of the trustee ought to be sustained and an amended affidavit lodged, or the appeal dismissed with costs. (4) The appellant in the event foresaid being bound to deduct from the amount of his claim the foresaid sum of £3402, 10s. 5d. of accommodation to Watson and Campbell, or at all events the dividend paid from the estate of Thomas Shaw and Company thereon, the deliverance of the trustee ought to be sustained, and an amended affidavit lodged, or the appeal dismissed with costs.

The Sheriff-substitute (Smith) pronounced an interlocutor finding, inter alia, "that the appellant is entitled to be ranked for the whole balance which was due by Shaw and Company to Watson and Campbell, amounting, as above, to £5003, 16s., and that the respondent has failed to establish his claim to set off the £666, 13s. 4d. paid or allowed as a dividend on the foresaid sum of £4000 against the appellant's ranking: Therefore ranks the appellant for the said sum of £5003, 16s.: Finds the appellant entitled to the expenses of process; allows," &c.*

Crawford's trustee appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for him;—(1) The trustee on Watson and Campbell's estate was only entitled to rank for the amount of dividends which they had paid to the banks on the bills, which was the whole loss which they had suffered by the failure of Shaw and Company. Watson and Campbell having only paid a dividend to the banks could not maintain that they were in right of the bills.

* "NOTE.—The principal question at issue is whether the appellant, as trustee, is entitled to rank under the guarantee for the whole sums due by Shaw and Company, or only for the dividend which the appellant may be able to pay on the bills covered by the guarantee. The Sheriff-substitute fails to see why the creditors of Watson and Campbell should not get the benefit of the undertaking by Crawford to pay all Watson and Campbell's advances to Shaw and Company. If Watson and Campbell had remained solvent, Crawford's trustee must have paid, or rather allowed, a ranking for everything due under the guarantee. Why should Watson and Campbell's insolvency put him in a better position? As regards the claim to set off the £666, 13s. 4d. against the appellant's ranking, the Sheriff-substitute thinks that the respondent has shewn no good reason for it. The bills referred to in the agreement between Watson and Campbell and Shaw and Company, on which the respondent founds, have been ranked already on Watson and Campbell's estate. . . . The sum of £3402, 10s. 5d. has been deducted from the amount of the bills falling under the guarantee, and full credit has been given for the dividend received from the estate of Shaw and Company."

(2) Crawford having granted the acceptances for the accommodation of Watson and Campbell, and having paid a dividend on the bills to the banks, was entitled to retain the sum due under the guarantee in satisfaction or in security of the sums which they had paid.

(3) Crawford's trustee being cautioner for Shaw and Company was entitled to see the accounting properly conducted between them and Watson and Campbell. Watson and Campbell ought to repay Shaw and Company the amount which they had paid to the banks as dividend on the accommodation bills.

Watson and Campbell's trustee argued;—(1) He was entitled to full indemnity under the guarantee. The Sheriff had given too much, but yet Watson and Campbell's estate ought to be ranked for the full amount of the bills to the effect of drawing no more than the dividend which they paid to the bank. The amount the trustee might claim was different from the sum he might receive on a ranking, and all he desired was to be kept free from loss.[1]

(2 and 3) The claim of Crawford's trustee amounted to a demand for double ranking on the same estate for the same debts.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The appellant here is trustee on the sequestrated estate of Alexander Crawford, and the respondent is trustee on the sequestrated estate of Watson and Campbell. Three questions have arisen between them, all of some interest and importance.

1. The first arises on a letter of guarantee granted to Watson and Campbell by Alexander Crawford before his sequestration, by which he undertook liability for and guaranteed "payment to you of all sums due or to become due to you by Messrs Thomas Shaw and Company, rivet manufacturers, Greenock, upon promissory-notes, bills, drafts, cheques, or other obligations made, granted, accepted, indorsed, or delivered, or hereafter to be made, granted, accepted, indorsed, or delivered by them to you or to any person or persons on your behalf, and also of all sums due or to become due by them to you upon accounts opened or to be opened for goods supplied or to be supplied by you to them." At the date of the sequestration of Watson and Campbell, which occurred on 17th March 1874, there were in the hands of various banks a large number of bills with the names of Watson and Campbell and Shaw and Company. Shaw and Company were sequestrated on the 30th of the same month, so that the sequestrations were practically contemporaneous. The total amount of these bills, less rebate of interest, was £11,025, 8s. 5d., but it appears that £3402, 10s. 5d. of these bills, drawn upon and accepted by Watson and Campbell, were accommodation bills, and did not import any debt due by Shaw and Company. Accordingly the trustee on Watson and Campbell's estate deducts that amount from the total amount of the bills, and states the debt due by Shaw and Company at £7622, 18s., for which (under deduction of the dividend paid by Shaw and Company's estate to the bank) he claims to rank on Crawford's estate under the guarantee. The banks holding the bills ranked both on the estate of Watson and Campbell and on the estate of Shaw and Company for the amount of the bills. The dividend payable by Watson and Campbell is not yet ascertained, but if, as is expected, it be 2s. in the pound, the ranking would amount to about £1100, of which between £700 and £800 would effeir to the debt due by Shaw and Company to Watson and Campbell. It is necessary, in order to judge of the claim under the guarantee, to see what Watson and Campbell have lost, and what, consequently, they are entitled to be relieved of out of the estate of Crawford. These bills having been accepted by Shaw and Company for value were discounted by Watson and Campbell and they received the proceeds, and thereby Watson and Campbell obtained payment of the full amount due to them by Shaw and Company. If nothing more had taken place, and the bills had been retired by Shaw and Company, Watson and Campbell's debt would have been fully paid. But both these firms have become bankrupt, and the banks are entitled to rank and have ranked on both estates. Now, to the extent of the dividend to be paid to the banks by Watson and Campbell's estate upon the £7622, 18s. bills, and to that extent only, has that estate been damaged by the failure of Shaw and Company, for whom Crawford granted the cautionary obligation. Watson and Campbell obtained the full benefit of the discounting of the bills, and all that their estate has been made to refund is just the dividend paid to the banks on the amount of the bills, and that is the amount which Crawford was liable for under his guarantee. If he was solvent he would be liable for that amount,—but Crawford has become bankrupt. The consequence is that Watson and Campbell have a bankrupt cautioner instead of a solvent one, and they must be prepared to take a dividend instead of a full payment.

It was maintained that Watson and Campbell's trustee was entitled to rank on Crawford's estate for the full amount of the bills, to the effect of drawing what they have to pay as a dividend to the banks. The full amount of the debt was £7622, 18s., but that has been already paid to Watson and Campbell by the banks, and all that has to be paid back is the dividend. To that extent they are creditors of Crawford. This contention is entirely founded on an attempt to drag in a principle which has here no application, viz., that a creditor may go against several co-obligants for the full amount of his debt to the effect of obtaining full payment. This is not a case of co-obligants, but a simple case of one obligant with a cautioner. The creditor comes against the cautioner. What room can there be for saying that the creditor in the cautionary obligation is to have a preference over all the other creditors of the cautioner? If a creditor in an obligation of guarantee is allowed to rank to the effect of obtaining from the cautioner the full amount of the debt guaranteed after having obtained payment in full from the banks and having only paid them back a dividend, that might be to reimburse him of his whole loss at the expense of the other creditors of the cautioner. I am therefore very clearly of opinion that Watson and Campbell's trustee is only entitled to rank on Crawford's estate for the amount they have paid on the bills.

2. The next question is of an entirely different kind, and arises in this way. Crawford granted certain bills for £8000 for the accommodation of Watson and Campbell and Shaw and Company when all of them were solvent. These bills, in which Crawford was acceptor, were discounted, and Watson and Campbell and Shaw and Company each received £4000. The averment of Crawford's trustee is that Crawford got no value for the proceeds of the bills which were paid to Watson and Campbell. The fact as to value is disputed, but we may assume in the meantime that Crawford got no value. It is clear that if Crawford had been solvent he would have been obliged to pay the amount of the bills to the banks, and would have been entitled to rank on the estate of Watson and Campbell for the full amount. But there are other circumstances which must be taken into account. The banks have claimed dividends on this £4000 from Crawford's estate, from Shaw and Company's estate, and also from Watson and Campbell's estate. Now, the dividend which the banks claim to draw from Crawford's estate is £666, 13s. 4d. What Crawford's trustee maintains is that he is entitled to claim this £666, 13s. 4d. upon Watson and Campbell's estate, and as he is bound under the guarantee to pay a sum of money to Watson and Campbell's estate, he maintains that he may retain that sum as in security or in satisfaction of his claim for £666, 13s. 4d. What he proposes to retain is the dividend to be paid from his estate to Watson and Campbell. Now, if Crawford's trustee had been entitled to rank on Watson and Campbell's estate for the £666, 13s. 4d. I should have been of opinion that he was entitled to retain the sum due under the guarantee. But the right of retention depends on whether there is a debt due for which Crawford is entitled to be ranked on Watson and Campbell's estate. I am of opinion that there is not, on the ground that it would be a double ranking for the same debt. The bills for £4000 have been ranked on the estate of Watson and Campbell by the banks. They have received a dividend, and when a bankrupt estate pays a dividend it pays the debt. The banks are also entitled to rank on Crawford's estate, because his name is on the bills. But a cautioner is not entitled to rank on the bankrupt estate of the principal debtor which has already paid the debt by a dividend. Therefore I am against Crawford's trustee on this point.

No. 101.

Mar. 17, 1876.
Anderson v. Mackinnon.

3. Crawford's trustee maintains that the bankrupt, as cautioner for Shaw and Company, is entitled to see that accounts are properly settled between the estates of Shaw and Company and Watson and Campbell, and that proposition is sound. Now, of the bills which have been ranked on both estates it appears that to the extent of £3402, 10s. 5d. these were for the accommodation of Watson and Campbell. What Crawford's trustee maintains is that in settling accounts this sum of £3402, 10s. 5d. should be placed to the debit of Watson and Campbell, or at all events to the extent to which Shaw and Company's estate has been injured. The banks have ranked on both estates, and drawn a dividend on both. But the bills being for the accommodation of Watson and Campbell it is said that Shaw and Company should be relieved of the loss which they have sustained by having been obliged to pay a dividend on the bills. I do not dispute that Crawford's trustee is entitled to put himself in the place of Shaw. But what he is pleading for is to have a double ranking, the banks having been ranked already both on Shaw and Company's estate, and also on Watson and Campbell's. This is just an attempt to make Shaw and Company rank on Watson and Campbell for a part of the debt for which the banks have already been ranked. I am clear, therefore, that the claim must be disallowed.

While Crawford's trustee, therefore, was right on the first point, he is wrong on both the others.

Lord Deas.—On the first question the Sheriff-substitute says that he "fails to see why the creditors of Watson and Campbell should not get the benefit of the undertaking by Crawford to pay all Watson and Campbell's advances to Shaw and Company. If Watson and Campbell had remained solvent Crawford's trustee must have paid or rather allowed a ranking for everything due under the guarantee. Why should Watson and Campbell's insolvency put him in a better position?" But this involves the whole of the first question. If the bankruptcy of Watson and Campbell does not put Crawford's trustee in a better position, the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute will be correct.

In the case of Melrose v. Black, 29th February 1840, 2 D. 706, and F. C., Mr Melrose held the bills of certain persons pledged to him for the debt of another person, and he claimed to rank on the estate of each of these persons to the effect of obtaining full payment of his debt. The persons who granted the bills were no parties to the arrangement by which the bills were given to Melrose, and they maintained that each of them was entitled to rank on the estate of the person who had pledged these bills to Melrose, and that Melrose was not entitled to rank on that estate after having ranked on the estates of the granters of the bills. The argument turned on the question whether Melrose was in the same position as if he had held a cautionary obligation, in which case the cautioners would be bound to relieve him of the whole loss sustained by the bankruptcy of the principal debtor. Lord Cunninghame, in a note to his interlocutor passing the note of suspension, gave his opinion that Melrose was not entitled so to rank. Lord Jeffrey, also, was of the same opinion, and so decided. When the case came to the Inner-House there was a full discussion at the bar, and the Court seemed to be in favour of the interlocutor. The only opinion fully reported as delivered, at that first advising, is that of Lord Medwyn, and that is only to be found in the Faculty Collection. His Lordship said that he entertained doubts, while Lord Glenlee expressed himself in favour of the interlocutor. The result, however, was that minutes of debate were ordered, which were drawn by me as counsel on one side, and by Lord Curriehill, then Mr Marshall, on the other. By this time I had come upon the case of Fall and Company against Sir William Forbes and Company, 27th May 1790, M. 14,135, which somehow had been lost sight of by the authorities. Even after that, however, there was great difficulty, for when the case came to be advised on the minutes of debate it was delayed till next day. Lord Medwyn then delivered an elaborate opinion against the interlocutor. The Lord Justice-Clerk said that he had been in favour of the interlocutor, but had changed his opinion on reading the minutes of debate; while Lord Meadowbank said,—"I was of the same opinion that your Lordship entertained at first, and even yesterday I came here prepared to adhere to the interlocutor. But after a communication with my brother Lord Medwyn last night I was led again to consider the case, and have now come to be of the same opinion as your Lordship on the grounds he has stated. I am therefore glad that the case was delayed till to-day." The claim of Melrose was sustained.

Melrose, however, was solvent, and was in right of the bills. Here all the parties are bankrupt, and none of them are in right of the bills (which are in the hands of the banks), except to the extent of the dividend paid on the bills. It seems, therefore, plain, that Watson and Campbell's trustee can only rank to the extent of the dividend. It may be a question whether he can rank even for the dividend, but I am clearly of opinion that the case of Melrose does not warrant any further ranking.

On the second question, with regard to the sum of £666, 13s. 4d., for which Crawford's trustee claims to rank on the estate of Watson and Campbell, I agree with your Lordship that this would be a double ranking. That is conclusive against the claim. It is true that in the case of Fall and Company, the judgment of this Court had been,—"The Lords found that Sir William Forbes and Company are entitled to rank for the whole of their debt as it stood at the date of the sequestration, without previously imputing thereto the sums they have received from the bills indorsed to them in security; and found that Sir John Anstruther is entitled to be ranked for the debts due to him by Messrs Fall arising from the bills paid to Sir William Forbes and Company." If that second branch of the case be law, Crawford's trustee would be entitled to rank for the £666, 13s. 4d. But the unsoundness of this second branch of the case of Fall and Company was fully recognised in the case of Melrose. Accordingly, you will find that Lord Medwyn, after observing that he was confirmed in his opinion by the first branch of the case of Sir William Forbes and Company in Fall's bankruptcy, went on to say,—"No doubt it was also held that the surety should rank likewise. On this point the decision has not been followed in subsequent cases, and on this principle, that it was just the same as if the party had put his name as cautioner on a bill. But on the first point the decision has been followed in like cases, especially in that of Robertson." Now, at the discussion in the present case I perfectly recollected and stated that one branch of the case of Fall and Company had been held good, while the other was held bad. The Dean of Faculty thought the case had gone to the House of Lords. About this I was sure there was some mistake, and it turns out that the Dean had in his view a different case of Sir William Forbes and Company altogether, which did go to the House of Lords, but to which I did not at all refer. If the second branch of Fall and Company's case had been law it would have been an authority for Crawford's trustee on the second question we are considering here, but that is certainly not so.

No. 101.

Anderson v. Mackinnon.

With reference to the third question, an account must be made out before we can say which estate is creditor. The date of sequestration is the punctum temporis to be looked to, and nothing which has happened subsequently can be taken into account.

On all the three points I agree in the result arrived at by your Lordship.

Lord Ardmillan.—On the first question raised I have really no doubt. Crawford gave a guarantee to Watson and Campbell that Shaw's debts to them should be paid. He guaranteed no debt except debt due by Shaw to Watson and Campbell. He was not a party to the bills referred to in this part of the case. The only ground of his liability is the guarantee. Watson and Campbell got cash at the bank for the bills granted by Shaw to them. The banks, therefore, became the holders and the creditors on these bills. The drawers and acceptors were liable to the bank. As between themselves, Shaw and Company were liable to Watson and Campbell to the extent to which Watson and Campbell, as drawers, paid the bank what Shaw and Company, as acceptors, should have paid.

To that extent, and no further, were Shaw and Company indebted to Watson and Campbell, and to that extent also, and no further, was the debt of Shaw and Company within the guarantee by Crawford.

The sequestration of Watson and Campbell was on the 17th March, and the sequestration of Shaw and Company was on the 30th March 1874. At both of these dates the banks were the holders and the creditors in the bills, and Watson and Campbell, who had got cash for the bills, were not then the creditors of Shaw and Company. Apart from the payment of the dividend from Watson and Campbell's estate, Shaw and Company were not the debtors of Watson and Campbell on these bill transactions, and there can be no claim on this guarantee beyond the debt due by Shaw and Company to Watson and Campbell.

No. 101.

Anderson v. Mackinnon.

But Crawford's estate was also sequestrated in August 1874; and it is said that that makes a difference. I think it does not.

If Watson and Campbell had remained solvent they could have recovered all the amount of these bills from Crawford under the guarantee. The Sheriff remarks this, and correctly. But, then, Watson and Campbell would have paid the amount of all the bills, and would just have brought the debt within the guarantee, and have recovered what they paid. But here they have paid only the dividend, and what they have paid is, I think, the measure of what they can recover. Then, take another supposition. If Watson and Campbell had been sequestrated, and if Crawford had been solvent, the claim against him would have been only to the extent of the payment made, that is, of the dividend. Beyond that amount Watson and Campbell had not paid, for Shaw was not bound to pay Watson and Campbell, nor can Crawford be further bound on his guarantee than Shaw was under his obligation. Then what is the effect of Crawford's sequestration on the claim of Watson and Campbell?

I think Watson and Campbell, the creditors of Crawford, are entitled to payment so far as Crawford's estate can pay, but they are not preferable creditors. The law places Crawford's creditors on a footing of equality. If Watson and Campbell were entitled to rank on Crawford's estate for a larger sum than Crawford was bound to pay, while the other creditors were ranked only for the sums which he was bound to pay, then that would be a preference, an inequality of ranking, a breach of the principle of equal and equitable division.

On this point I have no difficulty in concurring with your Lordship.

The other two questions, the 2d and 3d, here raised, involve, as I think, one point, but that is a point of much importance not now open, and not to be lightly opened. The banks have ranked and drawn dividends on all these estates. There cannot be double ranking on a sequestrated estate for the same debt. This has, I think, been settled. The authority of Professor Bell (2 Bell's Com. 527, 528) is distinct, and his reasoning in support of the doctrine which he states is, in my opinion, forcible, and I am not aware of any opposing authority. Payment of dividends on a debt is payment of the debt; and there can be no double ranking.

The right of retention by Crawford depends on the right of Crawford to rank on Watson and Campbell's estate. If he had no such right, he cannot retain. I am of opinion that Crawford had no right to rank on Watson and Campbell's estate. The banks holding a bill with several names on it have several parties indebted to them, and on the bankruptcy of these parties the bank can claim on each estate.

But when a bill held by the bank has been ranked as a debt on one estate, there cannot be a second ranking on the same estate in respect of the same debt and the same bill. That would be a double ranking for the same debt on the same estate, which, in my opinion, is not permitted. In a sequestration which contemplates and secures equality of distribution this double ranking is unfair on principle, and is not recognised by any authority.

LORD MURE.—The three questions here raised are of importance, and not free from difficulty. As regards the ranking on Crawford's estate under the letter of guarantee, that question appeared to me at first to be rather complicated. But when examined it resolves, I think, into these, viz., of what sum is the trustee on Watson and Campbell's estate entitled to be relieved in respect of that letter by the trustee on Crawford's estate? and in what way and to what extent is he to be relieved? As regards the sum itself, it appears to me that Watson and Campbell's trustee is entitled to be relieved of, that is, to rank for, whatever sum that estate has had to pay in respect of the bills due to it by Shaw and Company; or, in other words, for whatever loss the estate has sustained through Shaw and Company of the nature specified in the letter. Now, the loss which Watson and Campbell's estate has sustained is just the sum which they have had to pay as a dividend upon the bills in question which were held by the bank; and for that sum they are, I think, entitled to be ranked on Crawford's estate, but only pari passu with his other creditors. For Watson and Campbell are, I conceive, under these proceedings, simply creditors of Crawford for the amount of that sum; and I am not aware of any grounds in law, and there are certainly none in equity, for holding that a creditor under a letter of guarantee of this description is in a more favourable position in the matter of ranking than any other creditor of a bankrupt.

On these grounds I am opinion that the interlocutor appealed from should be altered, in so far as it proposes to rank the trustee upon Watson and Campbell's estate for anything beyond a dividend upon the dividend actually paid to the bank by that estate. But, in other respects, the judgment of the Sheriff is, I think, well founded, and ought to be adhered to, and that substantially upon the same grounds as those which have been explained by your Lordship in the chair.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 17th January 1876: Find that the trustee on the sequestrated estate of Watson and Campbell is entitled to rank on the sequestrated estate of Alexander Crawford for the dividends actually paid from Watson and Campbell's estate on the bills referred to in his claim, and for no more: Find that the trustee on the sequestrated estate of Alexander Crawford is not entitled to retain the dividend payable to the trustee on Watson and Campbell's estate in security or satisfaction of the sum of £666, 13s. 4d. claimed by him, and that he is not entitled to be ranked on Watson and Campbell's estate for the said sum of £666, 13s. 4d., or any part thereof: Find that the trustee on the sequestrated estate of Alexander Crawford is not entitled to require the trustee on Watson and Campbell's sequestrated estate to give any relief to the sequestrated estate of Shaw and Company in respect of the dividend paid from that estate on bills accepted or drawn by Shaw and Company for the accommodation of Watson and Campbell, or to state the amount thereof, or of any dividend paid thereon by Shaw and Company's estate, as an item to the debit of Watson and Campbell in balancing accounts between the two estates: Remit to the trustee in Alexander Crawford's sequestration, being the appellant in this process, to give effect to the above findings, and to rank Watson and Campbell's trustee accordingly: Find the said appellant entitled to expenses in this Court, modified to two-thirds of the taxed amount thereof; allow an account," &c.

JOHN GILRAY (Robertson's Curator), Applicant.—Black. No. 102.

Judicial Factor—Curator Bonis—Powers—Sanction of the Court to a purchase of heritage by a curator bonis.—Circumstances in which the Court approved of a purchase of heritage by the curator bonis of a lunatic made without a previous application to the Court. Mar. 18, 1876. Gilray.

(SEE 10 Macph. 715, 44 Scot. Jur. 392.) 1ST DIVISION. Lord Rutherfurd Clark. B.

On 2d April 1867 John Gilray, coal merchant in Edinburgh, was appointed curator bonis to William Robertson, ironfounder, Oakfield Foundry, who had become a lunatic. In his report to the Accountant of Court, dated 10th December 1875, the curator made the following statement:—

The ward, previous to the time he became insane, carried on the trade of an ironfounder in the foundry. On the curator bonis being appointed, he continued to carry on the business of his ward, rendered it very remunerative, and increased it to a considerable extent.

The ward, at the date of the curator's appointment, was proprietor of one-half of the tenement of land No. 112 Pleasance, Edinburgh, the lower flat as well as the ground to the back of which was used by him as part of the foundry premises.

The Local Authorities, on 30th September 1873, intimated to the ward and his curator, under the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, that a nuisance existed in connection with the premises, and that proceedings under the said Act, to have the said nuisance discontinued or removed, would be immediately taken. This order practically condemned the property as it stood, or at all events occasioned such a thorough repair as to be unprofitable, and indeed impossible without taking down nearly the whole property, and incurring a heavier outlay than has been put out by the curator as aftermentioned, while the return to the ward's estate would have been much less. This tenement was entered by only one common stair, and the other half of the tenement belonged to a Mr Kettle, who had been out of this country for many years. The rents of Mr Kettle's half had been drawn by holders of a bond for £400, granted by him upwards of forty years ago over this and some other property. These parties declined to concur with the curator in making the repairs so ordered, while these could not have been carried out by the curator alone on the half of the property belonging to his ward. To get over the difficulty, however, the holders of the aforesaid bond agreed to expose for sale the half of the property held by them, and this was done, when the curator, in order to conserve the property belonging to his ward, was in a great measure forced to purchase the other half at the price of £260. At the time that this property was so purchased it would have been highly impolitic and injudicious for the curator to have made any application to the Court, as in order to have justified the purchase he would have required then to have shewn the value which he put upon the property, and to have explained his object in making the purchase. To have done so would have resulted in a competition, which would have raised the price of the property far beyond that for which he acquired it. One of the advantages derived by the ward's estate from this purchase is the retention of the ground on which the tenement stood, part of which, and also the lower flat of the house, was used in connection with the foundry; and also the preservation of the usefulness of the back-ground attached to the ward's other property, which would by itself have been too limited to be of much use. The foresaid purchase also gives entire property of an entry common to the two properties, and enables the curator to shut this entry up, and retain it as his own. The ward's half of the property produces a gross rental of £14, but after the foresaid intimation from the authorities, and for a year prior to the purchase of the property, the ward's half had stood empty and uninhabited.

Since the purchase the curator has erected new buildings in connection with the foundry. These will materially increase the business facilities of the foundry, and also increase the value of the property belonging to the ward.

In carrying out these erections the curator bonis incurred the expenses afterwards referred to, videlicet:—

I. The price paid for said subjects, and the expenses of the transfer thereof, was	£263 16 11
II. He has also paid the accounts to tradesmen, amounting to	381 17 3
	£645 14 2

Before erecting the said buildings and incurring the accounts before mentioned, the curator got the sanction of the heir-at-law of the ward to these proceedings, and an undertaking by him that the sum so expended by the curator should be a burden on the heritable property of the ward in the event of the said heir succeeding to the property.

The ward's wife and family also approve of the curator's proceedings, and have written a letter to that effect.

The foundry proper is rented by the curator from year to year, but these premises were insufficient for and could not be used separately as a foundry. In this way the rent is cheap, and the curator is not likely to be put out as tenant. If he were to be so, he might now be able to carry on business in the ward's own property and the property purchased, although he is better with both these and the foundry proper.

The curator bonis would here beg to remind the Accountant that if the foundry business had been abandoned, or in any way materially interfered with, so that no profits had arisen therefrom, the ward's estate would long before this time have been exhausted, or at least greatly reduced, by the expenses of the maintenance of the ward and of the ward's family.

The curator bonis now proposes to borrow £200 over the said subjects, as now altered and improved, to enable him to meet the bills granted for part of these expenses, without interfering unduly with the capital of his ward, or curtailing the said business. If this advance is granted the curator bonis believes that he could pay it off in a few years.

In these circumstances, the curator bonis craved the Accountant "to report these matters to the Lord Ordinary, with the view (first) of having the foresaid purchase by the curator bonis sanctioned and approved of; and (second) of granting warrant and authority to the curator bonis to borrow £200 over the said subjects."

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Remits to Mr William Watherston, builder, Edinburgh, to inspect the subjects mentioned in the said report, and to inquire and report on the condition and value of the same,—(1) as at the date of the factor's purchase thereof, and (2) as the subjects now exist; together with any other facts and circumstances bearing on the question; whether the factor's said purchase and his subsequent expenditure on the said subjects, all mentioned in the report, were necessary or prudent in the interests of the ward and his estate." *

* Mr Watherston reported:—"I.—The tenement, which belonged to two

The Lord Ordinary reported the case.*

Argued for the curator;—The curator had traded with the estate, and proprietors, was in a semi-ruinous condition, and in such a state that the property of William Robertson (the ward) could not be repaired without at the same time repairing the property recently acquired by Mr Robertson's curator bonis.

"The expense of the repairs necessary to put the premises in a proper habitable condition to the satisfaction of the Local Authority would have been such as to deter the curator bonis from executing the repairs, as the return on the outlay from rental would have been quite inadequate. The fair market value of the property and pertinents belonging to the co-proprietor with the ward, as at February 1875, would be £260 sterling to a purchaser other than the ward; but to him or his estate the property and pertinents were of greater value, in consequence of his having acquired by the purchase the exclusive right to three pieces of ground in connection with the property; these are situate on the east, north, and south of the tenement, which would give a feuing area of the value of £25 at the least.

"Considering the whole of these circumstances, I am of opinion that it was really a matter of necessity for the curator to purchase the intervening half of the ruinous tenement, if he meant to conserve the advantages and rights of his ward's property. To have allowed another party to have purchased this half would have materially lessened the value of the rest of the ward's property. I am also satisfied that, as a matter of prudence and policy, the factor acted rightly in purchasing the south half of the ruinous tenement as quietly as he possibly could.

"The area so acquired was of more value to the ward's estate than for feuing, as by its acquisition the foundry business carried on in adjoining premises would be more easily and profitably conducted by the increased area obtained for the manufacture of light and heavy castings.

"Before these operations could be carried on it was necessary to erect walls to enclose the front next the street, and brick or other pillars to carry beams, in order to have the area roofed in and protected from the weather. This has been carried out in a very judicious and inexpensive manner, and the result is a large and well-lighted casting-shop, which would readily command a rent, for such purpose or many other purposes, of about £50 sterling per annum; but it is of more value than this at present, from its connection with the other works of which the ward is lessee.

"The reporter is of opinion that the purchase of the property by the curator bonis, and the subsequent expenditure thereon, has been of great importance to the ward's estate in carrying on the foundry business; and apart from that it leaves a subject of a marketable description, and of greater value than the half of the old tenement belonging to the ward, the cost of the other half tenement acquired by his curator bonis, and the subsequent expenditure of £381, 17s. 3d."

* "NOTE.—The case is so special that, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, it should be dealt with by the Inner-House.

"1. The curator bonis asks judicial sanction for the purchase of heritable property which he made without the authority of the Court. He says, with great force, that if he had asked for authority beforehand he would have raised the price against the estate, but if he chooses to act beyond his powers it may be questionable whether he can obtain the subsequent sanction of the Court.

"2. It is not disguised that the purchase was made, to some extent at least, with the view of enabling the curator bonis to carry on the business of the foundry to better advantage. The business has been successfully managed, and the Court has allowed the curator a commission for his past management, as it was beneficial to the estate. But in giving the opinion of the Court the Lord President (Accountant of Court, 10 Macph. 715) said—'We cannot sanction his carrying on the manufacturing with the funds under his charge, and we must not do what would imply an approval of his doing so.'

"3. But the curator states that the purchase was in truth a matter of necesmade 33 per cent, instead of getting 4 per cent, as he would have done if the money had been invested on heritable security. He had thus been able to support the family of the ward, as well as the ward, which he could not otherwise have done. The Court ought to sanction the purchase.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—The circumstances here are very favourable to the application. The purchase of this property was in a manner forced on the curator in order to prevent the estate of the ward from being destroyed, and he seems to have made a good purchase, and to have turned it to good account. The price of the property was £263, and the sum expended on alterations was £381. It is impossible not to see from the report of Mr Watherston that the money was well spent, and that the property was acquired on the most favourable terms. The purchase was beyond the power of the curator, and if there had not been a good reason for his acting as he did we could not now have sanctioned it. But the explanation he gives is a good one. If he had disclosed the reasons which induced him to make the purchase by coming to the Court he would have raised the price of the property, and might have been altogether prevented from acquiring it.

The only point of difficulty is whether there is any precedent for our sanctioning a proceeding which was taken at the curator's own hand. I do not think that there is. We have authorised the purchase by a curator of a property which was of great advantage to his ward. That was done in the case of Watt. The alveus of the river Tay opposite the ward's land was there offered to the curator by the officers of the Crown, and he was authorised to make the purchase. That being so, it might have been proper to give this curator the power if he had come to us to ask for it. As he has given a good reason for not coming, I am disposed, if your Lordships agree with me, to sanction what he has done.

He also asks authority to borrow £200 in order to pay off what remains of the price, and expenses incurred in the alterations. I think that it follows of necessity from our sanctioning the purchase that he should be allowed to borrow the money, and I am not disposed to raise any difficulty on this point.

LORD DEAS.—It is plain that if the curator had not taken the course he did there would not have been anything for the support of the wife and family, and perhaps not even enough for the ward. If the curator had come to the Court before making the purchase he might have had a difficulty in satisfying us both of the advantage and necessity of making it. But there is no such difficulty now. I think we would outrage common sense if we were to refuse to sanction what he has done, which really was necessary to prevent ruin to the sity in order to preserve the estate. He says that the repairs which had been ordered by the Local Authority to be made on the estate of the ward could not have been executed without at the same time repairing the property which the curator bonis acquired, and that the owners or bondholders of that property refused to concur in executing the repairs which were ordered. The reporter to whom the Lord Ordinary remitted does not go quite so far, but he is satisfied that the purchase was very beneficial to the estate of the ward, and represents it to have been in a certain sense a necessity. He is also of opinion that the sum laid out in repairs has been properly expended."

ward and the family. If there be a rule against sanctioning the purchase of heritable estate for parties under curatory we are not to stretch that rule to the effect of bringing ruin on the parties, whether they be lunatics or not. I remember a case, not long after I came to the bar, of a Mrs Ritchie, a respectable widow, who had a family of daughters, and as curator for them she employed the money belonging to them in the purchase of house property in George Street, which fell largely in value, and she was held bound to take the property to herself, and account for the price paid. If we were to take that course with the curator here he would have reason to be well pleased, for it would be very much to his pecuniary advantage.

THE following case in appeal by William H. Henderson, procurator-fiscal for the county of Linlithgow, against Alexander M'Kenzie, was stated by the Sheriff-substitute (Home) of Linlithgow for the opinion of the Court of Session.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Linlithgow.
R.

"This is a cause brought before the Sheriff Court of Linlithgowshire at the instance of the appellant against the respondent, under 'The Summary Procedure Act, 1864' (27 and 28 Vict. cap. 53). It alleges that the respondent had been guilty of an offence against, or had contravened the provisions of the second section of 'The Dogs Act, 1871,'* (34 and 35 Vict. cap. 56), in so far as 'the said Alexander M'Kenzie had, on or about the 9th day of September 1875, and still has in his possession, within or at or near his dwelling-house or premises at Whitburn aforesaid, a dog of the retriever breed, or of some other breed to the complainer unknown, which is dangerous, and not kept under proper control; and the said dog by itself, or in company or in concert with another dog belonging to the said accused, and which he has since caused to be destroyed or put away, did (first), on or about the said 9th day of September 1875, and in or near a field on the farm of Blaeberryhill, in the parish and county aforesaid, now or lately occupied by David Grieve, farmer there, chase for a considerable time and distance a flock of greyfaced lambs, or other description of sheep, the property or in the lawful possession of Walter Dandie, then and now or lately residing at Blaeberryhill aforesaid, and did severely bite and shake or worry one of said sheep, and injure and terrify the remainder of the flock; and (second) on or about the said 9th day of September 1875, and in or near a field commonly called the 'Townhead' field, situated on the farm of Whitedalehead, in the parish and county aforesaid, and now or lately occupied by Robert Gardner, bank-agent in Whitburn, did chase and pursue for a considerable time and distance a flock of two-year-old sheep, or other description of sheep, the property or in the lawful possession of the said Robert Gardner, did force and compel or otherwise cause the said sheep to leap the wall between said field and the Cleuch Turnpike Road, and did chase or pursue the said sheep along said road into or towards the village of Whitburn, all in said parish and county, whereby one of said sheep was staved or otherwise injured in both or one of its shoulders, and the remainder of the flock were injured or terrified, in consequence whereof, or of part whereof, the said Alexander M'Kenzie is liable to be ordered to keep the said dog under proper control, or to destroy it, and failing his compliance with such order, is liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty shillings for every day during which he fails to comply with such order.'

"The respondent was cited, and accordingly appeared before the Sheriff-substitute at Linlithgow on 19th October 1875, and the complaint having been read over to him, it was pleaded on his behalf that the libel was irrelevant and incompetent, and did not come within the meaning of the Act founded on, in respect the operation of that Act was limited to dogs which were dangerous to human beings, while the libel only alleged that the respondent's dog was dangerous in respect of its having chased, injured, and terrified sheep. The appellant contended that the Act was not so limited, and that it applied to all dogs which in the opinion of the Court of summary jurisdiction were dangerous to human beings, or to animate or inanimate property.

"The Sheriff-substitute sustained the objection to the relevancy, and dismissed the complaint.

"The appellant (and complainer) appealed against said judgment, and applied in writing within three days after such determination to the Sheriff-substitute to state and sign a case in terms of section 3 of 'The Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875,' and the same is hereby stated accordingly.

"The questions of law for the opinion of the Court of Session are—(1) Is the second section of 'The Dogs Act, 1871,' limited in its operation to dogs which are dangerous to human beings, and which are not kept under proper control? (2) If not, is the libel relevant in regard to dogs that are dangerous to sheep?"

Argued for the appellant;—There was nothing in the second or any other section of the Act restricting the operation of the Act to dogs dangerous to human beings. It was sufficient if they were dangerous to property, such as sheep and cattle. The only reported case under the Act was an English one, and from the report it did not appear what was the kind of vice for which the dog was challenged.[1]

Argued for the respondent;—The words "savage and dangerous" in the Act referred to human beings only. The respondent could not know that the dog was dangerous to property.[2]

LORD ORMIDALE.—The questions which the Court has to answer in this case depend for their solution upon the meaning and effect of the Act 34 and 35 Vict., cap. 56, entituled "An Act to provide further protection against dogs."

Founding on this Act the procurator-fiscal for the county of Linlithgow presented a complaint to the Sheriff, setting out that the respondent, Alexander M'Kenzie, had been guilty of an offence, or had contravened the provision of the second section of the Act, in so far as he had, on or about the 9th of September last, and continued to have, in his possession, within or near his dwelling-house or other premises at Whitburn, a dog "which is dangerous and not kept under proper control; and the said dog by itself, or in company or in concert with another dog belonging to the said accused, and which he has since caused to be destroyed or put away, did," on or about said 9th of September, chase for a considerable distance two flocks of sheep, and did severely bite and shake or worry one and injure others of them.

This complaint was objected to by the accused as irrelevant and incompetent, and as not coming within the meaning of the Act founded on, in respect the operation of the Act was limited to dogs which were dangerous to human beings, while the libel only alleged that the respondent's dog was dangerous in respect of its having chased, injured, and terrified sheep.

The Sheriff-substitute sustained this objection, and dismissed the complaint; whereupon the prosecutor appealed in terms of the "Summary Prosecutions Appeals (Scotland) Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict., c. 62), and applied to the Sheriff-substitute to sign and state a case for the opinion of a superior Court. That having been done, and counsel for the parties having been heard, the Court has now to give judgment in answer to the following two questions submitted in the case:—1st, "Is the second section of the Dogs Act, 1871, limited in its operation to dogs which are dangerous to human beings, and which are not kept under proper control?" And 2d, "If not, is the libel relevant in regard to dogs that are dangerous to sheep?"

These questions involve very much the same thing, and in the present instance an answer either affirmative or negative to the first must also dispose of the second. Now, in regard to the limitation of the Act to dogs which are dangerous to human beings there is certainly nothing in it expressly to that effect. Neither am I satisfied, looking at the statute in all its clauses, that any such limitation was intended. The title of the Act is quite general, being simply "An Act to provide further protection against dogs;" and the preamble is in the same terms. The second section, again, of the Act, being that on which the complaint is founded, provides "that any Court of summary jurisdiction may take cognisance of a complaint that a dog is dangerous and not kept under proper control;" and if it appear that such dog is dangerous, the Court may make an order directing the dog to be kept by the owner under proper control, or destroyed, and that, failing compliance, he shall be liable to certain penalties. Now, it is not said here that the dog must be dangerous to human beings, although if that had been meant nothing could have been more simple or easier than to have so expressed the enactment. Nor can I find anything in the other sections of the Act indicative of a limitation of the second section to dogs dangerous to human beings.

But it is only with the second section of the Act we have to deal at present; and considering that it contains no express limitation of its operations to dogs dangerous to human beings, but that in the generality of its words it is fairly, and I think not unreasonably, applicable to dogs dangerous to sheep, and it may be to other property, as well as human beings, I am of opinion that the first question submitted in the case must be answered in the negative; and if so, it necessarily follows that the second question must be answered in the affirmative, as there can be no question or doubt, I think, that the complaint is relevant.

The result, therefore, is that the interlocutor or deliverance of the Sheriff-substitute, sustaining the respondent's objection, must be reversed, and the complaint allowed to proceed with a view to an investigation and disposal of its merits.

LORD GIFFORD concurred.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I felt at first considerable difficulty in this case, for I am not disposed to hold that a dog can be said to be dangerous in the sense of this statute because he is liable to injure property. I am quite clear that "dangerous" does not mean "mischievous." But I have come to agree with your Lordships that this complaint is sufficiently relevant, and that there was no ground for refusing to proceed with the case. The quality of being dangerous relates not to the acts of the dog, but to his nature and disposition. The Sheriff is to be satisfied that he is savage, ferocious, or dangerous. This nature may be shewn and proved in a variety of ways; and although the mere act of chasing sheep may not of itself, or in all cases, indicate that a dog is dangerous, the nature of the animal may be shewn in that way as well as in others. The mistake in the questions put to us, as well as in the judgment, consists in supposing that "dangerous" must be defined in relation to some object. It is not so. It is the savage nature of the animal of which the Sheriff is to be satisfied.

I propose that we should answer the first question in the negative, and with regard to the second question find that the libel is relevant. I do not think that the statement of what the dog did adds to the relevancy. No. 104. Mar. 18, 187 Henderson v. M'Kenzie.

Succession—Vesting.—A testator by holograph will expressed his wish that his whole estate should be liferented by his wife, and that at her death his moveable property should be equally divided between his younger children, "or, if dead, their nearest lawful heirs, share and share alike, and nominated" trustees to carry out his intentions. Held that the younger children's shares vested at the testator's death.

Observations (per the Lord Justice-Clerk) on the canons of construction to be applied to testamentary deeds in questions of vesting.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Curriehill I.

THE deceased Thomas Sproat of Kirkcudbright, by holograph will, dated 15th November 1853, stated,—"I wish my spouse, should she survive me, to have her lifetime of the whole of the house and premises now occupied by me, as well as the interest of all monies that may be due me, or laing in the bank, or lent out on bills or receipts, and that during her natural life; and that, at her death, my said cash, property, and all other effects (with the exception of my dwelling-house, offices, and field of ground, which I wish to be given to my eldest son William, or his heirs lawfully begotten) shall be equally divided between my other children, or, if dead, their nearest lawful heirs, share and share alike, and should their respective shares prove of more value than the house and property to be William's, my wish is that a portion of cash, to make his share equal to the others, be added to his property, so as all my children may receive an equal share in value, and that the bills for lent cash to William and John be counted as part of their respective shares, or paid up to their mother, as she has a life interest in the whole of my effects; and as my son David has been assisting me in my trade these many years, is very likely to carry it on after my decease, and to take up my vessels at a valuation, and seeing that he has had no fixed salary, and received nothing from me except his bed and board and clothing, and the sloop 'Friends,' already in his name, but the profits of her has been regularly received by me, my wish is that he should have £200 sterling, as well as the sloop 'Friends,' over and above his equal share of my effects, with his brothers and sister. The above is the substance of my will and testament, and to see the above testament put into effect I do hereby appoint the Rev. John M'Millan of the Free Church, and Mr Thomas Whitewright, druggist of this town, my executors and trustees for carrying out my wishes as stated above."

Thomas Sproat died in July 1854, and was survived by his widow and four sons and a daughter. One of his sons, John, mentioned in the foregoing excerpt from his will, died on 28th September 1865, and his estates were sequestrated on 3d April 1866. Mrs Sproat, the testator's widow, liferented the estate till 3d November 1874, when she died. John Sproat's trustee, with the concurrence of a creditor to whom John's interest in his father's estate had been assigned by the trustee and commissioner, thereupon raised this action against Thomas Sproat's trustees for payment of the share of Thomas Sproat's succession effeiring to John.

They pleaded that the provisions in favour of John Sproat vested at the testator's death.

The trustees pleaded that no right had vested in John Sproat, he having predeceased the liferentrix.

On 15th November 1875 the Lord Ordinary held that the provisions in favour of the younger children vested at the testator's death.*

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The period of vesting intended by the testator was at the death of the liferentrix. That view was strengthened by the use of the words "if dead," which meant dead at the date of the expiry of the liferent. That alone was conclusive against vesting a morte testatoris. There was here no direct gift to the children as in the cases where vesting a morte had been sustained.[1]

Argued for the pursuers;—A bequest to A in liferent, and after her death to B and his heirs in fee, did not suspend vesting.[2]

* "NOTE.—. . . . The defenders, who are the executors and testamentary trustees of Thomas Sproat, maintained in opposition to the pursuers, the trustee on John Sproat's sequestrated estate and his assignee, that the shares of Thomas Sproat's estate provided to the children did not vest in any of them at the death of the testator, or until the death of the liferentrix. I am opinion that the defenders' construction of the settlement of Thomas Sproat is not the sound one, and that the shares of the children vested at the death of the testator, and that only the payment was postponed until the death of the liferentrix. The settlement was executed by the father, and purports to deal with his whole estate, and to divide the same equally among all his children, subject to the liferent of their mother, and without any destination to survivors or any ulterior destination except to the 'lawful heirs' of the children themselves. I think that there is here no reason for holding that the vesting was suspended until the period of distribution, or that the payment was postponed for any other purpose than to secure the widow's liferent. The cases of Marchbanks, 14 Sh. 521, and Cochrane, 17 D. 103, particularly the latter, appear to me to resemble the present in all essential particulars, and in both the interposition of a liferent was, in the absence of a survivorship clause or destination over, held insufficient to suspend vesting.

"Various other considerations strengthen the view which I have taken of the meaning of the present settlement, and in particular the declarations—(1) That the bills for lent cash to William and John, two of the sons, should be counted as part of their respective shares; and (2) That David, another son, should receive (obviously at the testator's death) a payment of £200, and possession of the sloop 'Friends' 'over and above the equal share of my effects with his brothers and sister,' all tending to shew that the testator regarded the liferent of the mother as merely a burden upon his children's shares, and not as postponing the vesting of their interest until her death. In short, the 'lawful heirs' of the children, 'if dead,' were merely conditional institutes appointed to take in the event of the children themselves predeceasing their father, the testator."

Mar. 18, 1876. Jackson, &c. v. M'Millan, &c.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of opinion that the provisions contained in this settlement to the younger children of the testator vested from his death. The instrument which we have to construe is an informal document, in which the testator says that he "notes down and subscribes the following particulars as to my affairs after my death." He first provides to his wife, should she survive him, the liferent of the whole of the house and premises occupied by him, and the interest of all money that may be due to him, or lying in the bank, or lent out on bills, and then he directs that at her "death my said cash, property, and all other effects (with the exception of my dwelling-house, offices, and field of ground, which I wish to be given to my eldest son William or his heirs lawfully begotten) shall be equally divided between my other children, or, if dead, their nearest lawful heirs, share and share alike." The question is, whether the share of one of the children, John Sproat, who survived the testator and predeceased the liferentrix, vested in him, and passed to the trustee on his sequestrated estate. I entertain no doubt that it did, and that the postponement of payment until the death of the widow had no effect in postponing the vesting of the share.

I do not intend to go over authorities which have been so frequently analysed, but to say a few words on the practical tests to be applied in such cases. The object is to ascertain what the testator meant from what he has said; and any general rules are not technical, but merely canons to be applied as the words may seem to require.

In mortis causa settlements, legacies and provisions are presumed to take effect and vest from the testator's death; and in the case of provisions to the testator's immediate children this presumption is unusually strong. The postponement of the term of payment has of itself no effect in overturning this presumption. In every executry estate some time must elapse before the funds of the deceased can be realised, and sometimes, from the nature of the investments, the interval may be considerable. But this does not prevent vesting from taking immediate effect. A postponed term of payment only affects vesting when it is adjected as a condition of the gift itself, and is not merely a burden on or qualification of the right. Thus when a testator postpones payment of the fee, in order to provide for a temporary and intermediate interest in the income or produce of the estate, such as a liferent or an annuity, vesting takes place notwithstanding a morte testatoris, because the interposed interest is only a burden on the gift. The legacy is unconditional, although the enjoyment of it is qualified. The legacy vests, but only under the qualification that the legatee shall not be entitled to demand payment until the specified time arrive. The other class of cases, which is entirely distinct, includes those in which survivance of the term of payment is a condition of the legacy itself, and in which there is no legacy, unless the condition be fulfilled. In these cases, survivance of the term of payment is of the essence of the gift. In order therefore to determine in any given case whether survivance of such a term be a condition of the gift or the postponement be only a burden on it, it is of the last importance to ascertain what is the primary object of the testator in postponing payment, and if the words indicate that the primary object was to secure an interposed interest, especially if they disclose no other, the presumption is strong that the legacy is not conditional, and that its enjoyment only is qualified.

It is this consideration which gives importance to any ulterior destination which may be adjected to the gift, for if there be any separate and independent interest contingently favoured it will then be easier to presume that favour to that interest was in part at least the reason for postponing payment. But to have this effect the interest must be substantially separate, and such as to indicate specific favour on the part of the testator. But a legacy to A and his heirs, or A and his children, is not the separate institution of a new and independent object of the testator's bounty, but the expression of a derivative interest favoured by the testator only out of regard to the legatee whose children or heirs are mentioned. They only find a place in the destination through the relation which they bear to the persona prædilecta; and in cases like the present, in which the gift is only inferred from the direction to divide, the instruction to the trustees to pay to the heirs of the legatee, if he predecease the period of division, may be regarded more as the natural result of the legacy having vested than as an indication of the reverse.

There may of course be words used by the testator in fixing a postponed period of division which, without any destination over, indicate a postponement of vesting also; as, for instance, considerations personal to the legatee himself, or relative to the property bequeathed. But in the present case no such elements occur. The sole object for the postponement of the term of payment which is disclosed in this writing is the protection of the widow's liferent. The case of Marchbanks, referred to by the Lord Ordinary, is precisely in point.

I should have held therefore from the words I have read that this provision vested in John Sproat. It is true that there are no words of gift or bequest apart from the direction to divide. But in an informal memorandum of the testator's testamentary wishes such as the present I consider this element as of no consequence.

The rest of the document entirely confirms this view. There follows a provision in regard to certain bills for lent cash due by William and John, as to which he provides that they "be counted as part of their respective shares or paid up to their mother, as she has a life interest in the whole of my effects." The plain meaning of this is that the share devolving on the two sons shall at once be imputed in extinction of these bills, but that if their mother survives the testator the sons shall account to her for the interest during her life. I think it is plain that it was not intended that William and John should pay up the principal to the executors and trustees, who are afterwards named.

The provision in regard to his son David, which immediately follows, leads to the same inference. He is to be entitled to the sloop "Friends," which stood in his name, and that plainly from the death of the testator, as the executors manifestly were given no concern with it. The sum of £200 he is to have over and above his share of the residue as in lieu of wages which he had previously earned. It would be out of the question to hold that this sum vested in any one but himself, and, on the whole matter, I entertain no doubt that the conclusion at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived is right.

No. 106.

School Board of Dunbar v. Magistrates and Town-Council of Dunbar.

School—Burgh School—Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, sec. 46.—Held that the annual sum payable by the town-council of a burgh out of the common good to the school board, under section 46 of the Education Act, 1872, was a fair average of what the burgh school had actually cost the burgh, and that in computing this average retiring allowances to teachers and expenditure upon the school buildings were to be taken into account.

Observed that a retiring allowance payable to a teacher, amounting to his full previous salary, under an agreement with the town-council current at the date of the Act, was to be regarded as exceptional.

2D DIVISION. Lord Shand. R.

THE school board of the burgh of Dunbar raised the present action against the provost, magistrates, and town-council of the burgh, for declarator that the defenders were bound to pay to the pursuers the annual sum of £102, being, as the pursuers alleged, the sum which it had been the custom of the burgh, prior to the passing of the Education (Scotland) Act, 1872, to contribute to the burgh school of Dunbar out of the common good of the burgh, or from other funds under the defenders' charge.*

The defenders admitted their liability to make an annual payment of £60, but not more.

The difference between these sums was made up of a retiring allowance to Mr Lyon, a former teacher, who had retired in 1851 upon the agreement that the burgh should pay him his full salary as a retiring allowance.

During the fifty years preceding the passing of the Education Act several changes had been made in the number of teachers and in the nature of the instruction given in the burgh school. There was no fixed annual sum which the town-council had been in use to expend upon the school. They had on several occasions granted retiring allowances, of small amount, to retired teachers, and these allowances were paid to such retired teachers until their death. There was no understanding that when the holder of a retiring allowance died the fund set free should be applied to his successor in office or to the school in any shape.

Between 1865 and 1872 the salaries and allowances had been as follows:—Master's salary, £50; sewing mistress's salary, £10; retiring allowance to Mr Lyon, £42.

The defenders maintained that in calculating the annual sum which they had been in use to contribute to the burgh school Mr Lyon's retiring allowance was not to be taken into account.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the defenders are not bound to make payment to the pursuers at each term of Martinmas annually of more than £60 per annum, being the sum which they offer to pay in all time coming in the defences; and in respect of that offer, and of the defenders' admission of liability for that amount,

* "The town-council of every burgh shall at the term of Martinmas yearly pay to the school board thereof such sum as it has been the custom of such burgh prior to the passing of this Act to contribute to the burgh school out of the common good of the burgh, or from other funds under their charge, and the same shall be applied and administered by the said school board for the purpose of promoting higher instruction."

assoilzies them from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses, and remits the account thereof, when lodged, to the Auditor to tax, and to report." *

* "NOTE.— . . The dispute between the parties turns upon the question whether Mr Lyon's retiring allowance is, within the meaning of the statute, a sum which it was the custom of the defenders, prior to the passing of the Education Act, to contribute to the burgh school. I am of opinion that it cannot be properly so regarded.

"There may be many cases in which a retiring allowance paid to a schoolmaster may properly be represented to be a part of the general annual contribution by the burgh to the burgh school. A burgh may have been in use for a period of time to pay a fixed annual sum, or a sum of nearly a fixed amount, partly in salaries, partly in prizes, partly in retiring allowances, or otherwise, for behoof of the burgh school, following the system or practice that where any retiring allowance shall cease by the death of the annuitant the sum thus set free shall continue to be applied either to increase the existing salaries of other teachers, or for some other school purpose. In such cases the retiring allowance may properly be represented as part of the sum which it has been the custom of the burgh to contribute annually to the school, and under the provisions of the statute the burgh is put under the obligation of continuing to recognise that permanent obligation in all time coming. If, however, the payment be not of this character, but is given to the retiring schoolmaster to cease at his death, and in the view that on that event occurring no such payment shall thereafter continue to be made to the burgh school, or for any purpose connected with the school, it appears to me that the provisions of the statute do not impose liability on the burgh to continue the payment. The Education Act transferred the burgh schools to the school boards to be elected under the statute, subject to the burden, also transferred from the burgh, of upholding and maintaining the schools thereafter in a proper state of efficiency; and section 46 of the statute appears to be mainly directed to the object of securing for the benefit of such schools the means of promoting higher education than might otherwise be given, where such means have previously existed, either in the form of income from funds entrusted to the magistrates or other persons as trustees for behoof of the burgh school, or of a payment which the magistrates have recognised as a permanent obligation on them, by having expended a certain amount annually, over a period of time, to or for behoof of the school; the annual payment which the magistrates have been in use to make for this purpose is made a burden on the burgh funds in all time coming.

"In this view of the statute it would be unjust to convert a payment of a temporary nature, such as a retiring allowance to a schoolmaster, which would cease entirely to be a burden on the burgh funds at the annuitant's death, into a permanent charge. Thus, in the present case, it may be anticipated that in a short time the annuity will come to an end, and the defenders reasonably object to the statute being so interpreted as to convert a temporary burden of £42 a-year into an obligation on them for all future time. There is nothing in the facts disclosed in the minutes of the council, or appearing either from the arrangements made when Mr Lyon retired, or when Mr Dick, the present master, received his appointment, to lead to the inference that when Mr Lyon's annuity should cease any part of the sum paid to him should thereafter be paid to a school fund, or in any way for behoof of the school. If Mr Lyon had died a year or a year or two before the Education Act passed it would, I think, have been clear that the sum of £60 only, which, in that case, the burgh would have continued to pay, as the salaries of the master and mistress of the school, was the amount which the burgh had been in the custom of contributing to the school prior to the passing of the Act. At the time of Mr Dick's appointment, August 1851, some time after Mr Lyon had resigned, it appears that the school was put in some respects on a different footing from that which had previously existed, probably for the reasons stated by the defenders in their statement 4th,

No. 106.

Mar. 18, 1876. School Board of Dunbar v. Magistrates and Town-Council of Dunbar.

The pursuers reclaimed.

In the course of the debate in the Inner-House the pursuers for the first time maintained that the sums expended by the town-council in repairs and cleaning of the school should be taken into account, and craved leave to amend their record accordingly.

Excerpts from the states of the burgh funds in process shewed that the sums entered as expenses on school varied very much from year to year, but averaged about £10 or £12 for the last twenty years.

At advising, the opinion of the Court was delivered by the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case the Court is of opinion that no further procedure should take place, and we intend to deal with it on the principle of equitable adjustment, namely, that the payment should be as nearly as possible what the school has actually hitherto cost the town; so that the town should be neither better nor worse for the transfer.

The granting of retiring allowances was part of the ordinary expenditure on the school, and must be taken into computation, but a retirement on full salary is exceptional, and it would be misleading to assume the full amount paid to Mr Lyon as the basis for an average. Taking the information which we have, and which we consider sufficient, on the whole matter, we are of opinion that the burgh should pay £80 annually to the school board.

In the circumstances, we will find no expenses due to or by either party.

viz., that a number of other schools had sprung up in the town; and the subsequent minutes of the town-council shew that it was not contemplated to make any substantial change, or to devote any part of Mr Lyon's retiring allowance, after it it should cease, to increasing the other salaries, or for any other school purpose.

"The pursuers do not ask that the defenders should be ordained either to continue to pay the retiring allowance to Mr Lyon so long as he lives, or to pay the amount to them until that event, to enable them to discharge Mr Lyon's claim. It occurred to me that an arrangement to that effect would be a reasonable one to be adopted by the parties, who are both representatives of public interests, and I still entertain that opinion, believing that this would be carrying out the spirit of the provisions of the Act. The defenders, however, found upon the 55th section of the statute, which provides that the retiring allowances to schoolmasters 'shall be paid and provided by the school board having the management of such schools respectively,' as now imposing on the pursuers the obligation to pay Mr Lyon's annuity; they maintain that while, on the one hand, they are bound by the Act to give up the schools, and to continue to pay to the school board the amount of their permanent annual contributions to the school, they are relieved from all future burdens connected with the school, and are expressly relieved from the future payment of schoolmasters' retiring allowances. It might be naturally expected that the statute would have provided that a payment of a temporary nature, such as has been here made to Mr Lyon under an obligation granted by the burgh, and which cannot, I think, be regarded as in any sense permanent, should continue to be made by the burgh for the lifetime of the annuitant; but it may be that such cases are not common, and were thus not under the notice of the Legislature. However this may be, I am of opinion that the provisions of section 46, being the only section which imposes future obligations on burghs in reference to their burgh schools, does not impose on the defenders the obligation to continue to pay such an allowance as that given to Mr Lyon. The only payments there referred to are to be continued in all time coming, and for the reasons already stated I do not think the language used includes such a retiring allowance as that which is here the subject of dispute."

Property—Superior and Vassal—Conditions in Feu—Mutuality of Obligations between Co-Feuars—Jus quæsitum tertio.—A feu-contract of an area of ground in a suburban district contained an obligation on the vassal that the villas or other buildings to be erected thereon should be built with stone and lime. This obligation was embodied in the titles of two disponees to whom adjoining stances on the feu were conveyed. Held that the proprietor of one stance had a title and interest to insist upon the removal of a brick stable erected upon the other stance, although a man of skill, to whom the Court remitted, reported that the injury to the complainer's property would practically be the same if the building were of stone.

2D DIVISION. Lord Rutherfurd Clark. Dean of Guild of Crosshill. I.

MR PETER BEATTIE and Messrs John and Robert Ure were proprietors respectively of two conterminous building stances in the burgh of Crosshill, which is a police burgh under the Act of 1862. Both stances formed parts of a piece of ground which had been feued out to one John Renton under a feu-contract containing the following obligation:—"And the said John Renton also binds and obliges himself, &c., that the villa or villas, or other buildings to be erected on the said area of ground, shall be built with stone and lime, and covered with slates." The feu-contract was duly recorded in the Register of Sasines, and in accordance with a provision therein the restriction above quoted was validly referred to in the titles to both properties.

The Messrs Ure proceeded to erect certain brick stables on their ground. After the building had been begun, in consequence of an intimation by the magistrates of Crosshill that they claimed a jurisdiction in regard to the erection of all buildings within the burgh, the Messrs Ure presented a petition to the magistrates of Crosshill, addressed to the Lord Dean of Guild of the burgh of Crosshill, and his brethren in council, to authorise the erection of the said stables.

Mr Beattie lodged objections, founded on the clause in the titles above quoted. On 10th December 1876 the senior magistrate pronounced a deliverance sustaining the objections, and refusing the petition.*

* "NOTE.— . . . It has been decided by a series of cases that, in the words of the Lord President (Inglis), 'When a superior feus out his land for building purposes, and lays all his feuars under the same obligations, there arises a mutuality of obligation amongst the feuars which depends upon the community of the relation to the superior. If all are bound to the superior, then the general rule undoubtedly is that they have right inter se, whereby they are enabled to enforce the common obligations against one another.' Such being the rule of law with reference to conterminous feus, a fortiori must it be the rule with reference to plots of ground which constitute portions of the same feu. See Robertson v. North British Railway Co., 18th July 1874, 1 Rettie, 1213." . . .

Beattie v. Ures.

The Messrs Ure, who maintained that the Dean of Guild Court had no jurisdiction to determine the question, disregarded the senior magistrate's deliverance, and proceeded with the erection of the stables.

Mr Beattie then presented a note of suspension and interdict in the Bill-Chamber against the Messrs Ure, to have the respondents prevented from proceeding with the buildings in question, or erecting any other building on their premises not built with stone and lime and covered with slates, and further, to have the respondents ordained to remove the brick building in so far as already erected.

The Lord Ordinary on the bills passed the note.

The complainer pleaded;—(1) The operations complained of being a violation of the conditions of the respondents' title, and in direct contravention of a decree by the magistrates or Dean of Guild Court of the burgh of Crosshill, the complainer is entitled to suspension and interdict against the respondents as craved. (2) The complainer holding the feu from the same superior as the respondents, and there being thus a mutuality of obligation between them, the complainer has an undoubted right to enforce the obligations contained in the respondents' feu-contract.

The respondents lodged answers, in which they averred that the complainer had allowed the building to be erected up to the joists without objection, and pleaded;—(1) the complainer has no title, and, separatim, has no interest to insist in the present application. (2) Upon a sound construction of the feu-contract libelled, the prohibition founded on by the complainer does not apply to buildings of the class and in the situation of that in question. (3) The complainer having allowed the said buildings to be erected to the extent mentioned without objection, he is not entitled to demand that the same shall be demolished. (4) The Dean of Guild had no jurisdiction to determine the questions raised by the complainer in his objections to the respondents' petition.

After the note of suspension and interdict was presented the Messrs Ure presented an appeal to the Second Division against the deliverance of the Dean of Guild.

The Lord Ordinary, in respect of the dependence of the appeal, made avizandum with the process of suspension and interdict to the Second Division.

After some debate in the Inner-House the Court, before answer, remitted to Mr George Bell, architect, Glasgow, "to visit and inspect the premises, and to report as to how far the building complained of operates injuriously to the property of the complainer; and generally on any matter connected with the cause which either party may desire, or which he may think important for the consideration of the Court."

Mr Bell reported that the wall of the building complained of, which abutted upon the complainer's boundary wall, was six feet in height above the complainer's wall, which was five feet in height and also of brick. The reporter was of opinion that the stretch of dead wall, as seen from the back windows of the complainer's villa, operated injuriously to the complainer's property in so far as the respondents' wall exceeded the complainer's wall in height. The report continued,—"In answer to queries put by the respondents, I have further to report that, in my opinion, the injury to the complainer's property would practically be the same if the building complained of was made of stone, or painted or plastered so as to resemble stone, although at the same time stone would harmonise better with the complainer's front building, and to some it might be more agreeable to have a look out on a stone wall than a brick wall."

The debate was then resumed.

Argued for the Messrs Ure;—They did not dispute the general doctrine of the mutuality of obligations between feuars laid upon them by a common superior. But while the right of the superior to enforce obligations laid upon his feuars by their titles was absolute, a feuar could not enforce such an obligation against a co-feuar, unless (1) the obligation affected his feu, and (2) unless he had a material interest in the obligation. The principle of jus quæsitum tertio presupposed a material interest. For instance, a restriction as to building contained in a feu-title could not be insisted upon by a feuar in another street altogether, who derived right from the same superior, and was placed under the same restriction.[1] It was plain from Mr Bell's report that Mr Beattie had no real interest to enforce the restriction in question. He could not prevent his neighbour doing much more offensive things,—erecting a stone wall of greater height, or opening windows looking into Mr Beattie's garden. The objection was therefore in æmulationem vicini, and ought to be repelled.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—It may be that although we decide in favour of Mr Beattie he may find that he has not increased the amenity of his house. But I must deal with the case according to law. It is irrelevant to say that a brick building must be allowed because a stone building in the same situation would have been equally injurious and could not have been prevented. The feu-title says the reverse. We must assume that the parties to the feu-contract proceeded on the footing that stone was better than brick.

The next question is, whether the restrictive words are applicable to stables. Throughout the deed the word "building" is used to signify anything erected on the ground, and, indeed, I see no reason why the generic term should not include stables.

If we had found that no injurious effect to the complainer was created by this building, it might come to be in law, as it is perhaps in fact, an emulous proceeding on the part of the complainer to object to its erection, and we might perhaps on the authority of some of the cases quoted have found that the complainer had no interest to enforce the prohibition. But that is not the case. Mr Bell no doubt says that the injury to the complainer's property would practically be the same if the building was of stone, but we cannot take cognisance of that. I therefore cannot resist the conclusion that Mr Beattie is entitled to prevail.

Lord Ormidale concurred, and suggested that the parties should come to an arrangement, by which the complainer should get a quid pro quo for not insisting on the removal of the building, in the shape of an obligation that it should not be raised in height, and no windows made in it overlooking the complainer's garden, or something similar.

Lord Gifford concurred.

JOHN WATSON, Pursuer.—Fraser—MacLean.
THE NORTH BRITISH RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders.—D.-F. Watson—Asher.

No. 108. Mar. 18, 1876. Watson v. North British Railway Co.

Railway—Contract of Haulage.—When a railway company undertakes to haul along their line waggons belonging to private traders, the extent of their obligation is to use reasonable care and diligence.

Observed (per Lord President), In a contract to carry passengers by railway, if an accident occurs through a break-down of the plant, the presumption is that it is the fault of the railway company, because the plant is entirely their own, but in a contract to haul waggons, the plant being partly that of the railway company and partly that of the other party, there is no such presumption, and the burden of proving fault lies on the person who alleges it.

THIS was an action by John Watson, coalmaster, Glasgow, against the North British Railway Company for damages to the amount of £173 done to waggons belonging to the pursuer by the fault of the defenders. 1ST DIVISION, with Lord Curriehill. Lord Shand. B.

The pursuer was in the habit of sending his coals along the defenders' line in railway waggons belonging to himself. On one occasion the coupling between the foremost waggon and the engine broke. The defenders' servants re-attached the waggon by the side chains to the tender of the engine. Three or four miles further on the waggon again broke loose and was overturned, and several others behind it were also overturned and injured.

After a proof, the Lord Ordinary assoilzied the defenders.*

The pursuer reclaimed.

The Court ordered the case to be argued before five Judges.

The pursuer maintained that the defenders' servants had not re-attached the waggon in the proper way, and had afterwards gone at too great speed, and in other respects had failed to do what was right under the circumstances.

The majority of the Court, consisting of the Lord President, Lord Ardmillan, Lord Mure, and Lord Curriehill, were of opinion that it was proved that the damage sustained by the pursuer's waggons at the time and place mentioned in the record was caused by the fault of the defenders.

* "NOTE.—With regard to the legal obligation which rested on the defenders there seems to be no dispute between the parties, and at all events the law is clear. The railway company undertook to carry coals for the pursuer in his own waggons at certain rates, and I do not think the pursuer has put his case at all higher than he was entitled to do when he states in article 7 of the condescendence that the defenders were bound to use all proper care and diligence for the protection of his waggons,—by which, I understand, is meant all reasonable care and diligence. The question of fact is whether such reasonable care and diligence was used. While I cannot say that the case is absolutely free from difficulty, I am nevertheless of opinion—and I do not say so with any great doubt as to the result, so far as my judgment is concerned—that the pursuer has failed to prove such fault upon the part of the defenders as amounts to want of reasonable care and diligence in the protection of the waggons while they were in the defenders' hands. . . . ."

Watson v. North British Railway Co.

LORD DEAS expressed a different opinion, at the close of which his Lordship said—It is important to railway companies to know the nature of their liability in cases of this kind. It was said that their liability was that of carriers, but that contention was quite untenable. Then it was suggested that their liability was similar to what they lay under in conveying passenger trains, but that proposition is little less extravagant. The contract, if there was a contract at all, was one of haulage. The coupling which gave way was the property of the pursuers. If the defenders were under the reasonable belief that what they did was for the best under the circumstances, that is quite enough to relieve them. On the whole, I do not think that fault has been proved against the defenders in such a satisfactory manner as to warrant us in altering the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary. There are some cases in which it is not of much moment that the Judge should have heard and seen the witnesses. In other cases that is of very considerable importance, and I think it was so in the present case.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The difference of opinion in the Court is entirely on the question of fact. We are all at one on the principle of law, which is well stated by the Lord Ordinary:—"The railway company undertook to carry coals for the pursuer in his own waggons at certain rates, and I do not think the pursuer has put his case at all higher than he was entitled to do, when he states that the defenders were bound to use all proper care and diligence for the protection of his waggons, by which I understand is meant all reasonable care and diligence. The question of fact is whether such reasonable care and diligence was used." I concur with Lord Deas in holding that the liability of the defenders rests on different grounds from the liability of common carriers in the carriage of goods, and that there is also an important distinction between the present case and that of injury to passengers. In the present case the train consisted of the plant, partly of the railway company and partly of the pursuer, and its safety depended on both being in good working condition. There was no presumption that if anything went wrong with the plant it was the fault of the railway company, whereas a break-down of the plant affords a presumption of liability in the carriage of passengers. Therefore I think that in the contract of haulage, where the injury is occasioned by a break-down of the plant, the burden of proving fault is distinctly on the person who alleges it, and so in this case on the pursuer.

I have thought it right to make these observations, lest there should be any misapprehension of the import of this judgment, or an impression that there was any difference of opinion among us on the law of the case.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and found that the damage had been caused by the fault of the defenders, and assessed damages in accordance with a joint minute for the parties.

Trust—Power to Feu—Statute—Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 97), sec. 3.—Section 3d of the above Act empowers the Court to grant authority to trustees to grant feus of the estate under their management "on being satisfied that the same is expedient for the execution of the trust and not inconsistent with the intention thereof." A truster, who died in 1825, left the residue of his estate to be applied for behoof of a grammar school, and directed his trustees to let a park belonging to the trust-estate annually or on lease for a period not exceeding seven years, "declaring that my said park shall never be sold or disposed of." In a petition by the trustees for authority to feu the park, held that the Court could not grant authority to feu as that was contrary to the truster's intention as expressed in the trust-deed.

1st Division. Ld. Craighill. M.

JAMES DOUGLAS OLIVER, rector of the Selkirk Grammar School, who died in 1825, left a trust-deed and settlement conveying all his property. He directed his trustees after paying certain legacies that the residue of his funds should be applied for the purpose of providing medals for the scholars of the grammar school and for the education of children whose parents resided in Selkirk.

The testator at the time of his death was proprietor of a house, garden, and stables, which, in accordance with his directions, were sold by the trustees, and also of a park of rather more than one acre and a half called Tait's Hole, which was kept by the trustees and let for £5 per annum. The annual income from the rest of the funds amounted to about £24. The trust-deed contained the following directions:—"Ultimo, I ordain that my said trustees shall let annually, or on lease for a period not exceeding seven years, to the best advantage, my park called Tait's Hole, above disponed to them for the interest of the Grammar School of Selkirk, in all time after my death; declaring that my said park shall never be sold nor disposed of, nor ever let to my successor in office, and that no burdens be left upon it, or contracted upon it, after my death."

The trustees, being anxious to feu Tait's Hole, presented a petition for authority to do so under section 3 of the Trust Act of 1867.* They stated,—"The trustees have reason to believe that if they were empowered to grant feus they would soon be able to dispose of the whole ground at rates amounting at least to £12 an acre, thus adding £13 per annum to the income, to the material advantage of the trust, the usefulness of which would be much increased by this permanent addition, as it would put it in the power of the trustees to afford education to ten or twelve children above the present number."

* By section 3 of 30 and 31 Vict. cap. 97, "Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867," it is enacted that "it shall be competent to the Court of Session, on the petition of the trustees under any trust-deed, to grant authority to the trustees to do any of the following acts, on being satisfied that the same is expedient for the execution of the trust, and not inconsistent with the intention thereof; and the Court shall determine all questions of expenses in relation to such application, and when it shall be of opinion that the expense of any such application should not be charged against the trust-estate, it shall so find in disposing of the application" (inter alia)—"2. To grant feus or long leases of the heritable estate, or any part of it."

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the feuing of the heritable subjects called Tait's Hole, referred to in the petition, would be inconsistent with the intention of the trust represented by the petitioners as trustees: Therefore refuses the prayer of the petition, and decerns."

The petitioners reclaimed, and argued;—Circumstances have changed since the trust-deed was made, the subject having become an urban one. If the truster were alive now he would have given different directions. His reason for giving directions as to letting on lease for not more than seven years was to enable the beneficiaries to get the best income. The way of making the most of the field at the present time would be to feu it.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—We have power to grant the authority which is here asked, provided we are satisfied "that the same is expedient for the execution of the trust, and is not inconsistent with the intention thereof," which, in other words, means that it shall not be inconsistent with the intention of the truster. The power here asked is a power to feu. There is a prohibition against selling, but it is contended that there is no prohibition against feuing. What did the testator intend by the power which he conferred upon his trustees? He directs them to allow any residue to remain in the bank, "or otherwise invest it on security to their satisfaction, and add the interest of it annually to the rents of Tait's Hole, which are to be disposed of in the manner aftermentioned," that was, in providing for the education of a certain class of children. With regard to Tait's Hole, he directs,—"Ultimo, I ordain that my said trustees shall let annually, or on lease for a period not exceeding seven years, to the best advantage, my park called Tait's Hole, above disponed to them for the interest of the Grammar School of Selkirk in all time after my death; declaring that my said park shall never be sold nor disposed of, nor ever let to my successor in office, and that no burdens be left upon it, or contracted upon it, after my death: And I ordain that with the rents of Tait's Hole, and the interest of the residue of my other funds, if there be any residue, and of the £200 sterling before bequeathed for the use of James Oliver, if the same shall remain with or revert to my said trustees," that they shall do certain things.

What does the testator mean when he says that Tait's Hole shall never be sold or disposed of? It appears to me that these words can have no meaning, unless they cover such an alienation as is proposed here. The trustees are not entitled to grant long leases, or even leases of ordinary duration. They cannot exceed a lease of seven years. It would be strange if trustees who cannot let for more than seven years should be entitled to feu. They are expressly prohibited from selling. As to the meaning of the testator there is no doubt. The question is whether power to feu is consistent or inconsistent with the intention of the truster. I think that it is inconsistent with the express prohibition of the testator. While, therefore, I think that granting the power might be expedient for the execution of the trust, I think that it is impossible to hold it consistent with the intention of the testator.

This case appears stronger than the case of Hay. In that case the truster had created a trust for twenty-one years, with the view of paying off his whole debts. That was to be accomplished out of the general estate, and also out of the rents of the heritage. The project of the truster turned out to be impossible. The trustees found the estate bankrupt, because the expenditure exceeded the income by £100. This state of matters was becoming worse every year. There was a prohibition in the trust-deed against selling any part of the landed estate. In these circumstances, the trustees came to the Court and asked power to sell part of the estate, and if this had been done the other part would have been left to be entailed according to the intention of the testator. It was represented to the Court that the intention of the testator was impracticable, and if the power of sale was not granted the estate must be pulled to pieces by the diligence of creditors. The only course left was to carry out partially the intention of the testator, and to settle part of the estate as he had directed. This was a telling argument, but the Court felt themselves compelled by the terms of the Act to refuse the application because of the prohibition against selling. It appears to me that this is a stronger case than that, and that the proposal to feu is inconsistent with the intention of the testator.

LORD DEAS.—I concur. There is nothing in the deed to entitle the trustees to sell or feu this piece of ground. The deed is not fully printed, but I have read it and I find that the trustees are "ordained" to sell the truster's dwelling-house, stable, and garden, but, by the clause we are considering, it is expressly declared that the park called Tait's Hole shall never be sold or disposed of, nor any burdens contracted upon it. The Act of Parliament (30 and 31 Vict. c. 97) provides that we may authorise trustees to grant feus or long leases of the heritable estate if we are satisfied of two things,—1st. "That the same is expedient for the execution of the trust;" and 2d. "That it is not inconsistent with the intention thereof." Now, expediency is all very well. But how can we be satisfied that it is not inconsistent with the intention of the trust—that is to say, with the intention of the truster—to grant feus of this portion of the estate when the truster has expressly said that it shall never be sold or disposed of? I think that is out of the question.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I concur. I am of opinion that in order to exclude the power and discretion of the Court it is necessary that the act which the Court is asked to sanction should be shewn to be inconsistent with the intention of the testator. It is not enough that it is beyond his intention so far as expressed; it must be opposed to his intention. But we have, as I think, a contrary intention expressed in this case.

Feuing may be regarded as an alienation of the subject, or as a location in perpetuity for an annual sum. Here a sale or alienation on the one hand, and a lease for any period beyond seven years on the other hand, are both excluded by the terms of the trust-deed.

LORD MURE concurred.

Poor—Settlement—Relief—Desertion by a Husband.—In questions of parochial relief the rule that the desertion by a husband of his wife and children is during the period of desertion equivalent to his death applies in all such cases.

The rule applied in a case where a deserting husband who had a birth settlement in Scotland had (if he was alive) during the desertion lost a residential settlement by non-residence.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Mid-Lothian and Haddington. M.

JOHN SCOTT was born in High Calton, Edinburgh, in the parish of South Leith, on 28th October 1835. He deserted his wife and family about 1st June 1868, when they were relieved down to June 1872 by the parish of St Cuthbert's, in respect of a residential settlement which he had acquired therein. They continued to reside there until June 1873, when they came to reside in the City Parish of Edinburgh. The wife, in June 1873, applied for and obtained relief for herself and children from the City Parish. Notice of such chargeability was sent to, and relief claimed from, the parish of South Leith, as the birth settlement of John Scott, and also to the parish of St Cuthbert's, in which he had acquired a residential settlement. On 12th November 1873 she again became chargeable to, and was relieved by, the parish of St Cuthbert's. Notice of chargeability was sent by that parish to, and relief claimed from, the parish of South Leith, in respect of John Scott's absence from St Cuthbert's Parish for more than the statutory period.

The inspector of the poor of the City Parish raised this action in the Sheriff Court of Edinburgh against the inspectors of South Leith and of St Cuthbert's for £3, 11s. 4d., the relief which the City Parish had given to the wife and family between 25th June and 4th October 1873.

The inspector of South Leith, the husband's birth settlement, pleaded; —(1) The residential settlement of John Scott at the date of the alleged desertion, and when the paupers became chargeable, having been in St Cuthbert's, and the said settlement having been maintained by the continued chargeability of the paupers on that parish, the defender is not liable for the sum sued for or relief claimed.

The inspector of St Cuthbert's, the husband's residential settlement, pleaded;—(1) Esto that the said John Scott acquired a residential settlement in the parish of St Cuthbert's prior to 1st June 1868, the same was lost by his absence from the parish for upwards of four years thereafter. (2) The said John Scott, of the date of notice of chargeability by the pursuer to the defender Mr Craig, having no residential settlement in the parish of St Cuthbert's, the parish of South Leith, as the parish in which the said John Scott was born, is liable in relief to the pursuer. (3) It being alleged by South Leith that liability attaches to St Cuthbert's in respect of a residential settlement therein acquired and retained, the onus lies on South Leith of explaining away the effect of the absence of John Scott from St Cuthbert's since 1st June 1868, and failing South Leith sufficiently discharging that onus, no residential settlement was retained in St Cuthbert's, and South Leith is liable in relief to the pursuer.

The Sheriff-substitute (Gebbie) pronounced this interlocutor:—(After findings in fact as above)—"Finds in law, with reference to the foregoing facts, that Jane Bald or Scott has not lost her residential settlement in St Cuthbert's Parish in consequence of her husband's absence for more than four years, and that it is still liable to maintain her and relieve the pursuer of the sum claimed: Therefore decerns against the defender James Craig, as inspector of poor of St Cuthbert's Parish and Canongate Combination, and as representing the parochial board thereof, in terms of the conclusions of the libel: Finds the said defender liable in expenses to both the pursuer and the other defender, the inspector of poor for the parish of South Leith," &c.*

No. 110.

Greig v. Simpson and Craig.

The Sheriff affirmed this interlocutor.

The inspector of St Cuthbert's appealed, and argued;—If the husband was presumed to be alive, he had lost his residential settlement in St Cuthbert's Parish. If he were to come back, the parish of South Leith, his birth parish, would be bound to relieve him. A married woman has the status of her husband, and the parish of the husband is bound to relieve the wife and family.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—Has it not been settled that a wife deserted by her husband is in the same position as if he were dead? That was decided in the case of Beattie v. Greig[2] in July last.

Argued for the appellant;—The Court have never held that desertion is the same as death in the case of a husband who was a native of Scotland. If the husband has no birth settlement in Scotland it may be necessary to hold that his residential settlement is to continue, as that is the only settlement in the country. But that is not necessary in the case of a deserting husband who has a birth settlement in Scotland.

Counsel for the respondents were not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Dean of Faculty is right in saying that no case has been decided precisely similar to the present, but there is a principle running through a whole series of decisions applicable to the present case and all its circumstances.

The wife of John Scott was deserted by her husband on 1st June 1868, and she then, along with her children, became chargeable on and received relief

* "NOTE.—The Sheriff-substitute is of opinion that the parish of St Cuthbert's is liable to maintain the pauper Jane Bald or Scott and her children. Although her husband deserted her and has been absent from that parish for more than four years she herself has never been absent for that period, and has received relief down to a recent time. The relief granted stopped the running of the period requisite for destroying the residential settlement acquired through him, and that settlement enured to her on her husband's desertion exactly as his death would have done.

"In Barbour v. Adamson, May 30, 1853, 1 Macq., 376, the House of Lords found the parish of the father's settlement, whether acquired by birth or residence, bound to maintain his children left destitute by reason of his being transported, and the same principle would seem to apply to the case of a wife of a deserting or transported husband. The opinions of some of the Judges in Masons v. Greig, March 11, 1865, 3 Macph. 707, 37 Scot. Jur. 348, go far to support the conclusion arrived at in the foregoing interlocutor."

from the parish of St Cuthbert's down to June 1872. There was no question raised about that, because there was a residential settlement of the husband in St Cuthbert's. They then came to reside in the City Parish of Edinburgh, when the woman again applied for relief, which she received in June 1873. Then the present question arose. She was again relieved by St Cuthbert's Parish on 12th November 1873. But that parish, in respect that the husband and father had been absent for more than the statutory period, claimed relief from South Leith, which was the parish of the husband's birth. If the absence of the husband was capable of destroying the residential settlement, he had been absent long enough to have that effect. But the real question comes to be, whether the wife and family having, at the time of desertion, a residential settlement which enured to them in respect of the deserting husband, could lose it by the husband failing to reside in the parish for the next five years in terms of section 76 of the Poor-Law Act, or whether the settlement was not incapable of being destroyed by their having received parochial relief during that time.

It has been decided that in a question as to parochial relief of the wife and family the desertion of the husband is equivalent to his death. That result was not arrived at without a difference of opinion, but I must now consider it to be a fixed rule. That rule, applied here, ends the question. If, instead of deserting his wife and family, he had died in 1868 and left a residential settlement, there has been nothing since then to deprive the wife and family of their right to the residential settlement.

But it is contended that the rule only applies to the case where the deserting husband and father has no birth settlement in this country. It is no doubt true that the case has never been decided in exactly the same circumstances as the present. But the rule admits of no qualification except in this respect, that desertion only remains equivalent to death so long as the desertion lasts. The deserting husband may return, and then a new rule may come in to fix the parish, which is bound to maintain him or his wife and family. He may revive a settlement which during his desertion cannot be gone against for the support of the wife and family, or he may put an end to a settlement which has enured to the wife and family. But, with that exception, the rule laid down is of universal application, and I should be sorry to see it disturbed.

I have no doubt about the soundness of the judgment of the Sheriffs.

Lord Deas.—When the husband deserted his wife and family in 1868 he had a residential settlement in the parish of St Cuthbert's, and there cannot be a doubt that that parish was then the settlement of the wife and family. If he had died instead of deserting, his settlement would have enured to the wife and family. If he had been transported for a crime his settlement would, in like manner, have enured to the wife and family until they acquired a new one, or until the husband returned. As long as the husband remains away the settlement enures to the wife and family just as if he was dead. The only difference is that, in the one case he may return, and in the other he cannot. But this does not affect the rule. If it did there would be constant changes which would be very inconvenient.

It is said that the husband must be presumed to be alive. I do not know that in cases of parochial relief we are called upon to presume that a husband who has deserted, or who is a transported felon, is alive. Without going into that speculation I come to the conclusion that the residential settlement of the wife and children here is that of the deserting husband.

No. 110.

Greig v. Simpson and and Craig.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I think that it is of the very greatest importance that in the administration of the poor-law there should be uniformity of decision, uniformity of legal right and legal practice. When once a principle has been well considered and decided it is eminently undesirable that it should be disturbed. I was very slow to accept the principle that the husband's desertion of his wife and family was equivalent to his death. I was much impressed by the views of the late Lord Moncreiff and the minority of the Judges in the case of Hay v. Skene, June 13, 1850, 12 D. 1019, 31st May 1850, 22 Scot. Jur. 420. But as the question has been deliberately considered and decided, I hold that the law on the point is now fixed. There is nothing to be gained by reviving the question. We must therefore hold that desertion by the husband is equivalent to his death at the date of the desertion, and during the period of desertion. If the husband were to return that would lead to a totally new question. In the meantime, his desertion is continued, and as regards this question he must be viewed as dead.

Wilful desertion is the same in effect as transportation so far as concerns the poor-law administration, and the question has been settled in regard to a husband under sentence of transportation.

As regards the birth settlement of the husband, I do not think that a man can have both a birth settlement and a residential settlement available to him at the same time. The birth settlement is not lost but suspended. It revives when the other fails. But the man who has a residential settlement, has, while he retains it, no claim on the parish of his birth. The death of a man necessarily puts an end to the acquisition of a settlement, and so the desertion of the wife and family by a husband being equivalent to his death fixes at its date the settlement of the deserted wife and family.

LORD MURE.—It must now be held as settled in the administration of the poor-law that the desertion of the husband is equivalent to his death, because, whatever difference of opinion there may have been as to the policy of the rule, there is distinct authority for it, and while the desertion lasts the wife's settlement is regulated by the settlement which the husband had before desertion. I therefore concur with your Lordship.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Refuse the appeal, and decern: Find the appellant liable in expenses," &c.

entry of "David Swan junior and Company" as occupiers of premises of the annual value of £220. At 31st December 1874 a change took place in the partnership, the new firm taking the name of David Swan and Sons. At an election of police commissioners in June 1875, a person, who was a partner of the new firm, and held a written authority from the new firm to vote, was elected a commissioner. In an action brought by a defeated candidate to reduce the election, on the ground that the defender had not the qualification, as neither his name, nor the name of his firm, appeared in the valuation-roll, held (1) that the Court had jurisdiction to entertain the objection; but (2) that the objection was not valid, as the candidate had a substantial qualification.

THE burgh of Maryhill was constituted a police burgh under the Act 13 and 14 Vict. c. 33. In June 1875 the election of two commissioners was held, when four candidates were proposed,—James Robertson, John Morrison Swan, Dr William M'Donald, and John Wilson. A poll having been taken on 7th June, James Shaw, the senior magistrate, who acted as returning officer, after counting the votes, declared that James Robertson and John Morrison Swan had a majority of votes. Accordingly, at a meeting of the commissioners on 17th July, these two gentlemen accepted the office of commissioners. The defeated candidates, Dr William M'Donald and John Wilson, along with George Robertson Murray, a householder of Maryhill, raised an action against the two successful candidates, and Joseph M'Intyre Taylor, clerk to the commissioners, concluding for reduction of the whole proceedings in the election. The grounds of reduction were—

1. That J. M. Swan was not eligible for election as a commissioner, because he was not a householder in the sense of the undernoted Acts.* Mr Swan was not a member of the firm of David Swan junior and Company, which appeared on the valuation-roll as occupiers of premises of the yearly value of £220. That firm had been dissolved on 31st December 1874, and a new firm of David Swan and Sons was constituted, of which Mr J. M. Swan was a partner. The name of this new firm did not appear on the valuation-roll, which was made up before the change of partnership.

2. That certain persons named who had not paid their taxes, in terms of sec. 34 of 13 and 14 Vict. c. 33, had been allowed to vote.

3. That the voters had been treated. The pursuers' allegation was:—(Cond. 12) "The said defenders, in contravention of the said Acts, by themselves or others acting on their behalf, treated the voters, with the view of influencing their votes, at the public-house kept by the defender James Robertson or his son, in Main Street, Maryhill, and other hotels and public-houses in Maryhill, and kept a free table therein, and also in the Black Bull Inn, Maryhill, for the treating of said voters during the whole of the said polling day. A large number of voters who were so treated and unduly influenced voted at the said election in favour of the defenders."

The pursuers farther alleged;—"Before the commencement of the poll they objected to the defender, John Morrison Swan, standing as a candidate, on the ground that he was not eligible to be elected to the office of commissioner, and immediately after the election they lodged a protest with the commissioners of the burgh, in which they protested against the declaration and election of the defenders as commissioners of the said burgh, and reserved right to take such steps as might be necessary to try the matter in the Courts of law."

The defenders stated that the premises were duly entered in the valuation-roll at £220, and that J. M. Swan had a written authority from the new firm to vote, and so was a householder in the sense of the Act. Further, the objection had been repelled by the returning officer, whose decision was final by sec. 12 of the Police Act of 1850.

The defenders denied the pursuers' averments of treating.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuers' averments are irrelevant and insufficient, and fail in due specification. (2) The pursuers' only procedure for trying their objections to the election and return being provided by section 31* of the Police Act, 1850, and they having declined to take such procedure, this action is excluded. (3) The jurisdiction for trying the merits of the disputed election being vested exclusively in the commissioners, or their committee, this action is in any event excluded. (4) The objections to the qualification of Mr Swan are specially excluded by the decision of the returning officer disallowing the same. (5) The proceedings for the election are protected by the terms of section 31 of the Police Act, and section 13 of the Ballot Act, and the pursuers are personally excluded from any challenge by their acquiescence in the whole proceedings, and adoption thereof as in all respects regular. * "Every person who may consider that he ought to have been returned as a commissioner may lodge a complaint, in writing, signed by him, or by some person duly authorised on his behalf, with the commissioners assembled at such meeting, who shall thereupon remit to a committee of three or five of their number to inquire into the merits of such disputed election, and to report thereon to a subsequent meeting of the commissioners, and such report shall be final. Further, no election or appointment under this Act shall be quashed or set aside on account of any misnomer, omission, or other informality."

being no power to order a new election, the commissioners had and have the power, under section 37 of the Police Act, to receive the defenders, Robertson and Swan, as commissioners.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the defences, and assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the pursuers liable in expenses," &c.*

The pursuers reclaimed.[1]

The defenders' counsel were not called on.

* "OPINION.—This action, brought to set aside the election of the defenders as commissioners of the burgh of Maryhill, and to declare that the pursuers were duly elected, is rested on three grounds:

"1. The first ground is, that the defender Swan was ineligible, not being a householder. The objection, which appears to depend on the validity of his qualification as a member of a partnership owning and occupying premises in the burgh, was stated in writing to the returning officer at the time of the election and repelled by him after hearing parties. The senior magistrate was, as such, returning officer, and being of opinion that the objection regarded Mr Swan's qualification as a householder, I must hold that the decision of the magistrate is final by section 12 of the Police Act. It is plainly undesirable that such an objection should be the subject of litigation in this Court, and I think the Legislature meant that any such, if meant to be taken, should be stated to the magistrate at the time, and be by him finally disposed of. I do not at all found on the provision of the Ballot Act, that the decision of the returning officer disallowing an 'objection made to a nomination paper' shall be final, for this implies no power to decide objections to the eligibility of a candidate, which may be very various, and have no relation whatever to the nomination paper.

"2. The second ground of action is, that in contravention of section 34 of the Act 13 and 14 Vict., c. 33, and of section 5 of the Act 31 and 32 Vict., c. 102, 'voters to the number of from 300 to 400 voted at the election' who had not paid their rates. It is not alleged that this objection was stated against any voter at the time of tendering his vote, and the proposal of the pursuers is, that the ballot papers shall be ordered to be transmitted with a view to a scrutiny in this Court, on the general allegation now made. Such a scrutiny in a common law action of reduction and declarator would certainly be inconvenient and costly, and, I think, contrary to the spirit and meaning of the statutes regulating police burgh elections. It is provided, no doubt, that the votes of persons in arrear of their rates shall be null and void, but this does not affect the validity and finality of an election which is not questioned in terms of the Acts. Now, in order to promote general public convenience by excluding such a litigation as the pursuers propose, regarding a matter so temporary, and of such limited interest as the election of a commissioner under the Police Acts, it is, in my opinion, allowable to construe the Acts as meaning and intending, and in effect providing, that any election which is not challenged in the summary and commodious manner provided by section 31 of 13 and 14 Vict., c. 33, shall be deemed to be valid and final, to the exclusion of such objection to votes as I am now considering. The procedure there provided applies only when the seat is claimed (as it is here) by a disappointed candidate, but I am disposed to think it is according to the true meaning of the Act that when no such claim is made the objection shall be final, as against such an objection as that here presented. I so limit the proposition because there may be objections of a character to warrant action in this Court. I can have no doubt of the power of a committee of commissioners to recover the ballot papers.

"3. The third ground of action is upon treating, but for it as it is here stated (condescendence 12) I know of no authority, and the pursuers' counsel could refer me to none."

M'Donald v. Robertson.

LORD PRESIDENT.—There are three objections stated by the pursuers of this reduction to the validity of the election, and the Lord Ordinary, by the interlocutor under review, has repelled all these objections. I agree with him in his judgment, and think that none of the objections are well founded.

The first objection is to the qualification of Mr Swan. It is objected that he is not a householder, and therefore not eligible for election as a police commissioner. The first point is whether it is competent for us to entertain the objection at all. The Lord Ordinary holds that the objection to Mr Swan's qualification cannot be maintained in this Court. I confess that I am not disposed to agree in that, because the statute provides no mode of disposing of the objection by reference to the returning officer or other official. There is a mode of disposing of objections to voters, and there are many other things which the returning officer may do, and in some of them his jurisdiction is not subject to review. But it is not one of these to adjudicate on the qualification of a candidate, much less is his judgment declared to be final. In fact, I do not think that the returning officer did adjudicate upon the candidate's qualification. Perhaps, if the objection had been very simple, as, for example, that the candidate was not an inhabitant of the burgh, but was a shopkeeper in Edinburgh, he might perhaps have interposed. But the objection was that, although connected with Maryhill, he was not a householder within the meaning of the Act. If the objection was to be taken, it should have been stated at the opening of the election before the poll began, so that every elector might have notice, and those who voted for the candidate might know that, in the event of the objection being sustained, their votes would be thrown away. The allegation of the pursuers amounts to this, that the objection was stated verbally before the opening of the poll. I am aware that this is disputed by the defenders, who say that the poll had been twenty-five minutes open before the objection was stated. In giving judgment I assume that the pursuers' statement is correct. But I think that the objection is bad on its merits. The qualification prescribed by the Police Act of 1850 is that of a "householder" within the burgh, which is explained by the Police Act of 1868 to be "a male occupier of lands or premises of the yearly value of £4 and upwards as appearing on the valuation-roll." It must appear that the premises are of the yearly value of £4. What is the position of the candidate? He was the partner of a firm who were occupiers of premises of the yearly value of £220 in the valuation-roll, and he was deputed by his partners to represent them. He had more than the necessary qualification. But it is said that he acquired the qualification only shortly before by becoming a partner of David Swan and Sons, and that no such firm appears on the valuation-roll. But the firm of David Swan junior and Co. does appear on the register. The proper firm does not appear on the roll, but that is a mere accident, there being no opportunity to change the name since the new firm was constituted. The condition of the roll for the time is that there is a mere misnomer, not arising from any fault or neglect of the candidate, but ex necessitate rei. Assuming that the objection was taken in good time, I think we have jurisdiction to entertain it, but I think it is bad on its merits.

The second objection is that a number of the votes which were admitted were bad because the electors who tendered them had not paid their taxes. This would involve an inquiry as to which electors voted for each of the candidates, or, in other words, a scrutiny of votes. If there is to be any scrutiny of votes the only competent mode of having it done is by a committee of the commissioners under section 31 of 13 and 14 Vict., c. 33, and their decision is final.

The third and last objection rests on the allegation of treating voters. It is the first time I ever heard of such an objection to a municipal election or elections of that class. We are familiar with the objection in Parliamentary elections, but there it is dealt with by statutory enactment. But I cannot find anything of the kind in regard to municipal elections. The 25th section of the Ballot Act is confined to Parliamentary elections. I do not say that an election of this kind could not be set aside on the ground of bribery. Bribery is a crime at common law. Treating is a statutory and constructive bribery not known to common law, and we have no authority for extending the law as to treating in Parliamentary elections to Municipal elections.

I am therefore for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's judgment.

LORD DEAS.—The first objection is that Mr Swan had not the qualification necessary for being elected a commissioner. I agree with your Lordship that such an objection may competently be brought before us. But on the face of the argument it is not well founded It is not necessary that the candidate's name should appear on the valuation-roll, and apart from this there is nothing to shew that he had not the necessary qualification.

The second objection is that a number of electors voted who had not paid their assessments, and it is contended that there ought to be a scrutiny of votes in this Court. Upon that point I concur in holding that there can be no scrutiny except under sec. 31 of 13 and 14 Vict., c. 33, and that the inquiry can only take place before a committee of the commissioners, whose decision is final.

The third objection is that the defenders treated the voters. I entirely agree with your Lordship on this point. If there had been a relevant allegation of bribery we might have inquired into it. Bribery is a crime at common law. Treating is not. Treating to food is not a crime at all. As to drink it is not said that the electors were made drunk, or even that they were treated to drink. It is out of the question that the election should be set aside on such lame allegations.

I think all the three objections are unavailing.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I concur. I assume that the objection to Mr Swan's qualification was taken before the poll began, as the pursuers have stated. I agree with your Lordship that we have power to dispose of the objection. But I think it is as feeble an objection as I ever heard stated. A change was made in the name of the firm of which Mr Swan was a partner, and the time had not come for altering the valuation-roll. It is not said that there had been any blunder or delay on the part of the candidate whereby the qualification flew off.

As to the second objection, I concur that we have no jurisdiction to entertain it.

I do not think that we could have a proof of the pursuers' allegations of treating. Bribery would have been a different matter. Here there are no special and definite averments. There is no allegation of any particular person or persons having been treated. The charge is made at random, and is altogether indefinite. If it were seriously alleged that any persons were treated or unlawfully influenced their names ought to have been given.

I think that the Lord Ordinary is right.

LORD MURE.—I concur with your Lordships.

I think the first objection must be treated on its merits. I am satisfied on the averments in the condescendence that this gentleman had the qualifications.

I do not think that the pursuers were entitled to come here for a scrutiny. I therefore concur on this point, and also on the question of treating.

THE COURT adhered.

Clippens Shale Oil Co. v. Scott.

CLIPPENS SHALE OIL COMPANY, Pursuers.—Asher—Young.
JAMES SCOTT, Defender.—D.-F. Watson—Mackintosh.
THOMAS INGLIS SCOTT, Defender.—Lorimer.

Partnership—Summons—Relevancy—Contract—Proof.—Two parties to a written contract of copartnery brought an action against the father of the third party, and the third party, for declarator that the father was a partner, alleging that immediately after the contract was signed they had discovered that the father was really the partner, and that he had been then accepted by them, and had acted as partner. Held that the action was not relevant.

1st DIVISION. Lord Young. B.

IN August 1870 Robert Binning and John Binning formed the Clippens Shale Oil Company, to carry on the business of oil manufacturers at Clippens, in Renfrewshire. On 22d July 1871 they entered into a written contract of copartnery with Thomas Inglis Scott, a minor, about twenty years of age. The minor's father, James Scott, signed the contract along with him as his curator.

In October 1875 an action was raised in name of the company, and of Robert and John Binning, two of the partners, against James Scott and Thomas Inglis Scott, concluding for declarator "that the defender James Scott is at present, and has been since 22d July 1871, a partner along with the pursuers in the business" under the said contract bearing to be between the pursuers and Thomas Inglis Scott. The only conclusion directed against Thomas Inglis Scott was for payment of expenses in the event of his opposition.

The pursuers averred on record, as amended in the Inner-House,—"At the time when the contract was signed the pursuers believed that Thomas Inglis Scott was to be their partner, but immediately thereafter they discovered that, although Thomas Inglis Scott was the ostensible partner of the company, the defender James Scott was really the party who became the partner, and implemented the obligations nominally undertaken by Thomas Inglis Scott. As soon as the contract was entered into Thomas Inglis Scott left for the Continent, and did not enter on the duties which devolved upon him under the contract, or proceed to qualify himself for assuming and taking charge of the works, as he was by the express terms of the contract bound to do. James Scott thereupon at once took up the position of being a partner in lieu of his son, and he was accepted as such by Robert Binning and John Binning, and they, along with him as copartners, have all along carried on the business of the Clippens Shale Oil Company upon the footing (as was the fact) that he was a partner of the company under the contract."

Separate defences were lodged for each defender. Both defenders pleaded that the averments were not relevant to support the conclusions.

The Lord Ordinary sustained this plea, and dismissed the action.

The pursuers reclaimed.

The Court allowed the pursuers to amend the record as quoted above, and after hearing the pursuers' counsel,[1] without calling for a reply, sustained the plea in law stated for the defenders, dismissed the action, and decerned, holding that although the facts alleged by the pursuers might make the defender James Scott liable as a partner to third parties, they could not make him a partner inter socios.

Master and Servant—Reparation.—When a master orders a labourer to do a piece of work, out of the line of his ordinary employment, which could with safety be done only by a skilled workman, the master is responsible should any accident happen to the workman.

1st DIVISION. Sheriff of Stirlingshire. M.

DAVID ROBERTSON, a labourer, raised this action in the Sheriff Court of Stirling against his employer, John Brown, contractor, Kilsyth, for damages for injuries sustained while working in the defender's employment. A proof was led before answer, in which the following facts were proved:—

The defender was contractor for working certain coal and ironstone pits near Kilsyth, including Craigens pit, at which the pursuer was employed. He entered the defender's service as an unskilled labourer in November 1873. His duties were to push and empty hutches, to char iron and break stones. He was twenty-eight years of age and able-bodied, and was receiving a wage of 24s. a-week, but had no experience of any work except that of a labourer, and particularly had no knowledge or experience in machinery. The traffic of the Craigens pit was carried on by means of an incline railway running for about a quarter of a mile down hill from the pit to a junction. The incline was worked by means of an endless wire rope, driven by a stationary steam-engine at the pit, and revolving round a horizontal wheel under the surface at the junction. The horizontal wheel measured 4 feet or thereby in diameter, and was an open wheel with four spokes, and was covered over by a number of iron plates, the plate immediately over the centre being about 24 inches in length by 20 inches in breadth, and from 70 to 80 lbs. in weight, and having a hole, 5 inches square, left for the purpose of oiling the wheel, about the centre. The wheel was usually left constantly revolving by the wire rope in connection with the steam-engine, which was about a quarter of a mile distant, and not visible from the place where the wheel was situated; and on 22d April 1874 there was no system of communication, by bell or otherwise, between that point and the engine-house. On 22d April, the pursuer being at one of the hutches near where the horizontal wheel was revolving underneath the plates above mentioned, was ordered by the defender to fetch a new plate which had been got for the purpose of being put in place of the plate over the centre of the wheel, and to remove the centre plate and substitute the new plate for it. While he was engaged in doing this his foot slipped, and was caught in the revolving wheel, and was so much injured that his leg required to be amputated above the knee.

Robertson v. Brown.

The defender denied liability, and, inter alia, pleaded;—(3) The pursuer having caused or contributed to his own injury, the defender is not responsible therefor.

The Sheriff-substitute (Sconce) found . . . . "(6) That the mere lifting or removal of the plate, although the wheel was revolving, was attended with no real danger or hazard, and was often done, without injury to themselves, by common labourers, like the pursuer, about the works; any risk attending the removal was apparent, and might have been avoided with ordinary care: (7) Finds in law that, in the circumstances foresaid, there was no culpable negligence or gross carelessness, or indeed any negligence or carelessness, in the defender giving the pursuer the order foresaid; and therefore assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns: Finds the defender entitled to expenses; allows an account," &c.

On appeal, the Sheriff (Lee) found . . . . "(8) That the said operation of removing the one plate and substituting another while the wire rope was in motion upon the horizontal wheel was a work of a dangerous character, especially if performed by a common labourer, such as the pursuer was, without assistance or direction; and that the risk attending it was not an ordinary risk incident to the kind of employment in which the pursuer was engaged, and was not apparent to the pursuer; (9) that the defender, in giving the said order, took no steps to have the wheel stopped, and left the pursuer to carry it out without assistance or directions, and without using any precautions against the risk involved in lifting such a weight with the wheel revolving underneath; (10) that the pursuer being unaware of any danger, proceeded, without objection or demur, to carry out said order, fetched the new plate to the place, and began to lift off the old one (the wheel still revolving), and was in the act of lifting it when his right foot having slipped, his leg got entangled in the wheel, whereby the said leg was so much injured that it was necessary to have it amputated at the middle of the thigh; (11) that in consequence of said injury the pursuer was seven weeks in the Glasgow Infirmary, was rendered unfit for any work for a period of twelve months, and was permanently disabled for the kind of work to which he was accustomed; (12) that the defender has failed to prove that the said injury was caused or contributed to by negligence or carelessness on the part of the pursuer; (13) that the said injury was caused by the defender employing the pursuer in a work of the dangerous character aforesaid, and culpably neglecting to take precautions for his safety: And finds in point of law that the defender is liable to the pursuer in damages, assesses the damages at the sum of £100 sterling, and decerns against the defender for payment to the pursuer of the said sum, in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses; allows an account," &c.*

* "NOTE.— . . . . The difference between the Sheriff and the Sheriff-substitute arises upon the facts, and not upon the law. It consists mainly in this,—that the Sheriff considers it proved that the work which the pursuer was ordered on the occasion in question to perform was of a dangerous character; that the risk involved in it was not a risk arising in the ordinary course of the pursuer's employment, and was not apparent to the pursuer, as it was or should have been to the defender; and that the defender was to blame in not taking any precaution to enable the pursuer to do the work in safety.

"If this be a true view of the facts, the Sheriff cannot doubt as to the law applicable to the case. For the defender's allegation of contributory negligence is entirely unsupported by evidence; and his plea that the danger was equally

No. 113.

Robertson v. Brown.

The defender appealed, and argued;—The danger was apparent as much to the pursuer as the defender. The accident happened as much from the carelessness of the pursuer as from the fault of the defender. A master was not responsible for an accident which happened through the carelessness of the workman, or to which the workman contributed. The master had provided all the necessary appliances for doing the work, and it was the servant's duty to look to his own safety.[1]

The pursuer's counsel were not called on.

LORD PRESIDENT.—We are not concerned here with the common case of a workman injured in the course of his ordinary employment. The removal of this plate was no part of the pursuer's ordinary work, and it ought to have occurred to the master that there was very great risk that a man of this class, an ordinary unskilled workman, with boots so constructed that they were very apt to slip in lifting a plate weighing three-quarters of a cwt., might slip, and so become entangled with the engine. This is, therefore, undoubtedly one of those cases where there is a duty on the one side on the part of the master to take precautions to protect his servant against risk, and no duty on the other side on the part of the servant to take any precautions for his own safety. The labourer could not have foreseen the danger in the same way as the master must have foreseen it, and to obviate all risk the master had only to order the engines to be stopped. A person of ordinary sense, with the slightest foresight, would have taken this precaution; and, besides, the servant, even if he had foreseen the danger, as I think he clearly did not, had no power to stop the engine. I think the Sheriff's judgment should be affirmed.

LORD DEAS.—I am of the same opinion. The case belongs to a class of cases in which it is very necessary to distinguish the circumstances carefully. The pursuer, as your Lordship has pointed out, is an unskilled workman. His proper employment was to bring forward hutches from the engine-house to the top of the incline, up and down which they were sent by an endless rope. It was no part of the pursuer's duty to do anything on the incline. Therefore, we are not dealing with a case such as those mentioned in Mr Fraser's book, where an accident happened in the course of the workman's ordinary employment. To order such a man as the pursuer, while the engine was in motion and the hutch was descending, to take off one plate and put on another was, I think, a very dangerous order. It might have been possible for a man of great skill to do it without any harm happening, but it was a very dangerous operation. In order to have had the object safely accomplished manifest to the servant and to the master, and that the pursuer should have refused to obey the order if he had considered the work to be out of the ordinary course of his employment, is entirely displaced if the pursuer has succeeded in making out his case, viz., that he was employed as a common labourer, entirely inexperienced in the dangers of machinery in motion; and that the risk attending the removal of a heavy plate having a revolving wheel of 4 feet diameter immediately underneath was not an ordinary risk occurring in the course of his employment, and was not apparent to him." . . .

all that the master had to do was to have ordered the engine to be stopped. His fault lay in ordering an unskilled man to do this sort of work while the engine was in motion. The more ignorant the workman was the less likely was he to refuse. He was entitled all the more to protection from the master. I think the whole case is distinctly and clearly put by the Sheriff in his note when he says—"The difference between him and the Sheriff-substitute arises upon the facts. It consists mainly in this,—that the Sheriff considers it proved that the work which the pursuer was ordered on the occasion in question to perform was of a dangerous character; that the risk involved in it was not a risk arising in the ordinary course of the pursuer's employment, and was not apparent to the pursuer, as it was or should have been to the defender; and that the defender was to blame in not taking any precaution to enable the pursuer to do the work in safety." I think that is a correct statement, and that the Sheriff has come to a correct conclusion.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The operation which the pursuer was performing was one which might either be safe or dangerous. The question whether it was safe or dangerous depended on whether the machinery was in motion or standing still. It was not necessary for the operation, and it increased greatly the danger, that the machinery should be in motion. The master's failure to give the order to stop the machinery made the operation peculiarly dangerous. I think the Sheriff has rightly decided, and I have nothing further to add.

LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced an interlocutor repeating the findings in the Sheriff's judgment, and refused the appeal, finding the appellant liable in expenses.

EDINBURGH STREET TRAMWAYS COMPANY, Pursuers and Reclaimers.—Macdonald—Balfour—Mansfield.
ALEXANDER TORBAIN, Defender and Respondent.—Kinnear—Harper.

Statute—Edinburgh Street Tramways Acts, 1871 and 1874, 34 and 35 Vict. cap. lxxix., sec. 44, and 37 and 38 Vict. cap. lxviii., sec. 4.—A tramway company was bound by an agreement, embodied in its Act of incorporation, not to charge passengers more than 1d. per mile or fraction of a mile (the minimum charge for each passenger being 2d.) They afterwards obtained an Act by which they were relieved of their obligation to lay certain lines, and were allowed instead to run omnibuses over these routes. This Act allowed them to charge "a sum not exceeding 2d. per mile for first-class passengers on omnibus routes and any tramway routes worked in connection therewith." Held that the second Act did not alter the rates chargeable for tramway passengers who did not use the omnibus routes.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Shand.
I.

THE EDINBURGH STREET TRAMWAYS COMPANY was incorporated by Act of Parliament, 34 and 35 Victoria, cap. lxxxix., which authorised them to construct various lines in Edinburgh and Leith. Section 44 of the Act embodied by reference to schedules, inter alia, an agreement between the promoters of the company and the magistrates of Edinburgh, dated 29th March 1871, which contained the conditions upon which the magistrates, as representing the public, refrained from opposing the company's bill. One of the stipulations inserted in that agreement was, "in no case shall the company demand or take from any passenger travelling upon any or either of the tramways, or any part or parts thereof respectively, tolls or charges exceeding in whole one penny for each mile" (the minimum charge for any distance less than two miles being fixed at 2d.)

The company constructed a great portion of the works authorised by the Act of 1871, but being desirous to abandon certain portions of the lines which they had undertaken to lay, on account of the great expense which would be incurred in working them from the hilly nature of the ground, viz., the lines from Princes Street to Stockbridge and Trinity, they, in 1874,[1] obtained an Act of Parliament entituled "An Act to extend the time for the widening and improvement of the North Bridge by the Corporation of Edinburgh, under an agreement confirmed by the Edinburgh Tramways Acts, 1871, and to authorise the Edinburgh Street Tramways Company to relinquish the construction of certain of their authorised tramways, and for other purposes." By section 4 of this Act it was provided that the company, when called upon by the local authority of Edinburgh, should provide omnibuses on the routes to Stockbridge and Trinity, to be run at the sight of the local authority, and at certain times therein set forth; and it was also enacted that the company might "demand and take, in respect of passengers and parcels carried in or by such omnibuses, such tolls and charges as they think fit, not exceeding the charges which by the Act of 1871 the company are entitled to charge in the event of the construction of the tramways to Stockbridge and Trinity, and the company may charge a sum not exceeding 2d. per mile for first-class passengers on those routes and any tramway routes worked in connection therewith."

These omnibuses were accordingly started by the tramways company, and, as they averred, "run in connection with the various systems of the tramways." The omnibuses on the Stockbridge route started from the General Post Office at the east end of Princes Street, and those on the Trinity route from the Royal Institution, Princes Street.

The tramways company up to 13th December 1874 (the day before they commenced running their omnibuses), charged 2d. for both inside and outside passengers on the section of their lines from Leith to the General Post Office in Edinburgh. On the 14th December, however, in accordance with previous intimation by placards exposed in their cars, they increased the charges for inside passengers on that route from 2d. to 3d. On that day Alexander Torbain travelled inside a car from Leith to the General Post Office, Edinburgh, and was charged 3d. but refused to pay it.

The tramways company then raised an action against Mr Torbain in which they sought to have it declared that in virtue of the provision in section 4 of the Act 37 and 38 Vict. cap. 68, above quoted, they were "entitled to demand and take, in respect of passengers carried in or by the pursuers' cars between Leith and the General Post Office, Edinburgh, and vice versa, a sum not exceeding 2d. per mile for first-class passengers." There was also a conclusion for decree against Torbain for 1d.

Torbain lodged defences, in which he maintained that the increased charges authorised by the 4th section of the Act of 1874 were only intended to be exacted from passengers travelling on the omnibus routes.

Pleaded for the defender;—(1) The pursuers not being entitled, under the foresaid Acts of 1871 and 1874, to charge more than 1d. a mile for first-class passengers travelling between Leith and the General Post Office, Edinburgh, except in the case of passengers travelling also on the omnibus route to Stockbridge or Trinity, they are not entitled to decree of declarator in the terms concluded for. (2) The defender not having travelled on the occasion libelled on the route between Princes Street and Stockbridge, or between Royal Institution and Trinity, the pursuers were not entitled to demand or take from him the increased fare authorised by section 4 of the Act of 1874.

On 18th November 1875 the Lord Ordinary assoilzied the defender, with expenses.*

* "OPINION.—This action has been raised to try the question what sum the pursuers are entitled to charge as a maximum fare to passengers travelling in the tramway cars between Leith and Edinburgh. The pursuers claim right under their statute of last session of Parliament to make a charge of twopence for each mile or part of a mile, while the defender maintains they are not entitled to charge more than one penny a mile or part of a mile. The question is of importance to the pursuers, and to those who are in use to travel by the pursuers' tramway cars; for although the case relates immediately to the route between Edinburgh and Leith, the decision will apparently apply to all the routes on the pursuers' system, excepting only the journey between Stockbridge and Newington.

"The judgment, whether for or against the pursuers, depends on the construction to be given to the words occurring in section 4th of the pursuers' last statute, immediately after mention of the routes to Stockbridge and Trinity,—viz., 'and the company may charge a sum not exceeding twopence per mile for first-class passengers on those routes, and any tramway routes worked in connection therewith.' The pursuers state that all their tramway routes are now worked, as the statute provided they should be, in connection with the routes to Stockbridge and Trinity, for which a service of omnibuses, not tramway cars, is provided; and they maintain that the copulative word 'and' occurring in the sentence 'those routes and any tramway routes worked in connection therewith,' is to be interpretated disjunctively, as having the force of the word 'or,' thus meaning that the company, by force of the statute, may charge a sum of twopence a mile for first-class passengers travelling either on the routes to Stockbridge or Trinity or on any of the tramway routes used in connection with these routes, and practically this includes the whole of the company's system. The defender, while not disputing that the copulative 'and' admits in certain circumstances, and according to the context, of being construed as having the effect disjunctively of the word 'or,' denies that it has this exceptional effect here, and maintains that the power given to the company of charging twopence per mile for what are called first-class passengers is given in the particular case, and limited to the particular case of persons travelling as through passengers partly by omnibus and partly by tramway car on the Stockbridge or Trinity routes, and any tramway route in connection with these.

"I am of opinion that the defender is right in this construction of the statute. The same question was raised in a case before Sheriff Hallard, sitting in the Small Debt Court, and was the subject of a carefully considered judgment by him; and I concur in the reasons given by him for adopting the view of the statute maintained by the defender.

"Before the last Act obtained by the company, it is clear that the highest rate which the pursuers could charge on any part of their extensive system of tramways was 1d. per mile—a fraction of a mile beyond a complete mile being regarded as equivalent to a mile. This rate of charge was not only fixed by the statute giving the company the important concessions they obtained in regard to their occupation and use of the public streets, but was so fixed as having been expressly agreed to in two contracts entered into between them and the magistrates of Edinburgh and Leith respectively. These bodies refrained from opposing the powers asked by the company in respect, inter alia, of the agreement that 'in no case shall the company demand or take from any passenger travelling upon any or either of the tramways, or any part or parts thereof respectively, tolls or charges exceeding in whole one penny for each mile,' or fraction of a mile, as before explained. These agreements were confirmed as part of the Act by section 44th, and the maximum rates chargeable applied to the tramway lines which the company undertook to lay down leading to Stockbridge and Trinity in the same way as to all the other routes.

"During the last session the company applied to Parliament to be relieved of their obligations to lay down these particular lines of tramway, and they obtained an Act giving them that relief, but imposing on them an obligation, on the requisition of the local authority, to keep up a service of omnibuses to be run frequently to and from Stockbridge and Trinity respectively 'in connection with their various systems of tramways.' It is in the clause imposing this obligation that the words occur which have given rise to the question in dispute.

"It is worthy of notice that there is nothing in the preamble of the statute indicative of any intention to give the pursuers power to raise the maximum charges for passengers throughout their system, and thus to abrogate the clauses in the agreements with the magistrates of Edinburgh and Leith respectively, already referred to, and nothing to suggest that any reason existed for allowing the charges to be increased. The providing of omnibuses for the more immediate benefit of two particular districts in lieu of the more serious obligation to lay down lines of tramways which was discharged by the Legislature, does not suggest any good reason for raising the charges to passengers who still continue to use the tramway cars alone, as they did formerly. And in the construction of section 4th of the Act it appears to me to be clear that it is incumbent on the pursuers in these circumstances to shew that the language used unambiguously, and beyond all reasonable doubt, gives them the power they ask. There is the strongest presumption against the repeal by mere implication of the distinct stipulation as to the charges for passengers contained in the agreements already referred to; and the statute, in so far as its language may be described as ambiguous, is to be construed rather against than in favour of the imposition of higher rates of charge, and against rather than in favour of the company who obtained it for their own benefit.

"Turning to the clause itself, the first thing enacted after imposing on the pursuers the obligation to run omnibuses to Stockbridge and Trinity, is, that the company may demand and take, 'in respect of passengers and parcels carried in or by such omnibuses, such tolls and charges as they think fit, not exceeding the charges which by the Act of 1871 the company are entitled to charge in the event of the construction of the tramways to Stockbridge and Trinity.' This clause and the Act of 1871 together fix two things—(1) that the charges for tramway passengers in any part of the whole system shall not exceed 1d. a mile; and (2) that the charges against passengers using the omnibuses alone shall not exceed the same rate. It would be surprising if the very next sentence of the Act undid all this, as the pursuers maintain. The only case which remains unprovided for is that of a through passenger using the combined service of omnibus and car, or car and omnibus, and who may on the whole journey travel a distance not exceeding a mile, and naturally enough the case of through passengers which was now to occur for the first time might be the subject of special enactment. The words are, 'and the company may charge a sum not exceeding 2d. per mile for first-class passengers on those routes, and any tramway routes worked in connection therewith.' The words 'those routes' plainly refer to the routes on which omnibuses are to run, and the provision appears to me to apply, and to apply only, to passengers using those routes in conjunction with the tramway cars. The word 'and' is to be taken in its ordinary sense as used conjunctively. Provision is thus made for rates for through passengers, the only class not already provided for. The reading contended for by the pursuers directly contradicts the words which immediately go before, and practically sense of the 4th section of the Act of 1874, and they were therefore entitled to levy an increased rate upon every portion.

Counsel for the defender were not called upon.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think this a most important case in any view.

The pursuers are the promoters of a certain system of travelling by tramway cars, which run in Edinburgh and its vicinity, and I am far from saying anything against the facilities they afford to the inhabitants.

Before obtaining Parliamentary sanction to the laying down of their rails they entered into an agreement with the municipal authorities of the city, one of the provisions in which, and a most stringent one, was to limit the maximum fares to be charged. It runs as follows:—"In no case shall the company demand or take from any passenger travelling upon any or either of the tramways, or any part or parts thereof respectively, tolls or charges exceeding in requires the substitution of the word 'or' for 'and.' If the section did necessarily involve a contradiction, which on the pursuers' view it does, I should still say I could not give effect to that construction of a contradictory clause which practically destroys the stipulations of the agreements entered into by the pursuers. But there is no such contradiction if the other view, which I hold to be the sound one, be adopted. This view is also borne out by the concluding words of the section, which also deal with through passengers 'by omnibus and car' in the special case of the journey between Stockbridge and Newington.

"It was argued that the reference to 'first-class passengers,' made for the first time, aided the pursuers' construction of the Act, but I do not think there is any force in the argument. The use of the words 'first-class' cannot take away the effect of the previous enactments, that no passengers, either by tramway cars or by omnibus, shall be charged more than 1d. a mile. It is not said that any distinction between a first and second class existed in the use of the tramway cars, —and looking to the place in which the words occur in the statute, referring, as I think they do, to through passengers in the sense I have explained, it appears to me they must have been used with reference to the difference of charges which commonly exist for outside and inside passengers travelling by omnibus, and which the pursuers say did exist in the omnibuses formerly on the Stockbridge and Trinity routes.

"Again it is said there was no use in the Legislature giving a somewhat higher rate as against a through passenger, for the charge would be avoided by the passenger paying separately—first on his journey by car, and afterwards on the remainder of his journey by omnibus. There may be some truth in this observation, though I do not know how the matter may work where the car rate and the omnibus route each embrace a fraction of a mile. But, however this may be, it cannot affect the construction of the Act. If the company really intended to obtain the very important change on their power of charging for the use of their cars, of which they now claim the benefit, and the Legislature meant to give this, it could only be done by distinct and precise language to that effect, and there certainly is not such language in this statute.

"Considerable doubt occurred to me as to the jurisdiction of this Court to entertain the action, which contains a pecuniary conclusion for one penny, and all the more that the parties have been unable to refer to any reported case of the kind. But the action really is one of declarator to have an important question of legal right tried, and such actions are competent only in this Court. It plainly involves an issue of large pecuniary interest to the pursuers, and, it may be, also to the defender. In its substance it truly involves a question between the company and the public, which might properly have been directed against a number of defenders in use to travel by the company's cars, but which may be conveniently tried in a case against one; and such questions—as, for instance, in regard to rights of way and the like—are proper subjects of trial and decision in this Court."

May 18, 1876. Edinburgh Street Tramways Co. v. Torbain.

whole one penny for each mile." That was a part of the agreement ratified by the original statute, and scheduled in the Act, and is one of the inherent conditions on which the company's very great privileges were sanctioned. It seems that three years afterwards the company desired to be relieved from the obligation to make lines to Stockbridge and Trinity, imposed on them in the original Act. An Act was passed for this purpose, the main provisions being to extend the time for the widening and improvement of the North Bridge by the corporation of Edinburgh, and to authorise the tramways company to relinquish the construction of the Stockbridge and Trinity lines, which were only a portion of their system. Such is the title of the Act; but neither in the title nor in the Act itself is there a single word which directly or expressly relates to the general powers of charging fares, or the general obligation to carry the public at the specified rate. No one could have discovered, from either the object or the words of the statute, that the promoters had any intention of obtaining power to increase their general rates. The 4th section applies to an entirely different subject, namely, the conditions on which the company were to be relieved of their obligation to make the tramway to Stockbridge and Trinity. It deals with no other topic, and its provisions must be read in relation to that matter. So far is the statute from appearing to deal with the general powers of the former statute, that the 8th section specially provides that, "saving as in this Act is expressly provided, nothing in this Act shall prejudice or affect the three several agreements scheduled to the Act of 1871, but these agreements, subject to the provisions of the Act of 1871 and this Act, shall remain in full force and effect."

Now, the 4th section, which relates to the terms on which the company are to be liberated, provides that they shall substitute an omnibus service for tramways for these two routes; and in regard to this omnibus service it is provided that the company were, on the requisition of the town-council, to supply omnibuses on both routes, and the local authority of Edinburgh were, to some extent, to be judges of the sufficiency of the supply; and then come the words, "and the company may charge a sum not exceeding 2d. a mile for first-class passengers on those routes, and any tramway routes worked in connection therewith." We are told that the tramways company, when they went to Parliament to get these powers, intended to get leave to double the fares over their whole system for what they call first-class, that is, inside passengers, and that the town-council and the Legislature meant that also. This proposition, I can only say, seems to me a most audacious one.

I am inclined to think the words mean that the company were to be entitled to charge 2d. per mile for first-class passengers by their omnibuses, even although a piece of the tramway lines was included in any one mile. We do not, however, need to lay down what the precise case is to which these words will apply. The question before us is whether the defender, who has made no use of any portion of the omnibus service, nor of any part of the line directly in connection therewith, is to be charged extra fare when using other parts of the company's lines. I am clearly of opinion that no one who does not use the omnibus service is bound to pay more than the old rate. If the real intention of the words founded on was to give the company leave to increase the fares all over their system, it ought to have been, and it would have been, expressly stated. I am of opinion that no legal construction of these words will support the pursuers' contention.

I am for adhering substantially to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

No. 114.
May 18, 1876.
Edinburgh Street Tramways Co. v. Torbain.

LORD NEAVES.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with your Lordship in thinking that the question raised is one of importance with respect to the rights of parties, and as to the mode in which such Acts of Parliament are to be construed.

The primary object of this Act of 1874 was to liberate the tramways company from the obligation to make lines to Stockbridge and Trinity, and instead of these to substitute omnibuses to run to these places for the convenience of the inhabitants, at "such tolls and charges as they think fit, not exceeding the charges which by the Act of 1871 the company are entitled to charge in the event of the construction of the tramways to Stockbridge and Trinity, and the company may charge a sum not exceeding 2d. per mile for first-class passengers on those routes, and any tramway routes worked in connection therewith." It is not an immaterial circumstance that this mention of first-class passengers is accompanied with no explanation; but we all know that first-class passengers do generally exist in omnibuses, and the mention of first-class passengers, assuming them as an existing class of passengers, is solely applicable to omnibuses, as there are no first-class passengers in connection with tramway cars. It is now said that the right to lay an additional tax upon tramway passengers was purchased by the undertaking to supply omnibuses on the Stockbridge and Trinity routes. But what is the fair construction of this clause? I think the 2d. is to be a tax on those persons who get the direct benefit of the omnibus routes. To say that those passengers who come from Leith, having no earthly connection with the omnibuses, are to be taxed double, is highly improbable. Is it likely that in order to enable the tramway company to get rid of their original obligation they are to be allowed to tax all passengers using their lines—even those having no connection with the omnibuses—double what they had a right to under their original Act? If that was intended it could easily have been clearly expressed. But the words used are ambiguous at the best,—not, it is true, as I read them, but still they may be said to be ambiguous. It is most improbable that the Leith people were intended to be taxed double. The natural interpretation of the words is that only those who make joint use of both omnibuses and cars are to be so charged.

The public are under no obligation, either natural or legal, when they take no advantage or use of the omnibuses, to pay part of the expense of these omnibuses. That would be a violent supposition, and it is strongly negatived by the clause of the Act quoted by your Lordship in the chair.

Whether, in their anxiety to snatch what they were not entitled to, they let go what they might have got, I have no sympathy with the tramway company, for they ought to have expressed their object and privileges clearly, if they meant the Legislature and the public to understand them in the sense for which they now contend.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I have come to the same conclusion. It must be kept in view that we are dealing with a statutory contract between the tramways company and the public—a contract whereby the company, in consideration of a relief from some burden previously incumbent on them, undertakes certain obligations in favour of the public. The company applied to Parliament for the Act necessary to accomplish these objects, and they alone were the promoters of the measure, for their own benefit and purposes. Any ambiguity, therefore, in the terms of the Act, must be attributable to themselves. Keeping this in view, the question arises, what is the meaning of that part of the Act which provides that "the company may charge a sum not exceeding 2d. per mile for first-class passengers on those routes" (the omnibus routes), "and any tramway routes worked in connection therewith?" There may be some ambiguity in that provision. It might be argued, as it was, that it meant that the company are entitled to make the charge referred to either on the separate routes, or only on both in combination. But when we keep in view the circumstances in which the Act was obtained, and the change intended to be effected on the previous state of matters as between them and the public, all of which have been sufficiently gone into by both your Lordships, I cannot entertain any doubt as to what was meant, viz. that the charge of 2d. was only to apply to through passengers by tramway and omnibus in combination, as explained by the Lord Ordinary in his opinion.

May 18, 1876.

That difficulty may be experienced by the company in working their undertaking in conformity with this view is not unlikely, and they possibly may have difficulty in exacting in every instance their just charges, and preventing evasion; but if this should happen the company must blame themselves in not providing against it by better expressed clauses in their Act.

On the whole, I have no serious difficulty in concurring with your Lordships and the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Gifford.—The only conclusion for declarator in this case, and the only conclusion which we are asked to affirm, relates solely to the tramway route between Edinburgh and Leith. The conclusion is that "the pursuers are entitled to demand and take, in respect of passengers carried in or by the pursuers' cars between Leith and the General Post Office, Edinburgh, and vice versa, a sum not exceeding 2d. per mile for first-class passengers." There is no reference here to omnibuses, and no mention of other parts of the tramway line. The Court is asked absolutely to declare that the tramways company are entitled to charge at the rate of 2d. per mile for first-class passengers on their line between Edinburgh and Leith. If the tramways company are right in this demand, it must equally apply to all the other parts of their tramway system, and the result would be that over the whole tramway system first-class passengers will be charged 2d. a mile or each fraction of a mile, and that although they do not use, and do not require to use, the omnibuses at all. Now, I find myself quite unable to affirm this right, for I think it is directly in the teeth of the pursuers' first statute, and of the solemn statutory agreement which is part thereof. By that agreement, confirmed by statute, it is expressly provided that the company shall "in no case" take "tolls or charges exceeding in whole one penny for each mile." The pursuers are bound to shew that that provision is no longer in existence. They must satisfy the Court that this provision is repealed. They have, I think, failed in so doing. They say that it is superseded by the statute of 1874, and so that instead of the original maximum fare of 1d. per mile, the maximum fare all over the system is now double, that is, 2d. per mile. I cannot possibly so read the statute of 1874. That statute was passed to relieve the company of very onerous obligations to lay tramway lines to Stockbridge and Trinity, which are very steep routes, and would have been very expensive to work, and the chief purpose of the statute was to allow the company, instead of tramway lines and tramway cars, to put on omnibuses upon these routes if they should be required to do so. There is no trace of any intention to get a general revision of the fares, far less to obtain leave to charge exactly double the fares for the same conveniences as they supplied before. The statute of 1874 goes no farther than that they may charge 2d. for first-class passengers in the omnibuses to Stockbridge and Trinity. No doubt it is provided in certain cases that they may charge 2d. per mile on the omnibus routes, "and any tramway routes worked in connection therewith," and this may possibly warrant a charge of 2d. a mile for first-class through passengers using the omnibuses. It can go no farther than this. But the company take the general ground that all their routes are in connection with these omnibus routes, and that therefore they are entitled to raise their fares over all their lines, even over parts of the tramway most distant from the omnibus routes, and to all passengers, even those who never use or require to use the omnibuses. This contention is quite inadmissible. If this had been intended, it would have required an express enactment revoking or repealing the previous statutory provision, and instead thereof doubling the fares. The public would have very great reason to complain if by mere implication the company were entitled to raise their fares all over their lines. I am therefore very clearly of opinion that whatever may be the case with passengers using the omnibus routes, all other passengers, that is, all passengers using merely the tramway, or any part thereof, are entitled to do so, and are liable only in the fare of 1d. per mile or fraction of a mile, whether they travel inside or outside the tramway cars, and therefore I am for affirming the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

May 18, 1876.

Edinburgh Street Tramways Co. v. Torbain.

1ST DIVISION. M.

ON 18th December 1860 the Lord Provost and Magistrates of the city of Edinburgh granted a feu-charter of certain subjects in favour of the late Humphrey Graham, W.S., who completed his title.

On 13th May 1871 Mr Graham, by disposition with alternative holding, conveyed part of the subjects to Misses S. S., A. R., and H. M. Whitehead, who recorded the disposition in the Register of Sasines for the county of Edinburgh on 15th May 1871.

By the operation of sec. 4 of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. c. 94), the disponees became duly entered vassals of the city. Subsequently, on the death of Mr Graham, a casualty became due to the superiors, and the vassals were called upon by the town-clerk to produce their disposition with a view to the settlement of the composition.

The town-clerk, without the consent of the vassals, copied the disposition into the city chartulary, and claimed for behoof of the city the fees in use to be paid for recording charters in the city chartulary.

The present special case was presented by the town-clerk and the superiors, first parties, and by the Misses Whitehead, second parties, for the purpose of having the question determined for the guidance of the first parties in similar cases.

The special case set forth that the town-clerk was paid by salary, and was accountable to the corporation for the fees. That prior to the alterations in the forms of conveyancing incorporated in the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, it was the practice of superiors, in granting charters or other writs renewing the vassal's rights, to record every such charter or grant in the superior's chartulary, and to charge the expense of recording to the vassal. The charters granted to vassals of the city of Edinburgh were recorded in the chartulary of the city, and the costs of recording were charged by the city clerks to the vassals in accordance with the professional rule above referred to. It was admitted that the town-clerk's fees for so recording charters by progress formed a good charge against the vassals.

After the passing of the Titles to Land Act, 1858 (21 and 22 Vict. cap. 76), now incorporated in the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868, by which abridged forms of entry, termed writs of confirmation, resignation, &c., were allowed to be substituted for charters of the like denomination, it was the practice of superiors to record the writs so granted, together with the disposition or other deed upon which the writ was indorsed, in their chartularies, and to charge the expense of recording such deed and indorsed writ in their account with the agent for the vassal. The practice was continued until the abolition of charters and writs by progress, and was followed, as matter of professional rule, by the first party, Mr Skinner, and his predecessor in office. Further, the table of fees of the Society of Writers to the Signet applicable to transactions prior to 1st January 1875 contained, under the heading of "charters and writs by progress, and precepts, and writs of clare constat," a charge payable by the vassal for "engrossing in chartulary, both the charter or writ, and such part of the deed on which it is written as is necessary;" while the revised table applicable to transactions entered into on or after that date contains, under the heading "charters of novodamus, and precepts, and writs of clare constat," a charge payable by the vassal for "engrossings in chartulary."

The following question was submitted:—"Have the first parties, or either of them, a legal right to record the disposition constituting the second parties' title, in the chartulary of the city of Edinburgh, at the expense of the second parties, on the occasion of a casualty being exigible from the second parties?"

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—There can be no doubt that before the recent changes in the law it was the practice of superiors when they granted charters, or any other writs renewing their vassals' rights, to record the writ in their chartularies, and to charge the expense of recording against the vassal, and it was the practice of the vassal to submit to the charge. This had grown up to be a common law right which no one disputed. Through the changes which arose in 1858 a difficulty arose, because writs, which were shorter than charters and were engrossed on the disposition instead of being separate deeds, were substituted for charters. The writ of the superior thus came to be not a separate writing, but was engrossed on the disposition. The practice was then modified so far that the superior's agent entered in the chartulary the writ with so much of the conveyance as was necessary to make the rights of the superior appear on the chartulary, and the practice of charging the vassal with the expense continued. But now, by the statute of 1874, a still more radical change has been introduced, and there is now no such thing as an express entry by progress. When a feu is conveyed, the conveyance, by being recorded, operates an entry with the superior under the 2d sub-section of section 4 of the Act of 1874. There is not even a necessity to intimate what has been done. If no intimation is made the original feuar is liable, but there is no obligation to make the intimation. The entry is made by the completion of the conveyance and the recording in the Register of Sasines. The superior's rights might have been prejudiced by this provision if there had not been introduced another provision. The 3d sub-section provides that "such implied entry shall not prejudice or affect the right or title of any superior to any casualties, feu-duties, or arrears of feu-duties which may be due or exigible in respect of the lands at or prior to the date of such entry; and all rights and remedies competent to a superior under the existing law and practice, or under the conditions of any feu-right, for recovering, securing, and making effectual such casualties, feu-duties, and arrears, or for irritating the feu ob non solutum canonem, and all the obligations and conditions in the feu-rights prestable to or exigible by the superior, in so far as the same may not have ceased to be operative in consequence of the provisions of this Act or otherwise, shall continue to be available to such superior in time coming; but provided always, that such implied entry shall not entitle any superior to demand any casualty sooner than he could by the law prior to this Act, or by the conditions of the feu-right, have required the vassal to enter, or to pay such casualty irrespective of his entering." Now, I think the effect of the 3d sub-section is to leave the rights of the superior and vassal precisely as they stood before the statute. The superior is entitled to enforce all the provisions except in so far as they are interfered with by the statute. He has all the common law remedies to enforce payment of his feu-duties. He is not to be entitled to any casualty to which he was not entitled before, or at any other time.

It is quite clear that the superior was not entitled to a casualty when the sale to the second parties took place. Humphrey Graham, who was entered in 1860, was the last entered vassal, and was then alive, and he died some time after May 1871. It was only on his death that the casualty became due. The effect of the entry operated by recording the disposition by Graham was to leave the superior and the vassal exactly in the same position as they would have been in under the old law, except that the superior could not require the vassal to come to him and take out an entry. When the superior and vassal come together, which they do not do until a casualty becomes payable, the question comes to be whether the superior is entitled to say to the vassal "you must allow me to record your conveyance from the former vassal in order that I may see what your title is, and as that comes in place of a charter I must be entitled to charge you the expenses of recording it." Now, it appears to me that, in the first place, the disposition is not to any effect the deed of the superior. The superior is not bound by that deed, and I do not think that though he has taken payment of a casualty under the deed he would be bound by anything inconsistent with the feu-right. Therefore I do not see the interest of the superior in the deed. It is not the deed of the superior at all, and I do not see that he has any right or interest to retain a copy. The statute requires that the rights of the superior and vassal shall be regulated by the original grant, and that transmissions shall not affect them.

No. 115. May 18, 1876. Magistrates of Edinburgh v. Whitehead, &c.

The superior has therefore, as I have said, no right or interest to require that this disposition should be recorded in his chartulary, still less to require that it shall be done at the vassal's expense.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find and declare that the first parties have no legal right to record the disposition constituting the second parties' title in the chartulary of the city of Edinburgh at the expense of the second parties on the occasion of a casualty being exigible from the second parties, and decern."

No. 116. May 19, 1876. Cadzow v. Lockhart.

WILLIAM CADZOW, Pursuer.—Fraser—Balfour—Mackintosh.
SIR SIMON MACDONALD LOCKHART, Bart., Defender.—Adam—Mackay.

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Reparation—Damages—Game—Rabbits.—The lease of a farm reserved to the landlord the whole game and rabbits, and bound the tenant to preserve the game of all kinds, including rabbits, "to the utmost of his power." It also contained a stipulation that "the tenant shall have no claim whatever for any damage he may sustain from game, hares, and rabbits during the lease, this being held to have been calculated upon and allowed for by him in offering for the farm." In an action of damages by the tenant for injury alleged to have been done to his crops by an excessive increase of rabbits, held (diss. Lord Ardmillan) (1) that the tenant's claim was not excluded by the clause in the lease above quoted; but (2) that, having regard to the terms of the lease, the tenant had not proved such an increase of rabbits as to entitle him to damages.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Shand. B.

(SEE ante, vol. ii. p. 928.)

William Cadzow was tenant of the farms of East Nemphlar and West Nemphlar, of which Sir Simon Macdonald Lockhart was proprietor, having succeeded to his brother, Sir Norman Lockhart, in May 1870.

In 1857 Mr Cadzow entered upon a nineteen years' lease of East Nemphlar, which consisted of from fifty to fifty-two Scotch acres, at the rent of £155. In 1862 he entered into a lease of seventeen years of the farm of West Nemphlar, consisting of eighteen Scotch acres, at the rent of £54. The clauses in the two leases with regard to game were almost identical. The clause in the lease of West Nemphlar was,—"Reserving also to the proprietor and his foresaids the sole right to the whole game, including hares and rabbits, of every kind, and to all the fish in the rivers and burns within the lands hereby let, with full power to himself and to those having his permission to hunt, shoot, or fish and sport on the farm, without liability in damages; and the tenant shall be bound to preserve the game of all kinds, including hares and rabbits, to the utmost of his power, to interrupt poachers and unqualified persons, and to give information of them to the proprietor and his foresaids, or those acting for him or them; and it is hereby expressly declared and agreed that the tenant shall have no claim whatever for any damage he may sustain from game, hares, and rabbits during the lease, this being held to have been calculated upon and allowed for by him in offering for the farm."

Mr Cadzow brought this action against Sir Simon M. Lockhart, concluding for £600 of damages. He averred (Cond. 5),—"The said two farms of East Nemphlar and West Nemphlar are adjacent to each other, and extend for a considerable distance along the river Clyde. They are not, however, bounded by the river, there being interposed between them and the river a strip of ground belonging to and in the natural possession of the defender, and covered with copse and brushwood. The said strip of ground has belonged to the defender and his predecessors and has been in their actual possession since before the pursuer's entry to his said farms." (Cond. 6) "At the dates of the leases foresaid there were few or no rabbits on the said farms or in the said strip of ground mentioned in the last article. For a number of years back, however, and, in particular, since the succession of the present defender in the year 1870, the said strip of ground has been turned into a rabbit preserve; and, in consequence, the pursuer's farm has been so infested with rabbits as to make the profitable occupation of his land impossible. The stock of rabbits in said strip of ground and in the pursuer's farms has been unduly and unreasonably increased year by year by the defender's predecessor and by the defender; and the said increase has been permitted and fostered for purposes of profit, the proprietor having for many years derived, and still deriving, a large annual revenue from the rabbits on his estate, and in particular from the rabbits on and adjacent to the pursuer's farms." (Cond. 7) "From the date of the defender's succession to the present time the pursuer has suffered loss, injury, and damage from the foresaid undue increase of rabbits on his said farms to the extent of not less than £120 per annum, or in all £600, as concluded for in the summons."

The defender denied that he had allowed the rabbits to increase for the purposes of profit. He alleged that they had been trapped in the ordinary way.

He pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The defender is entitled to be assoilzied, in respect that all claims of damages are excluded by the pursuer's leases.

A proof before answer was allowed.

The views of the facts taken by the Lord Ordinary and by the Court respectively sufficiently appear from the opinions.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that by the leases under which the pursuer holds his farms there was reserved to the proprietor the sole right to the whole game, including hares and rabbits, within the lands thereby let, with full power to himself, and those having his permission, to hunt, shoot, and sport on the farms 'without liability in damages,' and the pursuer became bound to preserve the game of all kinds, including hares and rabbits, to the utmost of his power, and that it was thereby 'expressly declared and agreed that the tenant shall have no claim whatever for any damage he may sustain through game, hares, and rabbits during the lease, this being held to have been calculated upon and allowed for by him in offering for the farm:' Finds it proved that during the years from 1870 to 1874, both inclusive, there was a great increase of rabbits on the pursuer's farms beyond the number which had formerly existed, or might reasonably have been expected, assuming that ordinary measures for keeping down the rabbits had been adopted: Finds that this increase arose in consequence of the failure of the defender, the landlord, by shooting, trapping, or otherwise, to keep down the number, and that the pursuer's crops suffered considerable damage in consequence; but finds that the pursuer is not entitled to payment of the sum claimed, or any part thereof, on account of damage so caused, in respect of the stipulations contained in his leases above set forth, and especially of the stipulation that he should have no claim whatever for any damage he might sustain from rabbits during the lease; assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds him entitled to expenses, and remits," &c.*

* "NOTE.—. . . . . At the debate at the close of the proof the defender renewed the discussion which had taken place in the procedure roll, when a proof was ordered, founded on his second plea, to the effect that all claims of damages for injury done by rabbits to the pursuer's crops are excluded by the terms of the leases; and with the facts now fully disclosed in the evidence I have come to the conclusion that this plea is well founded. When the argument was originally maintained, before any proof had been allowed, it appeared to me that the legal question involved could not be satisfactorily disposed of on the pursuer's averments as contained in the record. The terms of article 6th of the condescendence seemed to make it necessary that evidence should be allowed; for the statement there made is that the defender from 1870 onwards had made use of a strip of property belonging to him, adjoining the pursuer's farms, and which did not appear to be connected with them, in a manner which the pursuer could not have anticipated when he entered into his leases, by having turned this ground into a rabbit preserve, in which he had gradually increased the stock of rabbits by carefully fostering them for purposes of profit. If this averment were proved it appeared to me a special case might be established to which the clause excluding claims of damage would not, or at least might not, apply. I do not think, however, that a case of this special character has been established.

"Without going in detail into the evidence, which has been adduced at considerable length, I may shortly state what appears to me to be its result.

"1. It has not been established that a rabbit preserve or warren was created by the defender on his property adjoining the pursuer's farms, nor that during the period for which damages are claimed rabbits were designedly preserved and fostered by the defender on the pursuer's farms, or the plantations within them, or which formed the boundaries, with the view of making profit.

"2. On the other hand, I think it is equally clear that, owing to neglect on the part of the defender's servants, viz. his gamekeepers and trappers, or from the insufficient number of these servants at times when trapping was required, there was during at least the four years from 1870 to 1874, both inclusive, a great increase of rabbits, and that a serious amount of damage consequently resulted to the pursuer's crops. . . . The extent of the increase, and consequent injury to the pursuer's crops, has been proved to have been in my opinion much beyond what the pursuer could reasonably have contemplated when he entered on the farms; and, indeed, the injury has been so great during several years as to render it impossible for the pursuer to pay the stipulated rent from the produce of the farms. If I were of opinion that the pursuer was entitled, under his leases, to damages for the injury to his crops arising from an excessive increase of the stock of rabbits beyond the stock on the farms when he entered into possession, and the number which might naturally be expected to arise from the plantations or the farms, assuming that fair and ordinary measures were taken to keep them down, I should hold that the pursuer had made out a claim for the years from 1870 to 1873 inclusive, and would have estimated the damage for each of these years at from £50 to £60, which, it will be observed, is about a fourth of each year's rent. By the year 1874 such measures had been taken to reduce the numbers that I am not prepared to say there was then an excessive stock in the sense now explained. . . . The amount of damage, as estimated by the pursuer and his witnesses, is excessive in any view, because it has been stated on the principle of including the whole damage, without allowing for any stock of rabbits on the ground. But allowing for such a number as might naturally be expected, assuming ordinary measures to have been used to keep them down, deducting from the estimates of the witnesses a certain amount for exaggeration, and disallowing the greater part of the damage claimed on account of injury to pasture as not being satisfactorily proved, there remains the sum of between £50 and £60 per annum already mentioned, to which, if the

Cadzow v. Lockhart.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The clause of the lease meant that a calculation of the existing stock of rabbits had been made at the pursuer were right in his view of the law, I should hold he was entitled for four years. There is a conflict of evidence as to the complaints and notice of claims given by the tenant to Mr M'Lean, the defender's factor, and the proof is certainly not so satisfactory on this subject as could be desired. At the same time, I think as a whole it shews that several complaints were made, in writing as well as verbally, from time to time, accompanied by claims for abatement of rent. . . .

"I am, however, of opinion that all claims of damage at the pursuer's instance, on account of injury which might be caused to his crops from any increase of rabbits, arising from the defender's failure to keep down the stock on the lands and adjoining plantations, were excluded by the terms of the leases. In no case which has hitherto occurred for decision have claims of damage been the subject of a clause so stringent in its nature against the tenant as the present. In the case of Morton v. Graham, 30th November 1869, 6 Macph. 71, the lease reserved to the landlord all game and rabbits, with the exclusive liberty of shooting and sporting, 'without being liable to compensate the tenant in respect of the reservation and liberty herein expressed.' And it was remarked by the Court that the clause was one of the most stringent against the tenant that had occurred. In the present case the clause is fuller in expression, and contains stipulations more clearly excluding claims than were found in the lease in the case of Morton. It is in the following terms:—'Reserving,' &c. (quoted p. 666).

"There is thus (1) a reservation to the landlord of the rabbits, with power to himself and those having his permission, to shoot and sport on the farm without liability in damages. (2) An obligation on the tenant to preserve rabbits to the utmost of his power, and to prevent poaching on the lands. (3) There is nothing in the clause which can be read as imposing on the landlord, either expressly or by implication, an obligation to keep down the rabbits, so as to prevent an excessive increase in their numbers; and lastly, it is agreed 'that the tenant shall have no claim whatever for any damage he may sustain from rabbits during the lease, this being held to have been calculated upon and allowed for by him in offering for the farm.' The question for decision is one of construction of this clause, and it appears to me that, giving to the language used the ordinary effect which it must receive, the result is that the tenant agrees to leave himself entirely in the hands of the landlord so far as regards the keeping down of hares and rabbits. The damage which might result from game or rabbits was plainly in the view of the parties, and was the subject of a careful and distinct provision. The tenant agreed that he should have no claim whatever for such damage. He now asks that this provision should be read as if it were of a limited kind, excluding claims of damage generally, but not such claims as might arise from an excessive stock of game or rabbits being allowed to grow up, either from active measures on the part of the landlord, or the landlord's failure to keep down the burden. I see no room for this construction in the language which the parties have used. If such a limitation had been intended it would have been expressed by some words controlling the effect of the general terms employed. In the absence of such words it is not for the Court, in construing the clause, to add a limitation which the parties have not themselves made. Both parties found on the concluding words of the clause,—'this being held to have been calculated and allowed for by him in offering for the farm,'—as being in favour of their respective views. Taking the clause as a whole, I think the relative 'this,' with which this part of the clause begins, must be read as referring to any damage which the tenant might sustain, and that such damage, whatever might be its amount, was a matter on which he calculated, and for which he allowed in offering for the farm; at least he agrees that this shall be accepted as the footing on which he entered into the lease, however far this may be from the fact, for it appears that the farms were let at their full value as agricultural subjects. It was maintained on his behalf that this expression must be taken to refer to a calculation and allowance for damage from commencement of the lease, and that that was intended to be the amount of damage to which the tenant was bound to submit. He was not bound to submit to his crops being so injured that he could not pay his rent. The landlord having reserved the game, &c., was bound to keep the rabbits down to a reasonable amount.[1] The tenant was prevented from killing a certain quantity of game and rabbits, roughly estimated with reference to the stock on the lands at the time of entry, and to what could fairly be expected to arise from the plantations on the farms, assuming that ordinary measures had been used to keep the stock down, and that claims of damage by game and rabbits in excess of this were left open. I cannot, however, adopt this view; the words 'calculated upon and allowed for' appear to me to refer to damage not from a certain limited quantity of game and rabbits so roughly estimated, but to any damage which might occur,—the effect of the clause practically being that the tenant took his risk of the landlord keeping down the game and rabbits within reasonable bounds, and calculated on the damage he might suffer, running that risk, which he may have thought very small.

No. 116. May 19, 1876. Cadzow v. Lockhart.

The pursuer strongly argued that it could not be readily supposed that a tenant would enter into a lease which left him so much at the mercy of the landlord, and that the Court should control or construe the expressions in the lease, so as to give to them the effect only of excluding claims of damage other than those arising from an excessive stock of game. It appears to me, however, that the terms used do not admit of this construction, and I come to that conclusion, although I think at the same time that the clause gives expression to an arrangement which I should characterise as extremely improvident on the part of the tenant. It may be assumed that the pursuer thought he might trust that the landlord would not exact his full rent, and at the same time, either of design or from neglect, keep up such a stock of rabbits as would so seriously injure the crops as to render it impossible that the rent could be paid from the produce of the farms; but that being the agreement, the pursuer is left with an appeal to his landlord only. The Court has no power to modify the terms of the agreement, and the pursuer cannot maintain a right to damages of a kind for which his lease provides he shall have no claim whatever. The case in its general aspect is not unlike that of Buchanan and Henderson and Dimmack v. Andrew, decided in the House of Lords on 10th March 1873, Law Reports, volume ii., Scotch Appeals, p. 286, in which the respondent in the appeal, on the ground that his house would be thrown down by the operations of the mineral owner and his tenant, endeavoured to stop their operations. His feu-contract contained an obligation to erect and maintain a house of some value, and of a specified character, but at the same time authorised the mineral owner to work out the minerals, 'and that free of all or any damage which may be thereby occasioned to the feuar.' The House of Lords, reversing the decision of this Court, held that the operations could not be prevented even though they should result in the house being brought down, and the opinions distinctly affirmed that the feuar had no claim of damages for injury which might arise from the removal of the minerals. All of the Judges expressed the view that the agreement to which the pursuer had been a party was improvident, but the question being one of construction, they were of opinion that the general words used gave the power which the mineral owner asserted, and that all claims of damage were renounced by the feuar. So, in this case, I think the lease gave the power of preserving game and rabbits, which the landlord asserted and used, and that the tenant renounced all claims of damage which might arise to him from the exercise of this right. . . ."

the rabbits, and so it was the duty of the landlord to keep them down. The evidence shewed that here there was a culpable neglect of the landlord in refraining from keeping down the rabbits.

The defender argued;—The landlord had done all in his power to keep down the rabbits. The lease excluded all damages for injury by game or rabbits except to an extent which would imply a fraud on the landlord's part. The tenant should have calculated on the rabbits injuring his crops when he entered upon the lease. He was taken bound to preserve the rabbits, and ought to have known that the result of his preserving them would be that they would increase and injure his crops. His having been mistaken in the amount of injury they would do was no ground for finding the landlord liable in damages.

LORD PRESIDENT.—Before we come to consider the facts of this case it is desirable to have a distinct understanding of the clause in the leases upon which the defender relies. It is substantially the same in the two leases, but I quote from that which applies to West Nemphlar. In the first place, there is a reservation "to the proprietor and his foresaids of the sole right to the whole game, including hares and rabbits, of every kind, . . . with full power to himself and to those having his permission to hunt, shoot, &c., without liability in damages." In the second place, there is an obligation on the tenant "to preserve the game of all kinds, including hares and rabbits, to the utmost of his power." And in the third place, there is this express declaration and agreement, "that the tenant shall have no claim whatever for any damage he may sustain from game, hares, and rabbits, during the lease, this being held to have been calculated upon and allowed for by him in offering for the farm."

The reservation to the proprietor is of the entire game of every description, including rabbits, and it is made on the face of it for the purpose of sport. In the second place, the obligation on the tenant to preserve is strongly expressed, and I need hardly say that that necessarily implies that the landlord is to co-operate with the tenant in promoting the strict preservation of the game during the currency of the lease. And then follows the clause which is specially important here, and which is undoubtedly a very stringent, and not a very usual one. The game is to be so preserved that it is perfectly obvious that damage to some extent will ensue. It was impossible that the game should be preserved as contemplated without some damage resulting to the crops, and so the question comes to be, whether it was within the contract of parties that there should be no claim for reparation however great the injury.

It was argued that the clause in the leases seemed to shew that a calculation had been made as between the landlord and tenant as to what the damage was to be, and so, in so far as the damage had not been calculated on, it was claimed here. That was an ingenious suggestion, but it is not within the terms of this clause. According to these, the tenant is to have no claim for any damage, and they are quite unqualified. The words which follow are not restrictive of the first part, but are only superadded to shew how completely the stipulation was carried out. That was not by making a calculation by pounds, shillings, and pence, of how much damage was to be suffered, but it simply meant this, that the damage had been taken into consideration, and had been given effect to when the lease was entered into. Now, it would be very difficult, in the face of a clause of this kind, for the tenant of this farm to maintain a claim under anything like ordinary circumstances. If there were an increase of rabbits beyond the quantity on the farm at the commencement of the lease that would not be sufficient ground for getting the better of this clause, the tenant having obviously calculated upon the damage in such a case.

No. 116.

Cadzow v. Lockhart.

But, on the other hand, I can quite understand that damage may have been sustained by the tenant to such an extent that a claim for reparation would not be barred. If, for instance, the landlord had deliberately proceeded to convert the farm, or a part of it, into a rabbit warren, so as to make the land barren altogether, and to leave no green thing remaining, I cannot have any doubt that the tenant would have then had a remedy. I go further than that, because I think that if the landlord systematically, and not by mere oversight and partial neglect, had omitted the ordinary precaution necessary for keeping down vermin, it would be difficult to say that a tenant, after warning him of it and bringing it under his notice, would not have a claim against him. Mere inaction in the case of rabbits is a most dangerous principle on which to proceed; they are a class of animals, as everybody knows, of a very fecund nature, and, in the absence of repressive measures, increase at a most rapid rate. If a case of that kind were to occur, where the landlord had permitted the rabbits to multiply without check, the claim of the tenant would not be barred, nor would the landlord be protected by such a clause as this.

What is the case before us? As it stands on record it might have got the better of the clause in the lease. If the averments made in the 6th article of the pursuer's condescendence (quoted supra) had been established, I should have given judgment in favour of the pursuer, but when I come to look at the evidence I cannot find that the facts amount to anything like the allegations there made. The case made out upon the proof is in effect this, that in the course of the years of the lease which have already run there has been an increase in the number of rabbits, the amount of which has varied considerably—in some years it has been more, in others less. The landlord has employed trappers to keep them down, and in some years they have been more successful in doing so than in others. In such a case as that, it being clear that the amount of the rabbits had been materially increased, I should have been of opinion that, but for the clause founded on, there was a case for reparation upon the ordinary rule of law. But I do not think that a mere increase beyond the amount existing at the time the lease was entered into, although harm resulted to the tenant, would be sufficient to warrant a claim of reparation. There must be more than that.

From the proof I find that the exertions of the landlord and the keepers have not been always and uniformly the same. For instance, there has not been the same keeper, and one keeper will do more than another in trapping and killing vermin, and one season is more favourable than another for that purpose. The way in which that is managed is by killing the rabbits during the time when they are not breeding, and at a time when the invasion of the covers for that purpose is not prejudicial to other game. I cannot see that measures were not taken to keep down the rabbits. I cannot impute that to the landlord as a fault or as a failing of his undertaking under the lease. There has been an honest intention on his part to keep them down, and if the keepers have not seconded him it has not been the purpose of the landlord to fail in taking measures for their suppression.

In these circumstances, I concur with the result at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived, but not with his view of the evidence. He represents that as more favourable to the pursuer than I think it is. The case which he has found in point of fact is one that does not to my mind appear from the evidence. I do not think "there was a great increase of rabbits on the pursuer's farms beyond the number which had formerly existed, or might reasonably have been expected, assuming that ordinary measures for keeping down the rabbits had been adopted." Neither do I think that the "increase arose in consequence of the failure of the landlord . . . to keep down the number." I understand that by failure there is meant to impute a want of duty, and if that were established I should have thought it more difficult for the landlord to avoid this claim. I think there has been an increase of rabbits, but not a very large increase, and by the clause in the lease the tenant has renounced his claim for damage from such a cause.

No. 116.

Cadzow v. Lockhart.

LORD DEAS.—I do not concur with the Lord Ordinary in the construction he puts on this clause of the lease. His Lordship says,—"I am, however, of opinion that all claims of damage at the pursuer's instance on account of injury which might be caused to his crops from any increase of rabbits arising from the defender's failure to keep down the stock on the lands and adjoining plantations were excluded by the terms of the leases." He afterwards refers to the case of Buchanan. That was a very difficult case, and I do not wonder that there was a difference of opinion upon it. But nothing which the landlord there could have done would have prevented the damage except allowing the minerals to remain unworked. The workings were perfectly regular. The present case is different, because the landlord can prevent the tenant's crops from being destroyed by keeping down the rabbits. I cannot hold that this lease so binds the tenant that in no circumstances could he claim damages for injury done by the rabbits. If the rabbits were allowed so to increase that they ate up every green thing it could not surely be held that the tenant undertook not to claim damages for his crops being so destroyed. Even if the damage were short of absolute destruction he might still, I think, have a good claim.

The landlord founded strongly on the provision that the tenant was taken bound to protect the game. The lease says,—"With full power to himself, and those having his permission, to hunt, shoot, or fish and sport on the farm without liability in damages, and the tenant shall be bound to preserve the game of all kinds, including hares and rabbits, to the utmost of his power, to interrupt poachers and unqualified persons, and to give information of them to the proprietor." The leading object was certainly to preserve the game and rabbits for sport. It is not said that the tenant was to preserve the rabbits for sale so as to admit of the largest profit being got from them in the market. Now, under what circumstances is this clause to protect the landlord? The Lord Ordinary says under all circumstances. He thinks that there is no implication that the landlord is to keep down the rabbits at all. I cannot go that length. I think that this is implied from the fact that the tenant is not to be allowed to keep them down. The rabbits are vermin, and but for the clause in the lease the tenant could have kept them down himself. If the lease is to be construed according to the view of the Lord Ordinary I doubt if it could be enforced. It seems to me that it would be very like a contract contra bonos mores. It must be construed so as not to be intolerable to the tenant, and my construction of it is that the landlord is bound, fairly and reasonably, to keep down the rabbits.

May 19, 1876. Cadzow v. Lockhart.

But while I thus differ from the Lord Ordinary as to the construction of the lease I also differ from him in his view of the facts. If the facts had been as he states them, that £60 a-year of damage was done to the crops, and that this was done in spite of remonstrances by the tenant, I should hold that the tenant had a claim. The clause must receive a fair construction, although it is a more stringent one than has hitherto come before the Court. The question is, whether there is such an unreasonable increase as entitles the tenant to damages? It was peculiarly the duty of the tenant to have made serious and strong remonstrances against the increase of the rabbits. It has not been proved here that the tenant did make strong and serious remonstrances. However, I do not think it is proved that damage was done by the rabbits to the extent alleged. But supposing that in any particular year there was a considerable increase of rabbits, that is not necessarily to be taken as a measure of the damage. The lease is for nineteen years, and you must look to the average of years. One year may be and often is more favourable for increase than another, and a landlord cannot always anticipate the result of particular seasons.

I am therefore, upon the whole, of opinion that looking to the terms of the lease, in connection with the facts proved, there has been no such excessive damage proved to have been done by rabbits, in the face of remonstrances by the tenant, as to entitle him to damages.

Lord Ardmillan.—I concur generally in the result of the decision of the Lord Ordinary, and also in the result of the opinion of your Lordship now given. I would not add anything were it not that, while concurring, and, I may say, compelled to concur, in the result, my view of the case is slightly different. In an action by a tenant against the landlord for damages in respect of injury to the crop on the farm caused by rabbits it is of the utmost importance to consider the terms of the lease. The action is substantially for breach of contract. As your Lordship in the chair explained in the case of Morton v. Graham, the claim of the tenant rests on this principle—that nothing should be done contrary to the faith of the contract; the breach of contract by the landlord is a wrong, and for that wrong, when instructed, the law recognises the tenant's right to redress in the form of damages. The lease is a mutual contract, and the rights and obligations of the parties must be ascertained by reference to the terms of the contract. Construction may be necessary, and construction of dubious or obscure language must be conducted with due regard to the principles of equity applicable to mutual contract. But, with the exception of stipulations contrary to law or contra bonos mores, whatever is clearly expressed in the contract must receive effect. This Court cannot make for the parties a contract different from what they have made for themselves, and cannot exclude or ignore a clearly expressed stipulation if it be not illegal or immoral.

Let us first look at this case apart from the special and peculiar clause in the lease to which your Lordship has adverted, and which forms the foundation of the legal defence pleaded by the landlord.

The injury of which the tenant complains was caused by rabbits. It is of great importance to see what were under this contract the relative positions of the landlord and the tenant in regard to rabbits on this farm. The tenant was not permitted to kill rabbits. Nay, he was taken bound to preserve them. If he could have killed them he might have protected himself. Rabbits are marvellously prolific. They multiply so rapidly that, unless kept down by steady killing, they must soon become excessive, and most injurious. Now, when the tenant is not permitted to kill, but is taken bound to preserve rabbits, and when the landlord reserves to himself the sole power to kill, then the landlord, having deprived the tenant of the power to protect himself, must either keep down the rabbits or be liable in damages for injury arising from their material excess. Unless there be a special clause in the lease protecting the landlord from liability the law in this respect is, in my opinion, well and conclusively settled. There are several decisions. I take the law to be as it is laid down by Lord Fullerton in the case of Wemyss v. Wilson, 2d December 1847, and by your Lordship in the chair in the case of Morton v. Graham, 30th November 1867.

If, therefore, there has in point of fact been an unreasonable and excessive increase of rabbits on this farm, that must be attributable to the landlord, because he has prohibited the tenant from protecting himself, and he has even bound him to preserve the rabbits.

On the question of increase, in point of fact, I cannot say that I have any doubt. On the one hand, I agree with your Lordship that the statements in the sixth article of the pursuer's condescendence, to the effect that the landlord turned part of the ground into a rabbit preserve or warren for purposes of profit, have not been instructed by proof. I think that statement is unfounded. On the other hand, I am quite satisfied that the rabbits have not been kept down as vigorously as they ought to have been, but that there has been a considerable and unreasonable increase of rabbits, and consequently a considerable injury to the pursuer's crop. Though this has not been effected designedly by the formation of a rabbit warren for profit, still it has been caused by the landlord's act or neglect, by his failure to keep down sufficiently the rabbits on a farm where preservation of rabbits was his purpose, and where he had deprived the tenant of the power of protecting himself.

The rent of the farm is, I think, £3 an acre, a rent by no means low, certainly not so low as might fairly have been expected if the rabbits were to be preserved by the tenant and left to be insufficiently kept down by the landlord.

Accordingly I am of opinion that, but for the clause in the lease to which I shall now advert, the tenant would have had a claim for damages in respect of injury caused by unreasonable increase of the rabbits on his farm. The law, if this clause were absent, would recognise his right. The law would in that case afford him protection. If the landlord deprives the tenant of the power to protect himself, then the landlord must be responsible, and liable in damages for injury caused by excess or unreasonable increase in the stock of rabbits. I adhere to what I stated in the case of Morton v. Graham. Apart from the special stipulation, the increase of rabbits on a farm by the act or by the failure of the landlord, where the tenant cannot protect himself, is a wrong to the tenant for which the law affords redress in the form of damages. Such increase has, I think, been here proved.

I come now to the clause in the lease. But for that clause the claim of the tenant could not, in my opinion, be altogether resisted. The facts support it to some extent, and the law recognises it to the extent instructed.

But the defender declines to make compensation in respect of this clause, on the ground that "all claims of damages are excluded by the lease." These are the words of his statement and of his plea in law.

The clause is in the following terms:—"It is hereby expressly declared and agreed that the tenant shall have no claim whatever for any damage he may sustain from game—hares and rabbits—during the lease, this being held to have been calculated upon and allowed for by him in offering for the farm." This clause follows upon a reservation to the landlord of the exclusive right to kill all kinds of game and rabbits, and follows an obligation laid on the tenant to preserve the rabbits; and is indeed the most stringent clause for protecting the landlord from liability which I have seen. It was, as I see from the principal lease, prepared by the landlord or his agent, and it is founded on by the landlord in this action to its full extent, as in point of fact applicable to all claims of damages for injury from rabbits, and as in point of law operating to the entire exclusion of all such claims.

Now, this clause, so prepared and proposed, was accepted by the tenant. It was intended to exclude, and is pleaded as excluding, all such claims, and the words are wide enough and strong enough to have that effect. The lease has been very dexterously and carefully prepared to secure preservation of rabbits and immunity from damages, and I cannot doubt that it was intended by the landlord to meet such a case as this. The words at the end of the clause have in argument been founded on by the tenant, but they are not introduced in favour of the tenant, and do not derogate from the force and the generality of the preceding words. On the contrary, they seem to suggest a reason for the stringency and comprehensiveness of the clause. I rather think that the clause is strengthened by the added words. The word "this" in the closing sentence means, in my view, this exclusion of the claim for damage, such exclusion, or, in other words, such risk to the tenant, being held to have been calculated upon and allowed for by him in offering for the farm. It means that the tenant in making his offer is held as having taken into his calculation the fact that the rabbits were to be preserved, and that his claim for damages was excluded, and the tenant is held as having offered for the farm on the footing and in the view of that exclusion. Whether, in point of fact, that was so calculated upon or not, the lease bears that it was "held" as done.

So reading the clause, I come to the conclusion that it was framed to shut out this claim, and that it must be held as accepted by the tenant on the same footing. As I have already explained, I think that the tenant would be entitled to damages to a considerable amount, though not to the full amount concluded for, were it not for this clause. He has, in my opinion, certainly been to that extent wronged, and for the wrong, and to the extent of the wrong, the law would have afforded him redress had he not accepted the peculiar provisions of this lease, and particularly this clause. But he has signed the lease with this clause in it. He has accepted the clause. He has surrendered his claim. He has contracted himself out of the right which the law recognises, out of the protection which the law affords, and out of the remedy which the law provides. Either in most exuberant and confiding trust, or in most egregious folly, this tenant has by his own deed cast from him the protection by which the law surrounded him, and placed himself as regards this matter at the mercy of his landlord. To that effect the landlord has pleaded this clause. On this record the plea for the landlord is that "all claims," not some claims, but "all claims of damages are excluded by the lease."

The Lord Ordinary's reading of the clause is severe on the tenant's claim. The landlord's own reading and pleading of the clause is precisely to the same effect. The Lord Ordinary has read it just as the landlord reads it, and just as the landlord has pleaded it.

Cadzow v. Lockhart.

On the whole case I feel that I have no alternative but to reject this claim of damages. The contract of lease, and this clause in the contract of lease, is clear in its import, and in its effect is conclusive; and in the face of the lease, with that clause in it, this action cannot be sustained.

LORD MURE.—I concur, and have little to add to what has already been said. I think that this is one of the most stringent clauses which has come before the Court in cases of this description; but my opinion is that it would not necessarily bar the tenant's claim in all circumstances. When this case came before us on the question of proof I formed the opinion that if, as alleged in the 6th article of the condescendence, the farm had been turned into a rabbit warren, and the rabbits preserved with a view to profit, and so as to render the profitable occupation of the land impossible, the landlord could not have got rid of the pursuer's claim under this clause of the lease. And I should even be disposed to hold that if a landlord were to abstain altogether from shooting rabbits and from employing keepers to trap them, and they were on that account to increase to such an extent as to do serious injury to the crops, this clause would not protect him. But I am of opinion, on the other hand, that the clause is so worded that it is sufficient to protect the landlord, even when there has been a considerable increase, if that has not arisen from fault or design on his part.

Under an ordinary lease the law holds that the tenant is entitled to claim damages when there has been a material increase of game. But a clause like the present must, I conceive, be held to have been inserted, and is, I think, sufficient to provide against the contingency that in some years there may be a material increase from causes not directly attributable to the landlord. It is well known that some seasons are more favourable to the increase of rabbits than others, and that some keepers are more skilful than others in keeping them down, and it must, I think, have been in order to meet a sudden increase arising from such causes that this clause was inserted.

Now, the pursuer has, in my opinion, entirely failed to instruct the statements in the 6th article of his condescendence; and although it appears from the evidence that the rabbits considerably increased in some of the years between 1870 and 1874, I think that this arose from want of skill on the part of some of the keepers employed during some of those years. It is distinctly proved, moreover, that orders were given to keep the rabbits down, and that extra keepers were employed for that purpose. Fair, the gamekeeper, who was examined on the part of the pursuer, says that they were trapped with a view to keep them down, both in summer and winter, and it is further proved that this is never done in summer unless with that intention. In these circumstances, I am of opinion that as this increase is not proved to have arisen from any fault or neglect of the defender, or from any design on his part to keep up an extraordinary stock of rabbits, the clause of the lease is sufficient to protect him from the pursuer's claim.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Find that, having regard to the clauses of the leases libelled excluding all claims of damages by the tenant for injury done by game or rabbits, the pursuer has not proved such an increase in the amount of game and rabbits on the farms during Succession—Vesting.—A testator, after directing payment of two annuities, and providing a liferent of the remainder of his estate to his wife, if she survived him, directed his trustees that the residue of his estate should, upon the death of his wife, or upon the death of the longest liver of the two annuitants, "whichever of these events shall last happen, but not earlier, be divided equally, share and share alike, among the children of my said two sisters, and if any child or children shall have died, either before the date of these presents or before the said period of division, then their issue shall, equally among them, succeed to their parent's share: Declaring that in the case of females, whether children or the issue of children, the provision in their favour shall be exclusive of the jus mariti or right of administration of any husbands whom they may have married or may marry, and as well in that case as in that of any of the other beneficiaries of the fee, even males, their provision shall be either paid to themselves upon their own receipt, or secured for their behoof by my said trustees and their aforesaids in such way as they in their sole discretion may think most fit for the interest of the beneficiaries." The testator's wife predeceased him. Held that the residue did not vest till the death of the last survivor of the annuitants.

2d Division. Ld. Craighill. I.

This was a multiplepoinding brought for the distribution of the estate of the late John Craig, clothier in Edinburgh, who died in 1857, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement dated September 1855.

By this deed the truster conveyed his whole estate to trustees, who were directed to pay an annuity of £100 to each of the truster's two sisters, and to allow his wife, if she survived him, the liferent use and enjoyment of the rest of the trust-estate. The deed then proceeded:—"The free residue and remainder of my said subjects, means, and estate shall, upon the death of my said spouse, or upon the death of the longest liver of the said two annuitants, whichever of these events shall last happen, but not earlier, be divided equally, share and share alike, among the children of my said two sisters, and if any child or children shall have died, either before the date of these presents or before the said period of division, then their issue shall, equally among them, succeed to their parent's share: Declaring that in the case of females, whether children or the issue of children, the provision in their favour shall be exclusive of the jus mariti or right of administration of any husbands whom they may have married or may marry, and as well in that case as in that of any of the other beneficiaries of the fee, even males, their provision shall be either paid to themselves upon their own receipt, or secured for their behoof by my said trustees and their aforesaids in such way as they in their sole discretion may think most fit for the interest of the beneficiaries."

The truster's wife predeceased him. The survivor of the two annuitants died in 1873.

Sloane v. Finlayson.

A question as to whether the residue vested at the death of the testator, or not until the death of the surviving annuitant, was, at the request of parties, first taken up.

Mr and Mrs Sloane, and other claimants, maintained that the residuary bequest vested at the testator's death.

Finlayson and others maintained that vesting did not take place till the death of the last annuitant.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that the said residuary bequest did not become vested in all or any of the residuary legatees till the death of the last survivor of the annuitants, which occurred on 12th October 1873; and further, that as the testator's widow had predeceased that event, the same then became vested: Appoints the cause to be enrolled that this finding may be applied to the claims of parties." Mr and Mrs Sloane and others were found liable in the expense of the discussion, which was modified to nine guineas.*

The claimants, Mr and Mrs Sloane, reclaimed and argued;—The case could not be distinguished from that of Maxwell v. Wylie.[1] Each of the elements which were founded on in the present case against vesting a morte testatoris were found in that case,—the postponement of payment till the death of the longest liver of the annuitants, and the calling of the issue of predeceasing beneficiaries. The cases of Provan,[2] and Johnston,[3] decided in the Second Division in 1840 (in both of which Lord Moncreiff took the

* "NOTE.— . . . . The clause of the truster's settlement upon which the decision of this question depends is that in which the fifth purpose of the deed is set forth. The meaning of this clause appears to the Lord Ordinary to be plain. That meaning is not controlled, as the Lord Ordinary thinks, by any words, expressions, or provisions to be found elsewhere in the deed, and consequently he has, without difficulty, adopted the conclusion to which effect has been given by the foregoing interlocutor.

"Were it necessary, several considerations could be mentioned for the opinion on the question in dispute which the Lord Ordinary has formed. But as there is one which appears to him to be sufficient, that alone will be particularised. The clause in question directs that 'the free residue and remainder of my said subjects, means, and estate shall upon the death of my said spouse, or upon the death of the longest liver of the said two annuitants, whichever of these events shall last happen, but not earlier, be divided equally, share and share alike, among the children of my said sisters; and if any child or children shall have died either before the date of these presents or before the said period of division, then their issue shall, equally among them, succeed to their parent's share.' Thus, sisters' children alive at the appointed period of division, and the issue, if any, of such children as predeceased that period, form the component parts of the class of residuary legatees. There are no other members of that class nominated by the truster; and certainly there is nothing which suggests that issue of predeceasing children are to be excluded that other parties deriving right from the parents of such issue may be introduced. And yet such would be the effect of so reading the clause as to hold that there was vesting a morte testatoris. Every sister's child would by that interpretation become at the death of the testator a residuary legatee, and, as a consequence, though she might die before the period of division, leaving issue, such issue could take nothing under the conditional institution provided in the clause of bequest. A reading which leads to such a result cannot, the Lord Ordinary thinks, be the true reading, because it operates as a defeasance of a provision plainly expressed, and forming an integral part of the scheme of the truster's settlement." . . . .

opposite view), could not be reconciled with the current either of previous or subsequent decisions.[1]

Finlayson and others argued;—Questions of vesting in testaments did not depend on any technical rules of conveyancing. The natural meaning was to be put on each word. The testator could not more clearly have expressed his intention that children of predeceasing beneficiaries should take in preference to their creditors or other assignees.[2]

At advising,—

LORD ORMIDALE.—The question for decision in this case relates to the vesting of the residue of the trust-estate of the deceased John Craig; and it depends upon the construction and effect of the fifth purpose of his trust-disposition and settlement, which in some respects is peculiarly expressed.

It was contended, on the one hand, that the residue vested a morte testatoris, and, on the other, that it did not vest till the period of division, that is, till the death of the liferentrix and the two annuitants.

The mere circumstance of there being a liferent and annuities, and consequent delay in paying or distributing the residue, could not have the effect of postponing the vesting. But it appears to me there are specialties in the present case sufficient to shew that it was not the will or intention of the testator that the residue of his estate should vest till the period of division, that is, till the death of his widow and the longest liver of the two annuitants.

(1) It is expressly declared by the testator that payment or division of the residue should then take place, "and not sooner." In this respect there is a marked distinction between the present case and that of Foulis (3d February 1857, 19 D. 362), cited in argument for the reclaimers. In consequence of this distinguishing feature, it cannot, I think, be held that the widow and annuitants in the present case could, by executing a renunciation of their interests, accelerate the period of distribution, as was done in the case of Foulis.

(2) The next, and I think a very important peculiarity in the present case, is that the testator not only provides that the issue of his sisters' children dying before the period of division shall succeed to their parents' share,—a provision which, it might be argued, as it was at the debate, is nothing more than what the law would supply independently of express declaration,—but also that the issue of children dying before the date of "these presents," that is, before the date of the trust-disposition and settlement, should succeed to their parents' share. This is a peculiarity of the present case not to be found in any other, so far as I am aware; and it unmistakeably indicates, I think, so far at least as concerns the issue of children dying before the date of his deed of settlement, that the testator had not his own death in view as the period of vesting, and neither, of course, could he have proceeded on the footing of vesting taking place previous to his own death. The only intelligible explanation is, that the testator by the language he employs intended that there should be no vesting till the period of division. On any other footing the manifest object of the testator in providing that the issue of such of the children as might die before the date of his deed, or before the period of division, should come into the place of their parents, and be entitled to their parents' share, might be entirely defeated by the creditors or other assignees of such parents.

And (3) in support of the same view, there is also the peculiarity that in dividing and paying over the residue the testator declares that in the case of females, whether children or the issue of children, the provision in their favour shall be "exclusive of the jus mariti or right of administration of any husbands whom they may have married or may marry, and as well in that case as in that of any other of the beneficiaries of the fee, even males, their provision shall be either paid to themselves upon their own receipt, or secured for their behoof by my said trustees and their aforesaids, in such a way as they, in their sole discretion, think fit for the interest of the beneficiaries." I cannot think that an anxious provision such as this would have been made by the testator if he had intended that the residue of his estate should vest on his own death, or contemplated the possibility of its vesting prior to the period of division. It is plain, however, that supposing vesting to have taken place a morte testatoris, it might happen that the trustees would find when the period of division arrived that they had to pay it over and divide it, not amongst the children or the issue of the children of the testator's sisters, but to others to whom it had been transferred by them, strangers to the testator, and in regard to whom it can scarcely be supposed the anxious provision which has just been referred to was ever intended to apply.

Having regard to these considerations, I am of opinion the Lord Ordinary is right in holding that the residuary bequest in question did not vest till the death of the liferentrix and annuitants, that is, till the period of division. I am unable, in any other view, to see how what appears to me to be the manifest intention of the testator, which must in the present, as in all cases of its class, be the paramount and guiding rule of construction, could be given effect to.

In accordance with the opinion I have now expressed, I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the case is special, and turns on the peculiar words of the settlement.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

LORD NEAVES was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Adhere to the said interlocutor, except as regards the finding of expenses: Recall that finding, and allow the expenses incurred by the respondents, both in the Outer and Inner-House, to be paid out of the fund in medio."

WILLIAM HUTCHINSON AND COMPANY, Pursuers.—D.-F. Watson—Trayner—Darling.

THE ABERDEEN SEA INSURANCE COMPANY AND OTHERS, Defenders.—Balfour—J. P. B. Robertson.

Insurance—Ship—Concealment—Change of Ship's Nationality—Merchant Shipping Act, 1873—Board of Trade Inspection.—A vessel was transferred by means of a fictitious sale from the British to the Belgian flag, for the purpose of avoiding the inspection provided by the "Merchant Shipping Act, 1873." The vessel was subsequently insured. In an action upon the policy, the vessel having been lost, held that failure to mention the change of nationality to the underwriters, some of whom had a year before insured the vessel as a British ship, was a concealment of a material fact which would have influenced a prudent underwriter in determining whether to accept or decline the risk, and therefore voided the policy, although the defenders did not maintain that the vessel was unseaworthy when she sailed upon the voyage for which she was insured.

Observed, per cur., that the fictitious sale was fraudulent.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Curriehill. I.

THIS was an action raised at the instance of William Hutchinson and Company, merchants, Newcastle-on-Tyne, against the Aberdeen Sea Insurance Company and others, to recover the amounts alleged to be severally due by the defenders under a policy of insurance underwritten by them on the ship "John George," dated 3d September 1874, the ship having been wrecked on 9th December 1874.

The defenders resisted payment on the plea that there had been concealment by the pursuers of facts material to the risk.

The pursuers averred that the vessel was perfectly seaworthy when she sailed on the voyage for which she was insured. The defenders averred that she was then unseaworthy, but afterwards lodged a minute withdrawing the averment.

The facts of the case, and the contentions of the parties, are stated in the following interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, pronounced after a proof:—"Finds in point of fact, Primo, That by policy of insurance, dated 3d September 1874, the pursuers, Messrs William Hutchinson and Company, who were part owners of the vessel 'John George,' in name of themselves and the other owners, effected, through Messrs John and Robert Catto, shipbrokers, Aberdeen, an insurance against the loss of the said vessel at and from the Tyne to Cronstadt or Wyburg, while there, and thence back to the east coast of Great Britain, and that the said vessel was underwritten by the defenders in various sums, making up in all the sum of £725: Secundo, That thereafter the 'John George' proceeded to Cronstadt, and thence sailed for Leith; that during the voyage a severe gale arose, in consequence of which the 'John George' was, on the 9th of December 1874, driven ashore on the coast of Northumberland, and became a total wreck: Tertio, That the pursuers then claimed from the defenders, as underwriters, the sum of £701, 16s. as the amount due under said policy, but that the defenders have declined to make any payment under the policy, in respect that material facts were concealed from them by the pursuers at the time the insurance was effected: Quarto, That in April 1873 the pursuers, through said John and Robert Catto, had effected in Aberdeen a previous insurance on the 'John George,' and that the pursuers on that occasion, through the said Messrs Catto, informed the underwriters that the said vessel was registered at South Shields, and referred them to the French Bureau Veritas, which corresponds to the Lloyds' registry in England, in which the 'John George' was entered as an English ship, registered at South Shields as having been built at Sunderland in 1837, and as standing in April 1873 as having been classed in 1872 of the second class for two years: Quinto, That in the French Bureau Veritas, current at the date of the policy sued on, the 'John George' still stood as a British ship, and of the same class as at the date of the former policy in April 1873; and that the defenders—nine of whom had been underwriters in the previous policy in 1873—all became underwriters in the policy sued on, in the belief that the 'John George' was a registered British ship, and that no information to the contrary was ever communicated by the pursuers to Messrs Catto, or reached any of the underwriters: Sexto, That prior to the 28th July 1874 the 'John George' had been transferred to a Belgian owner by a fictitious sale and mortgage, effected by James Primrose Lindsay, then the managing owner, and principal part owner of said vessel, and that said vessel was, on said date, registered in Belgium as a Belgian vessel, and continued so registered at the date of the wreck, and that the British registry of said vessel was closed on 25th August 1874: Septimo, That the said transfer of ownership and change of registry were effected for the purpose of excluding the 'John George' from the operation of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1873, which empowered the Board of Trade to inspect and detain British vessels which were believed to be unseaworthy: Octavo, That such inspection by the officers of the Board of Trade is calculated to afford, and does afford, protection to underwriters in policies of insurance on British vessels for a single voyage effected without any special survey on behalf of the underwriters: Nono, That the facts of the transfer of the ownership of the vessel and change of registry were or ought to have been within the knowledge of the pursuers at the date of their effecting the policy of insurance sued on, and were not made known by them to the defenders: Decimo, That the said transfer of the vessel and change of flag were material facts, the knowledge of which would have materially influenced the underwriters in determining whether to accept or decline the insurance when proposed, and the amount of premium to be charged if the risk were accepted, and that it would have been reasonable in them to have been so influenced: Therefore, and in point of law, finds that the policy sued on is void in respect of the foresaid concealment of material facts, and that the pursuers are not entitled to recover the sums insured by the policy; but finds, in respect of the minute for the defenders, No. 86 of process, that the defenders are willing to repay the pursuers the premium paid by them on said policy, which amounts to £38, 16s. 6d.: Decerns against the defenders for payment of the said sum accordingly: Quoad ultra assoilzies the defenders, and decerns: Finds the pursuers liable to the defenders in expenses," &c.*

* "NOTE.— . . . . The law applicable to such cases is stated thus by Arnould, vol. i., p. 511,—'It is the duty of the assured to communicate to the underwriters all the intelligence he has that may affect the mind of the underwriter as to either of the two following points:—(1) Whether he will take the risk at all; (2) At what premium he will take it. This is a duty attaching at the time of effecting the insurance, and not at all dependent on subsequent events, for the effect of a concealment on the policy is determined, not by its eventual relation to the risk, but with reference to its immediate influence on the judgment of the underwriter. For so is the law, that were the intelligence concealed to turn out to be wholly unfounded, or the loss to arise from a cause totally unconnected with the fact concealed, the policy is nevertheless void.'

"And on the same point Parson says, vol. i., p. 469,—'If it is proved that material facts are not disclosed, it is not always necessary to constitute a concealment that these facts were actually known to the assured. It is enough if he might have known them, and ought to have known them; for it is certainly his duty to use all customary and reasonable means to acquire all the information which it is his duty to impart. And this means all the information which the insurer ought to have in making his bargain, and which he may reasonably believe the insured possesses.'

"In dealing with cases like the present, the questions whether there was concealment from the underwriters, and whether the facts concealed were material, that is to say, whether everything was disclosed which would affect the judgment of a rational underwriter, governing himself by the principles and calculations on which underwriters do in practice act, are proper jury questions to be decided on the evidence adduced. See Parson on Insurance, vol. i., p. 495, as referred to in the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in Ionides v. Pender, May 27, 1874, Law Reports, 9 Q. B., p. 539. It appears to me to be in this case clearly proved that the underwriters believed, and entered into the policy of September 1874 in the belief that the 'John George' was then a British registered ship, which she undoubtedly was at the date of a former policy effected through the same brokers, and with substantially the same underwriters, in April 1873. It is also proved that James Primrose Lindsay, who was in July, August, and September 1874 the principal owner of the vessel, by means of a nominal sale to a person in Belgium of the name of Watson, and by a mortgage granted by Watson in his favour, so arranged matters that the 'John George' became ostensibly the property of a Belgian owner, and was registered in the Belgian registry as a Belgian ship. All this was done by the 28th of July 1874. It is also proved that the change of ownership and flag was made expressly for the purpose of exempting the vessel from inspection by Board of Trade surveyors, under the powers of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1873. The result of such inspection has been that very many ships have been prevented from sailing, on the ground of being unseaworthy, and until they were not merely made barely seaworthy, but received such additional fittings and repairs as greatly to conduce to their safety on the voyage.

"The pursuer, William Hutchinson, who is the sole partner of the firm of William Hutchinson and Company, and who effected the insurance, was a part owner of the vessel, and although he said in his examination that, at the time he effected the insurance, he was not aware that the flag had been changed, he yet admitted, 'I heard it mentioned by Mr J. P. Lindsay that he had some idea of putting her under the Belgian flag, but I never knew positively that it had been done. I took no interest in the matter, but left it entirely in Mr Lindsay's hands.' Now, it appears to me that if the change of flag was a material circumstance in the case, the pursuers were bound to have made themselves aware of it before effecting the insurance. Although Lindsay was the managing owner, and managed the vessel on behalf of himself and the other owners, the pursuers were entrusted with the duty of effecting the insurance of the vessel for behoof of all the owners, and it was clearly their duty to ascertain definitely, before effecting it, whether the managing owner's previously expressed intention of placing the vessel under the Belgian flag had been carried out, and to communicate the change to the underwriters.

"This being so, the next question is, Was the change of ownership and flag material? Several underwriters were examined by the pursuers for the purpose of shewing that, according to the practice of underwriters, change of flag made no difference in the risk. But most of these witnesses concurred in saying that vessels under the foreign flag were very rarely insured in this country, and that most of the risks which they were in the habit of underwriting on British ships were on yearly policies, running from February to February, and that, in taking the risk, they were not guided by the vessel's class in Lloyd's registry, or any foreign registry, but by an actual survey of each ship, made on behalf of the underwriters previous to effecting or renewing each insurance. Indeed one of the pursuers' witnesses, Dugald M'Dugald, an insurance broker in Greenock, and agent there for the Union Marine Insurance Company of Liverpool, says of the change of flag was material to the underwriters' risk. The insured was only bound to disclose facts relating to the risk which the under-that, while in the general case he does not consider the change of flag material, even if made just before the commencement of an insurance, he thinks it is a circumstance which ought to be communicated to the underwriter. He is asked, 'Would the knowledge of the change of flag having taken place shortly prior to September 1874 have suggested to your mind any reason for making inquiry? (A.) I would certainly have made more stringent inquiries, because the change of flag would have led me to understand that it had been made to escape the action of the Board of Trade. There was a great deal of change of flag about that time among vessels of all classes, but chiefly among low classed vessels. (Q.) You would have thought it reasonable in an underwriter, who had got information of the change of flag, to have made those more stringent inquiries to which you have alluded? (A.) I think it reasonable that the underwriter should have made inquiry. We rarely insure vessels sailing under a foreign flag, because we are rarely asked to do so; it is not generally done in Scotland. There is no other reason. The nationality of a vessel is not a material matter to be communicated to the underwriter. It is better to be communicated, but is not material. (Q.) What do you mean when you say it is better to be communicated? (A.) The underwriter prefers to have all the circumstances of risk set before him. (Q.) Do you mean that the underwriter's mind would be affected by the knowledge of that fact? (A.) It might or it might not. (Q.) And it would be reasonable to think his mind might be affected? (A.) It might be affected.'

"It is intelligible, therefore, that while the Board of Trade inspection is a protection to underwriters insuring British vessels without making an actual survey of the vessel, such inspection may be of less advantage to underwriters, who, like most of the pursuers' witnesses, grant time policies after actual survey for themselves. Now, the evidence for the defenders very clearly shews that in Aberdeen, and particularly in the case of policies for single voyages, the underwriters are not in use to accept foreign risks, and that they depend almost entirely upon the information as to the vessel communicated to them by the assured, or disclosed in the lists of Lloyd's registry, or in the French or other foreign lists. In such cases underwriters insuring vessels after the passing of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1873 considered, and were well entitled to consider, that the risk of insuring a vessel under the British flag without making a special survey was materially lessened, especially in the case of old vessels like the 'John George,' by the powers of inspection and detention given to the Board of Trade.

"I think that the whole evidence leads to this result, that the circumstance of the flag being changed on the eve of the vessel sailing, and avowedly for the purpose of escaping the Board of Trade inspection, was a circumstance so material that it ought to have been disclosed to the underwriters before the policy was effected, and that the failure to disclose vitiates the policy.

"It may be true, as the pursuers allege, that the Board of Trade inspection does not necessarily secure more than that the ship when she sails is seaworthy, and that as the defenders do not maintain that the 'John George' was unseaworthy when she sailed, and as positive proof of her seaworthiness has been adduced by the pursuers, the non-communication of the change of flag is not material. But I think that this argument ignores the principle laid down in the passage from Arnould already quoted, and which is also very clearly stated in Marshall on Marine Insurance, p. 359 (ed. 1861), viz., that 'concealment so vitiates the policy that it will afford the insured no remedy, even from a loss arising from a cause unconnected with the fact or circumstance concealed; for a concealment is to be considered not with reference to the event, but to its effect at the time of making the contract.' It may therefore be quite true that even if the registry had not been changed, and if the vessel had been inspected by the Board of Trade, she would have been found seaworthy and allowed to sail, so that in point of fact the loss may not have been attributable to the want of inspection. But the question to be decided is, whether or not the removal of this writers assumed. They undertook no risk in regard to the seaworthiness of the vessel. If the vessel was seaworthy they were bound to pay, and if it was not seaworthy they were not bound to pay. The Board of Trade inspection could give the underwriters no more than a guarantee of the ship's seaworthiness, and this was secured to them by the warranty contained in the policy. The vessel was not made less seaworthy by carrying the Belgian instead of the British flag. No question as to the materiality of the non-disclosure could arise unless the seaworthiness of the vessel was disputed, which it was not.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I do not think it necessary in this case to call for any reply, and for my own part, notwithstanding Mr Trayner's very able and ingenious argument, I am quite satisfied with the views expressed in the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and indeed have very little to add to what he has there said. The state of the matter of fact seems to me beyond dispute, and is shortly this:—This vessel had been insured by the defenders, the Aberdeen Sea Insurance Company, in April 1873, and at that time the information which the insurance company received from the shipowner was, that she was registered at South Shields; and they referred the underwriters to the French Bureau Veritas, from which it appeared that the "John George" was registered at South Shields, that she had been built at Sunderland in 1837, and stood in April 1873 as classed in 1872 of the second class for two years,—not a very high class vessel,—but that was the information which the insurance company received at that time. In 1874 the pursuers wrote to the insurance company to know at what rate a new insurance could be effected on a voyage from the Tyne to Cronstadt; and this proposal was submitted to the underwriters along with the information which had been previously received as to registration and class of the vessel, and the result was that this policy was issued. The policy contains nothing in its terms, it seems to me, material as to the general question which we are now considering. The memorandum in regard to capture, and the other matters put on the back of it, probably had reference to the fact, not disclosed at the time, that the vessel had a foreign register. But, apart from that, there seems to be nothing important in the specific terms of the policy.

Now, the vessel sailed, was caught in a storm, and was wrecked at Bamborough, on the coast of Northumberland; and the question now is, whether the pursuers, the owners, can recover under this insurance. The answer made by the defenders is, she was represented to us as a British vessel, whereas, in old and low class vessel from the control of the Board of the Trade on the eve of her leaving Great Britain, and shortly before the insurance was effected, would, if communicated, have influenced the mind of a rational underwriter in entering into the transaction? The import of the evidence is, in my opinion, that the facts, if disclosed, would have influenced the defenders, and have led them either to decline the risk altogether, or to undertake it, if at all, at a higher rate than that to which they agreed; and I think it would have been reasonable in them to be so influenced.

"On these grounds, I think the pursuers cannot recover under the policy sued on, which I hold to be vitiated by the concealment or non-disclosure of material facts, which were or ought to have been within the knowledge of the pursuers when they effected the policy. As, however, the defenders offer to return the premium paid by the pursuers, decree will be given in their favour for that sum. But as I do not think the pursuers are legally entitled to such return, the defenders will be assoilzied from the conclusions of the action quoad ultra, with expenses."

point of fact, she had been registered at Antwerp as the property of a Belgian owner, and consequently was sailing under the Belgian flag; that was a matter which was concealed from us when the policy was effected; and if it had been disclosed to us we should never have entered into the contract at all. The question now is, whether, assuming that such is the fact, the contention of the defenders is well founded.

Now, it turns out, and indeed is somewhat ostentatiously averred on the part of the witnesses for the pursuers, that the registration under the Belgian flag was not the result of any bona fide transaction, nor done for any bona fide purpose. The Legislature, by the Act of 1873, empowered the Board of Trade to inspect vessels leaving the different British ports, with a view of ascertaining their seaworthiness and the state of their equipment and loading. It seems that it has become the practice, for the purpose of evading that statute, to make false declarations in foreign ports for the purpose of obtaining a foreign registry for British vessels, in order to exempt them from the inspection of the Board of Trade; and this was the reason which induced the pursuers to procure the Belgian registry which subsisted at the date of the insurance. I can only say that I can conceive no greater fraud, or one more unworthy of the position of a British merchant. The witnesses say that the Board of Trade inspection is oppressive. But when statutes are passed for the good of the commonwealth, for the praiseworthy object of preserving the lives of the sailors on board our ships, I am sorry to find that it is considered anything but a disgraceful fraud to endeavour to evade these provisions by false oaths in a foreign port; and I greatly regret the attempt which has been made to defend such a course. We start, therefore, in this inquiry with the fact that the Belgian character of the vessel was a fraud on the public policy of this country; and the question is, what is the effect of that undisclosed fraud on this contract of insurance? It may be true that the Board of Trade inspection, and the statute under which it proceeds, are not provided directly for the protection of underwriters, but for the general benefit of those engaged in navigation. But it does not follow that if there be part of the machinery of this statute which might be material to the underwriters if the vessel were a British ship, the withdrawal of this advantage, without notice to the underwriters, may not be material to the risk. This vessel was represented to be a British vessel, and this was clearly implied in the contract, which was a reinsurance of a ship already registered as a British ship. The only account which the insurers had of her register or her class was derived from the registry at South Shields, which was furnished on the occasion of the former insurance. Therefore, while the underwriters were induced to believe that they were insuring a British ship, they were in point of fact insuring a Belgian ship. I am not sure that, apart from the Board of Trade inspection, that might not amount to a misrepresentation material to the risk. There may be many things incident to a foreign ship in the way of capture, of adjustment of claims, or other results of the contract of marine insurance, the law in regard to which varies, or may vary, in the different countries in Europe. Underwriters are certainly entitled to know that they are asked to insure a foreign ship, and persons wishing to insure are bound to give them notice of the character of the vessel. It is no answer that various underwriters say that they do not think the risk materially greater in the one case than in the other. That is not the question. The question, as I regard it, is, whether the contract to insure a British ship is the same thing as to insure a Belgian ship. I think that admits of doubt, apart from the fraudulent object of the Belgian registry, and that the owner ought to have disclosed the nationality of the vessel. But it is enough for the present case to say that the false representation which was made, and the fact which was not disclosed, were matters which related to the security for the seaworthiness of the vessel. The object of taking the Belgian flag was to avoid the Board of Trade inquiry, to which, in its character of a British vessel, the underwriters were entitled to assume that this ship would be subject.

Hutchinson and Co. v. Aberdeen Sea Insurance Co.

It is in vain to say that the vessel, in point of fact, was seaworthy. That may be so; but the question is, whether the misrepresentation or concealment had the effect of leading the underwriters to believe that there were means of ascertaining the seaworthiness of the vessel which were neutralised by the registry under the Belgian flag? On that matter I entertain no doubt. The means of proving that a vessel which has been wrecked was unseaworthy when she sailed are sufficiently limited; and we know also that, in the system of underwriting which prevails in this country, there is but little inducement to underwriters to undergo the expense and annoyance of such inquiries. They are quite entitled to rely on the provisions of the statute, and to assume that before a British vessel sails on an intended voyage she will undergo the inspection as to her seaworthiness for which the Legislature has provided. I should be very sorry in such a case as this to give any countenance to the systematic evasion of so salutary an enactment by false and fraudulent assumptions of foreign nationality. On the whole case, I am very clearly of opinion that the policy is void, because the ship was falsely represented to be a British ship, because its change of nationality was concealed from the underwriters, and ought to have been communicated to them; and that these things were material to the risk undertaken by the contract of insurance.

Lord Neaves.—I am of the same opinion. I think this is an important case. I think it important that such practices as have been here disclosed should, if possible, be put a stop to; and the only way in which we can do that is by preventing the parties who resort to them from reaping the fruits of their fraud. I have no difficulty in holding that a proceeding of this kind is a fraud,—a fraud upon the law, a fraud upon the country, a fraud upon all those interested in the safety of ships. I need not go over the same ground with your Lordship as to the matters of fact; but I would observe that the warranty of seaworthiness, founded upon so strongly here, is the very thing which gives importance to the impropriety on the part of the pursuers. There is a difference of opinion among jurists as to where the onus probandi lies in a warranty of seaworthiness. I am myself inclined to think that where there is such a warranty the proof of non-seaworthiness is laid on the underwriters. The presumption when dealing with honest men is that the ship was seaworthy as warranted; and therefore the underwriter with such a warranty is laid under the burden of proving non-seaworthiness. He may do so. Warranty does not prevent the proof that the warranty was not observed. And here comes in the pre-eminent importance of no concealment, no disguise of facts, or failure to answer the necessary questions put to the parties proposing to insure, that shall prejudice the position of the underwriter if he is ultimately driven to resort to a proof of unseaworthiness. Now, then, a party comes and says, either expressly or by necessary implication, this vessel which I am asking you to insure, and which I am willing to guarantee as seaworthy, is subject to the inspection of the Board of Trade, and will undergo that inspection before it proceeds to sea; and therefore it will either be prevented from going to sea, or you will be secure as to its being seaworthy; and at any rate evidence will be preserved by that inspection which will be beneficial to you. I do not see how it can be said that the inspection of the Board of Trade, carried on in the strict manner in which it is carried on, is not a resulting benefit and security to the underwriters. It will secure that the ship be made seaworthy, or shall not go to sea unseaworthy; or at least a record will exist that it was unseaworthy, and the insurer may bring forward that evidence to prove that the warranty has not been complied with.

May 23, 1876.
Hutchinson and Co. v. Aberdeen Sea Insurance Co.

Now, the insured here, before effecting this insurance,—which was a continuation of a former one,—determined to change the register of the ship; and it is a fair presumption, I think, that they did so in order to avoid what they felt to be irksome, because it was a check upon unseaworthiness. The more irksome it was, the more efficient it would be for the benefit of all those interested in the fact of seaworthiness. The insured evaded that by resorting to a foreign country for a register that would save them the necessity of this inspection, and entitle them to put to sea without the Board of Trade interfering. While they did that, they did not inform the underwriters that they had so changed the position which they had previously occupied. And, indeed, the position they had taken was a simulate position, as is now admitted. The vessel had not become a Belgian vessel in strict truth, but had become apparently a Belgian vessel, so as to sail under false colours, and thereby—without its being communicated to the underwriters—escape that inspection which would either have kept her within harbour, or have preserved a record of her unseaworthy state, which would have been available if she was in that state.

Now, can an insurance entered into in these circumstances be held to have been entered into bona fide? It is said the Board of Trade is very oppressive, that they detain vessels, and give a great deal of trouble; but there are parties in the country who think they are not sufficiently stringent, though we have not before us the principal party who interests himself in this subject. It is said there is a guarantee of seaworthiness; but that does not at all signify in this case, because the question is, what were the disclosures made before the insurance policy was entered into. In the next place, the fact of a warranty does not prevent the underwriters from availing themselves, wherever it may be necessary, of the securities that exist for contradicting seaworthiness. Therefore, it appears to me that this insurance has been obtained by means of a false representation, for I think there was a virtual and plain representation that the vessel was still an English vessel; that she was liable to the inspection of the Board of Trade; that she would undergo that inspection; and that that would be a security; but when it turns out that, by a simulate transaction and a fraud, the owners evaded the inspection of the Board of Trade, I think the underwriters are entitled to say, You have withheld from us that which a reasonable and just man would have disclosed, and therefore our contract from the first is null and void.

LORD ORMIDALE.—It does not appear to me that your Lordships have characterised the conduct of the pursuers too strongly. I do not refer to all the pursuers before us, because I exculpate entirely, in consequence of his ignorance of what had occurred, one of these pursuers, who is resident in Edinburgh, although of course he is answerable in law equally with his partners for what they have done. The conduct of the managing partner in Newcastle, in entering into the transaction in question, was, it appears to me, a fraud of the very worst description; and I cannot help thinking that if, in the carrying out of that fraud, there was not actually subornation of perjury, there was something as close as possible to it. An individual was employed at Antwerp to register himself as the owner of this vessel under the Belgian flag, and he could not do so without taking an oath that he was the owner, knowing all the time, as did also his employers, that he was not to be the owner, and that the whole affair was a mere fiction. It was a fraud to evade in this way the law of the land in which the true owners lived, and to which the vessel belonged; and it was carried out by means of the most discreditable and disgraceful description. It appears to me that the whole case is pervaded by fraud from beginning to end; but, even if we could take up the question of the insurance in Aberdeen separate and apart from the fraud as to the change of flag what would be the result? The issue is, in the words of the Lord Ordinary, whether everything was disclosed which would affect the judgment of a rational underwriter governing himself by the principles and calculations on which underwriters act, and is a proper jury question to be decided on the evidence adduced. Now, the Lord Ordinary has, sitting as a jury in this case, heard the whole evidence, and come to the conclusion that the verdict on that issue should be given in favour of the defenders. I must say that I entirely concur with him, and I shall state the considerations which have influenced me in coming to this result in a very few words. Mr Trayner stated, as the foundation of his argument, that there was a great distinction between direct misrepresentation and a failure to disclose; and that if there had been here a positive averment that this vessel had continued under the British flag when the insurance in question was effected, that would have been a direct misrepresentation, which would have vitiated the contract, although after all it did not in the least degree affect the loss of the vessel, for she was just as seaworthy on that assumption as she was on the assumption on which he presented his argument, viz., that there was no misrepresentation, but merely a failure to disclose the fact that there had been a change of flag. But it appears to me that the foundation of the whole of that argument is unsound; for I concur with the Lord Ordinary in holding that there was a virtual representation by the pursuers that the ship had not changed her flag. The majority of the insurers knew that within two years they had effected an insurance on this very ship as a British ship; and some of them state on oath that, in this case, they acted in the belief that she was still a British ship, sailing under a British flag; so that, when asked to insure her again for a different voyage, I think there was a virtual representation to them to that effect. Now, in order to test whether it was material for the underwriters to know that she had changed her flag, supposing it had been stated to them that the vessel which they had insured two years before as a British ship sailing under a British flag was now a Belgian ship sailing under the Belgian flag, would they not have asked the meaning of the change? Would they not have declined to take a single step till they knew the reason of it? And what would have been the result? Either the truth would have been told them, or it would have been concealed, and a fraudulent statement made. In the former case, would it not have most materially affected their calculations? I think, on that hypothesis, it may be very fairly assumed that they would not have undertaken the risk at all, for it is hardly possible to suppose that they would, as rational and intelligent men, have undertaken the risk of a vessel in such circumstances, belonging to such men. Mr Wawn, one of their own witnesses, says,—"My underwriters do not think the change of flag a matter of additional risk or premium. If the owner is respectable, and the ship sound, the flag makes no difference in the risk." We need hardly be told that the owner must be respectable. A disreputable, dishonest individual would hardly get any underwriter to take a risk for him; but if all the circumstances of the present case had been disclosed to the underwriters I think it is impossible to suppose that they would have undertaken the risk at all. Now, I think that is a very good test, and it satifies my mind, in disposing of the question whether the change of flag, in the circumstances in which it took place, was a matter material to a rational insurer to know when he undertook the risk. We have a number of respectable persons engaged in underwriting who say that it would have materially affected their minds; and if that be so, I concur with the Lord Ordinary, sitting as a jury in the case, that the evidence is sufficient to entitle us to pronounce a verdict in favour of the defenders; and I agree with your Lordships in pronouncing that verdict.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of the same opinion. I abstain from characterising farther than your Lordships have done—and in that characterisation I concur—the nature of the fraud which was here perpetrated against the Legislature and against the country. I prefer to look at the case simply as a case of a contract of insurance, which is said to be voided by false representation or by concealment of material circumstances. I take the law to be very well stated by Mr Arnould, in the passage quoted by the Lord Ordinary, that it is the duty of the assured to communicate to the underwriters all the intelligence he has that may affect the mind of the underwriter as to either of the two following points:—1st, Whether he will take the risk at all; and, 2d, At what premium he will take it. In this view the real question is whether the fact that the ship was sailing, not under a British registry, but under a Belgian registry, is or is not material to the risk of the underwriter. Now, I rather think, with Lord Ormidale, and, if I mistake not, with both your Lordships, that there was here something very like actual direct misrepresentation. No doubt it was not said in so many words, "this is a British ship sailing under the British flag;" but it had been previously insured as such, and this was a reinsurance, which, I take it, very strongly implies, when no statement is made to the contrary, that the circumstances connected with its ownership are the same. Now, if it was a direct misrepresentation, a direct statement of what was false, it seemed to be conceded at the bar, and I understand it is the law in relation to this case, that that is very nearly of itself conclusive, and that the question of materiality of what is so expressly represented is not so important a matter of inquiry. But even supposing that this was just simple concealment of the change, I am prepared to affirm the Lord Ordinary's judgment, that it was a concealment of a fact material to the risk, and which every rational and reasonable underwriter would wish to know as affecting the questions, 1st, whether he would take the risk at all, and, 2d, at what premium he would accept it. The effect of a ship sailing under the British flag, and being a British registered ship, is, since 1873, among other things, that it is subject to certain inspection by the Board of Trade,—inspection intended, no doubt, to secure the lives of the sailors, but that can only be secured by securing the safety of the ship, and the safety of the ship in this matter depends on its being seaworthy, both as to equipment and as to loading, when it leaves a British port. Now, I think it is impossible to doubt, and we do not need any proof on such a question, that a ship under such inspection is a safer ship to insure than a ship under no inspection whatever. The true meaning of the statute is to secure safety, and a ship, the safety of which is more or less secured by such precautions, is a safer ship to insure than a ship regarding which no such precautions are taken; for if a man of common sense, not at all connected with maritime matters, was asked, whether would you insure a ship that has no Government inspection attending its sailing, or its loading, or its condition, but merely the guarantee of the owner that it is seaworthy, or a ship as to which you have not only the guarantee of the owner that it is seaworthy, but in addition the interference and inspection of a Government official, can there be any doubt as to what the answer would be? The inspection affords an additional security that the ship will be seaworthy each time it sails. Now, that is the very thing that is material; and it is no answer to that to say, Oh! but the owners guarantee the seaworthiness, and if they do so, it is the same thing whether it is seaworthy or not. It is not the same thing. In the first place, if she is lost, and the question arises whether she was seaworthy or not, it imposes on the insurer, who objects to pay upon the ground that the ship was not seaworthy, a proof, or at least a litigation, about the question whether she was or was not seaworthy—a litigation which will be avoided, and a risk of loss which will be avoided, if, prior to each time she sails, there has been a Government inspection. Suppose there had been what there is not yet—a general load line fixed, that is, a load line fixed, not by the shipowner himself, but by the Government inspector, would that not be an additional security to an insurer? for he would then be assured that the Government inspector had fixed a line beyond which the ship was not to be loaded; and if a foreign ship is not subject to that law, then the underwriter has not the same security that when she sails from a British port she will be in a seaworthy condition. Now, that is enough for this case. I think it is a thing that every underwriter would reasonably look at, even in the limited aspect in which I am now regarding it, whether the ship has the additional security of the Government inspection, or whether he has merely to trust to the guarantee of the owners that it is seaworthy. I agree with your Lordships; but I would rather put my judgment upon this short ground, that a material circumstance has been concealed from, or, I would rather say, misrepresented to, the underwriters in this case, which, had it been disclosed, might have reasonably affected their decision. We have the express evidence of one of them that it would. I do not go on that, but still it might have affected their decision as to whether they would take the risk or not. I am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary, in whose remarks I generally concur, has reached a right result in this case.

Husband and Wife—Declarator of Nullity of Marriage—Impotence of Wife.—Circumstances in which the Court pronounced decree of nullity of marriage on the ground of impotence on the part of the woman, who was fifty-four years of age at the date of the marriage.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Craighill.
M.

J. C., engineman, Glasgow, was married to J. M. on 5th September 1873. The husband was then fifty-seven and the wife fifty-four years of age. The husband had been married before and had a family. The wife had never been married before. On 27th September 1875 the husband raised an action against his wife, concluding for a decree declaring "the pretended marriage betwixt the pursuer and defender to have been from the beginning, to be now, and in all time coming, null, and of no avail, force, strength, nor effect, with all that has followed thereupon: And our said Lords ought and should divorce and separate the defender from the pursuer's society, fellowship, and company, and find and declare the pursuer to be in such case and condition as he was before the said pretended marriage, or as if he had never been contracted or married to the defender: Further, . . . that the said J M , defender, has forfeited all her privileges as the pursuer's lawful wife, and all rights and interests, jure mariti or otherwise, legal or conventional."

The pursuer stated;—"Notwithstanding their cohabitation, and of the solemnisation of said marriage de jure, the same has never been consummated de facto, no carnal copulation having followed thereupon between the pursuer and defender, by reason that the defender is suffering from an unnatural narrowness of her genitals (vagina), which has existed all her lifetime, and by which consummation is rendered impossible. Prior to and at the date of said pretended marriage the defender was aware of her condition, and was and is impotent, and unable to do the duty of a lawful wife to her husband, as is required by marriage."

The defender did not appear.

The Lord Ordinary allowed the pursuer a proof. Both husband and wife were examined, and medical witnesses.

With regard to the import of the proof, it is sufficient to say that the Lord Ordinary and the First Division took different views of the evidence. That of the Lord Ordinary is given in his interlocutor. The First Division held that an irremediable physical obstruction to copulation had been proved to exist on the part of the woman.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"In the first place, finds as matters of fact (1) that the pursuer and the defender were married the one to the other in 1873, when the pursuer was fifty-seven and the defender was fifty-four years of age; (2) that the defender had never been married till she, as aforesaid, was married to the pursuer; (3) that the marriage of the pursuer and the defender has never been consummated, though the pursuer is perfectly capable and has frequently attempted to have carnal intercourse with the defender; and (4) that the impediment to consummation has not been proved to be an unnatural narrowness of the defender's genitals (vagina), which has existed all her lifetime as alleged in the libel, but, on the contrary, is, if not wholly, at anyrate partially, the consequence of impaired or diminished elasticity in these parts, produced by age—that is to say, by the operation of a natural cause in the case of an unmarried woman: In the second place, finds as matter of law that the ground of action libelled not having been established, the defender must be assoilzied: Therefore assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the libel: Finds no expenses due to or by either the pursuer or the defender, and decerns."*

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—Impotency had been clearly established. There were precedents where the same organic defect in the woman had been held to be a relevant ground for declarator of nullity.[1] Further, it was impotency although there was no organic defect if there was such functional disability as to prevent copulation.[2] The fact that a woman was old at the date of the marriage did not exclude the action; it only raised a doubt as to the pursuer's good faith in bringing it.[3] Although an action of declarator of nullity of marriage on the ground of impotency was rare in Scotland yet it was a competent action.[4]

LORD PRESIDENT.—That marriage may be declared null by reason of the impotency of one of the spouses at the suit of the other cannot be doubted. To state the rule of law in the form of a definition of impotency would be dangerous, and is unnecessary.

But it may, I think, be safely affirmed as the result of all the authorities that inability to copulate arising from such a physical obstruction in the woman as cannot be removed or remedied without danger to her life or the infliction of bodily pain, plus quam tolerabile, constitutes impotency on her part.

* "NOTE.—The foregoing interlocutor will probably be a disappointment to the pursuer, and certainly will be a cause of regret to the defender, who appears, from what she said when under examination as a witness, to be even more anxious than the pursuer that the tie between them should be dissolved. The wishes, however, even of both parties to the action, cannot, in such a case as the present, be taken into account in determining what is the judgment which ought to be pronounced.

"The ground on which the Lord Ordinary has proceeded in assoilzieing the defender is, that the case libelled has not been proved. This may be thought by some to be a narrow, because it has the appearance of being a technical, reason for his judgment; but it is necessary in such cases as the present to be influenced even by technical considerations. There is, however, something substantial as well as technical in the view of the case on which absolvitor has been pronounced. If the Lord Ordinary is right in holding that the impediment to consummation is not 'unnatural narrowness,' but is, if not entirely, at anyrate partially, the result of age—or, in other words, of the operation of a natural cause—he thinks that, even if the libel had been differently framed, decree could not in the circumstances have been pronounced. The case of G. v. G., 22d June 1871, Law Rep. 2 Prob. and Div. p. 287, cited by the counsel for the pursuer, is not analogous, and indeed, so far as the Lord Ordinary is aware, there is no reported case in which the point in question was presented for decision, or was decided. But it is unnecessary, and consequently would not be proper, to come at present to a conclusion upon this point, because, if the fact be, as has been found by the preceding interlocutor, that the impediment to consummation is not that which has been libelled, the pursuer cannot succeed in the present action."

marry without hope of issue, but with the expectation of real commixtio corporum, which is the proper consummation of marriage, and the disappointment of that expectation by impotency arising from irremediable physical obstruction in the woman may entitle the man to a decree of declarator of nullity.

I am of opinion that such an irremediable physical obstruction to copulation has been proved to exist in the defender in this case, and that the pursuer is therefore entitled to judgment declaring the marriage null.

I cannot concur in the technical ground of judgment adopted by the Lord Ordinary, which, in my opinion, proceeds on too strict a reading of the summons.

LORD DEAS, LORD ARDMILLAN, and LORD MURE concurred.

LORD PRESIDENT.—If the marriage be null from the beginning there cannot be a forfeiture of the wife's interests as concluded for in the third conclusion of the summons.

The pursuer stated that the third conclusion in the summons was not the one applicable to an action for nullity of marriage, and ought to have been that the defender should be decerned to restore and deliver back to the pursuer all that she received from him on account of the marriage. He did not therefore insist on the third conclusion.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords having heard counsel for the pursuer—no appearance being made for the defender—on the reclaiming note for the pursuer against Lord Craighill's interlocutor, dated 9th December 1875, Recall the said interlocutor: Find and declare the pretended marriage betwixt the pursuer and defender to have been from the beginning, to be now, and in all time coming, null, and of no avail, force, strength, nor effect, with all that has followed thereupon; and divorce and separate the defender from the pursuer's society, fellowship, and company; and find and declare the pursuer to be in such case and condition as he was before the said pretended marriage, or as if he had never been contracted or married to the defender, and decern."

Gardner v. Gardner.

Parent and Child—Legitimacy—Proof of Paternity—Præsumptio pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant.—In an action of declarator and of putting to silence, at the instance of a man against a girl who claimed to be his legitimate daughter, the following facts were proved:—The pursuer had, after a somewhat prolonged courtship, married the mother of the defender when she was to his knowledge, and on her own confession, far advanced in pregnancy, but, according to her and the pursuer's statement, in consequence of intercourse with another man. When the child was born the husband and wife were living together as married people (in a hotel in Edinburgh, where they had gone for the occasion), and at the time neither of them said to any one that the pursuer was not its father. The child was removed within three days after her birth, and the pursuer paid aliment for her for sixteen years, but she saw neither her mother nor the pursuer till she was twenty-one; she then, in consequence of rumours which had reached her as to her parentage, demanded to be recognised as the daughter of the pursuer and his wife, but this was refused; the pursuer, however, sent her to school at his own expense, and supplied her with money for dress, &c. It was then for the first time stated to the defender that another man was her father, and at the request of the mother this man wrote letters practically admitting that he might be the father—but he subsequently, when examined as a witness for the pursuer, denied that he ever had connection with the mother. There was some evidence to the effect that the pursuer had admitted attempting to have connection with his wife before marriage.

Held, (1) in point of law, that the præsumptio pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant did not apply, the child not having been born justo tempore; but (2) in point of fact, that the pursuer had failed to make out his case, his own actings in marrying a woman whom he knew to be pregnant, and in not at once repudiating the child at birth, having raised a præsumptio hominis et facti, which the evidence he had adduced was insufficient to rebut.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Craighill. I.

ROBERT GARDNER raised this action against Mary Gardner, and concluded for declarator "that the defender is not the child of the pursuer, and farther, the defender ought and should be decerned and ordained to desist and cease in all time to come from asserting or otherwise representing directly or indirectly that she is the child of the pursuer, and she ought to be put to perpetual silence thereanent."

He averred that he married Eliza Brodie, now his wife, on 29th August 1850, that about a month previous to the marriage Miss Brodie had informed him that she feared she was with child to another man, whose name she did not disclose, and that these fears were afterwards confirmed by the late Dr Thatcher who examined her. That the marriage had nevertheless been gone on with, and that on 16th October 1850, about seven weeks after their marriage, Mrs Gardner was delivered of a female child—the defender. It was also stated that about a year after the birth of the defender Mrs Gardner, when seriously ill, mentioned to her husband for the first time that the father of the child was John Laidlaw, who at the time of the alleged conception was shepherd at her brother's farm of Cademuir where she resided prior to her marriage. Intercourse was alleged (Cond. 4) to have taken place on "two or more occasions," one of which was on Cademuir Hill near Peebles. The pursuer further alleged that in order to avoid scandal and to save his wife's reputation he had maintained the defender, though not in family with him, but that recently she had been giving out that she was his daughter, and had also been making such extravagant demands and claims upon him on the ground of their relationship as to render the action necessary.

The defender denied the statement as to John Laidlaw being her father, and adhered to her claim to be recognised as the daughter of the pursuer and his wife.

A proof was allowed to both parties, the result of which was shortly as follows:—The pursuer, who was at the date of the action seventy years of age, was the son and brother of ministers of the Church of Scotland, and had been himself an elder of that church since 1849. He had proposed for Miss Brodie's hand prior to 1839, but was rejected. He then went to Australia, whence he returned in 1846. After his return he renewed his acquaintanceship with Miss Brodie, who then resided at Cademuir farm with her brother. He became tenant of a farm called Traquair Knowe, about ten or twelve miles from Cademuir, in 1847, and lived there till some time after his marriage. Shortly after his return from Australia he had renewed his attentions to Miss Brodie, who was then between twenty-five and thirty years of age, and had eventually become engaged to her. Before the marriage day was fixed, however, she had told him that she feared she was with child to another man, who, she said, had forced her on Cademuir Hill,* but whose name she refused to tell. In consequence of this disclosure he induced her to go to the late Dr Thatcher senior, in Edinburgh, who examined her, and pronounced her far advanced in pregnancy. He himself then called upon Dr Thatcher, and was advised by him to marry her as soon as possible.† The marriage was accordingly solemnised within six weeks of the disclosure by Miss Brodie of her condition. The pursuer took his wife home, and after a stay of three weeks there she removed to the seaside for a month, and then came to Milne's Temperance Hotel, Edinburgh, where she was delivered of a female child on 16th October 1850, being attended at her confinement by Dr Thatcher, whom the pursuer called in, and to whom he paid a fee of £20. At the time of the child's birth no statement was made by the pursuer or his wife to the effect that she was not the daughter of the pursuer. The fact of his being the father was allowed to be assumed, and was so assumed by all the persons who came into contact with them.‡ Within two or three days of the birth of the child a

* The only evidence as to this interview and what passed at it was that of the pursuer and Mrs Gardner. The pursuer deponed in cross-examination,—"She did not at that time tell me who the father was. I asked her. (Q.) What answer did she make? (A.) That she had been waylaid by a blackguard on the hill, and abused." . . . "(Q.) Did you not press her for some further information than that she had merely been forced by a blackguard on the hill? (A.) Well, I pressed her, certainly, but I got no further information from her, excepting that she had been waylaid by a blackguard and abused." . . . . "(Q.) Did she not tell you that she expected to meet a man on the hill? (A.) No, she did not. (Q.) Did she lead you to understand it was a man she had never seen before, and whom she knew nothing about? (A.) She did."

He also deponed as regarded his motives for going on with the marriage,—"(Q.) When she made this communication to you were you afraid that if you broke off the marriage she might do herself an injury? (A.) I was under that impression. (Q.) Was she in a very agitated and despairing state? (A.) She was in a very excited and nervous state, and I was afraid she might do some rash act." . . . "We agreed that the marriage should take place, and that we should try to smother up the thing as much as possible."

Mrs Gardner deponed,—"I cannot tell exactly what my husband said when I told him that I was in the family way, but he was in a very distressed state. He said, however, that the marriage would still go on. (Q.) Do you mean to say that on that occasion Mr Gardner made no inquiry as to who was the father of the child? (A.) He made inquiry, but I did not tell him. (Q.) Why did you not tell him? (A.) Because I did not know what to do, I was in such a state myself. He did not press me to tell him."

† The only evidence on this point was the pursuer's on cross-examination,—"(Q.) The result of your talk with her was that you sent her to Dr Thatcher? (A.) She went in to him, and I also went in a day or two afterwards to call upon him. (Q.) Did Dr Thatcher say to you that if you were the man you ought to marry her at once? (A.) He advised the marriage to go on; at least I think he did. (Q.) Did he say that the girl was in the family way, and that if you were the man you should marry her at once? Don't take these words from me; but was anything of that kind said? (A.) He did not say if you are the man, but he recommended that the marriage should go on. (Q.) He recommended that somebody should marry her? (A.) He said that she was in that way certainly, but I led him to understand that I was not the father. I don't think that at the time when I went to see Dr Thatcher the time of our marriage had been fixed. (Q.) When you came from Dr Thatcher's you fixed the time of your marriage? (A.) The time was fixed. (Q.) Was it fixed immediately? (A.) Immediately. I cannot exactly state the time which elapsed between my visit to Dr Thatcher's and the fixing of our marriage-day, but it was a very short interval."

woman—then called Mrs Bennett, but afterwards married to a man named Hutchison—was employed to take the child away and rear her. The pursuer, through Dr Thatcher senior, until Dr Thatcher's death in 1853, paid £16 per annum for the board, &c., of the child, and after the death of Dr Thatcher senior, through his son, Dr Thatcher junior, he paid £14 per annum until 1866, when he ceased making these payments, having, as he said, thought that as the girl was then sixteen years old she ought to be earning her own living. The child had been taken to Loanhead by Mrs Hutchison, and was kept by her until she was old enough to work, when she commenced to work in a neighbouring paper mill. She had been called Mary Gardner by Mrs Hutchison, who so called her because she had heard her mother called Mrs Gardner in Milne's Hotel. When she was about sixteen she attracted the attention of the Rev. Mr Kay, the Free Church minister at Loanhead, whose church Mrs Hutchison and the defender attended. The Rev. Mr Kay discovered that she had never been baptised, and he baptised her as Mary.

In August 1872 the defender, who had heard through some friends of the existence and residence of the pursuer and Mrs Gardner, proceeded to Innerleithen, where they then resided, and asked to see Mrs Gardner, to whom she stated that she had heard she was her daughter. Nothing else occurred at that meeting, except that Mrs Gardner promised that Mr Gardner would write, and the defender returned to Loanhead. Subsequently the Rev. Mr Kay wrote to Mrs Gardner to the effect that he had discovered that she and her husband were the parents of the defender, and called upon them to acknowledge her. In consequence of this letter Mr Gardner went to Loanhead about the 30th of August 1872, and had one interview with Mr Kay alone, and another with him and the defender. At neither of these meetings did the pursuer admit that he was the defender's father, but instead, according to the statement of the Rev. Mr Kay in his evidence, gave an account of the manner in which his wife had been forced upon the hill by a man, in consequence of which she had become the mother of the defender.* As a result of these meetings, the senior at the time:—". . . Proper clothes to be furnished, and Dr T. will pay at present for the child's parents, but will not be responsible beyond the first year. Loanhead, Nov. 8th 1850."

* The Rev. Mr Kay's evidence on this point was as follows:—"There was a meeting held two days or so later, at which Mary was present. At that meeting, after reading some notes, he rose from his seat and turned to me, saying, 'As sure's death I'm no her father.' I caught him, and said, 'Then your wife's the mother, at least;' and he hesitated, and said, 'Y-y-yes.' That was the substance of the conversation. (Q.) Was anything said on that occasion about the meeting with Mrs Gardner and somebody else on the hill? (A.) Yes. He said that Mrs Gardner had been met by a man upon the moor, and that he was a poor working man, and that he had forced her, and that, having forced her, she was in this condition. I put the question to him, 'Where is that man?' He said he didn't know. I asked, 'Is he in the neighbourhood of your place, or in the neighbourhood just now?' He said, 'No, not just now.' 'Could he be found?' I asked. 'No,' he said. 'Where was he?' I asked. He said he thought he was not in the country at all, and that owing to his conduct with Mrs Gardner he had become a dissipated man. I have a distinct recollection of Mr Gardner telling me these things. I was anxious to trace out the matter if I could get any information about it."

The pursuer's evidence in cross-examination as to this was—"(Q.) Did you, on the 30th August 1872, which seems to have been your first meeting with Mr Kay after the girl appeared at Innerleithen, tell him that the person who met Mrs Gardner upon the hill was still living, but not in this part of the country? (A.) I can't say; but it is very likely that I would tell him that he was living.

pursuer, at the suggestion of the Rev. Mr Kay, sent the defender to the Free Church Normal School in Edinburgh, with a view to getting her educated as a teacher, and undertook the expense thereby incurred. About this time the defender commenced writing letters to the pursuer, in which at first, according to his statement, she addressed him as "Mr Gardner," or "Dear Mr Gardner." No letters so beginning were preserved, but the pursuer admitted that his impression was that in all of them she made plain her claim to be recognised as his child. The letters produced in process all began "Dear Father," or "My dear Father." About 16th April 1873, some eight months after the meeting last mentioned, the pursuer and Mrs Gardner went to Loanhead, to the Rev. Mr Kay's house, and the defender also came there to meet them by appointment. The Rev. Mr Kay's account of this meeting was to the effect that Mrs Gardner had given an account of the interview on Cademuir Hill, to which she attributed her becoming the mother of the defender, which differed from that previously given by the pursuer, particularly in her description of the man whom she met, and that he had then interrupted her, and a discussion had followed.* Mrs Gardner deponed that at that meeting she had offered to put her hand on the Bible and swear before

I don't remember, however, speaking about what part of the country he was in. (Q.) Did Mr Kay ask you if he could be found? (A.) It is very likely he did, but I can't say that I remember. (Q.) Did you answer to that that you did not think he could, and that you did not know where he was? (A.) I have no remembrance of having said so. (Q.) Do you think it is likely you said it, or unlikely? (A.) Unlikely, because I knew where he could be found; I knew where Laidlaw was. (Q.) Did Mr Kay ask you on that occasion when you heard last about the man? (A.) He may have done so, but I can't remember whether he did or not. (Q.) Did you not reply that he was at a great distance from the place, and that, as the result of his conduct with Mrs Gardner, he was a dissipated, broken-down, and wretched man, and had not been in this part of the country since? (A.) I think I told him that I understood he was inclined to dissipating, but as to the other part of what you have repeated I have no remembrance of it. I did not on that occasion tell Mr Kay who the man was nor where he was, but I can't say whether I told him what he was. I don't think I told him his business. (Q.) You gave no information on the matter at all? (A.) In fact, I wanted to give as little information as I could. I cannot say that I remember having said that the man who met Mrs Gardner at Cademuir Hill was a poor labouring man."

* The Rev. Mr Kay's evidence as to this was—"After we were all met, Mrs Gardner began to tell the story that she was met on the moor by a gentleman, gentlemanly dressed, and with a plaid about him; that this man muffled up in a plaid came up and forced her; that she had struggled; then rose and went away. That was the substance of what she told me. I at once said, 'There is a contradiction here between Mr Gardner and you, for he said he was a poor man not to be found in this part of the country, and you say he was a gentlemanly man.' She wished to back out of it, and I appealed to Mary by saying, 'Mary, were not these your mother's words?' Then she acquiesced in it. (Q.) Did Mr Gardner say anything about his having said he was a poor labouring man? (A.) He did. (Q.) Did he say anything about how he had said he was a poor labouring man, while Mrs Gardner represented him as in a different station of life? (A.) I remember distinctly; he was sitting on a chair, and he turned right round on it, and said, 'It is a mere war of words.' Nothing was said on these occasions about a man Laidlaw being Mary's father. His name was never mentioned. I cannot recall anything being said about the man's whereabouts on that second occasion."

This account was corroborated by the defender in her examination, but contradicted by the pursuer and Mrs Gardner.

No. 120. May 30, 1876. Gardner v. Gardner.

God that Mr Gardner was not the defender's father, but the Rev. Mr Kay would not allow her to do so.

The defender, in her account of this meeting, stated that while she was alone with her mother, before the Rev. Mr Kay and the pursuer joined them, her mother had admitted that the pursuer was the man she met on the hill, and that he was her father, and promised to write to her "and tell her something." This Mrs Gardner expressly denied, and there was no evidence in corroboration of the defender's statement, nor was any such letter produced; but the defender stated in cross-examination that she had received a letter, which she had burned. The Rev. Mr Kay also deponed that he had been shewn a copy of such a letter by the defender. The defender did not contradict her mother's statement to Mr Kay, but explained her conduct by saying, "she asked me not to tell."

About a year after this interview, as the defender still continued to write letters, and to assert her claim to be recognised, Mrs Gardner, without, as she said, the knowledge of her husband, again came to Loanhead, and offered the defender £500 if she would promise no longer to annoy her and her husband with letters and demands. This offer was, however, under the advice of the Rev. Mr Kay, refused, and the defender insisted upon being recognised as the daughter of Mr and Mrs Gardner.

The defender was after this removed by the pursuer to a boarding-school at St Andrews, where she remained, with a few intervals, for a year and some days, the pursuer paying for her board and education.

In March 1874 another meeting took place at Loanhead between the pursuer, his wife, the Rev. Mr Kay, and the defender. The Rev. Mr Kay's account of this meeting was—"Mr Gardner and I had a meeting in March 1874. Mrs Gardner and Mary were present. (Q.) Was anything said on that occasion by Mr Gardner as to anything taking place between him and Mrs Gardner prior to their marriage? (A.) Yes. By that time Mary told me her mother's story to her, and I told Mr Gardner what Mary had said, and amongst other things that Mrs Gardner had said that he had attempted to force her once, and also a second time. To which he returned answer, and said, 'Well, I confess having tried it once.' (Q.) That was, that he had endeavoured before marriage once to have connection? (A.) To force her. (Q.) To have connection? (A.) Yes. (Q.) What was it you understood that he had tried to do—to commit a rape, or to have connection with her? (A.) The position I put is this—'I am told that you had courted Mrs Gardner, and had frequent meetings with her, and that on one occasion you tried to force her, when she said she was unwell, and you didn't succeed. On a second occasion you had forced her, having trysted her to a different place, on the moor, and that you had succeeded only too well the second time.' He immediately added, 'Well, I confess to having tried it once.' He didn't confess to having been successful. It was at that meeting, immediately after the confession, that he made an offer of £1000. He just said, 'I am here to make a settlement.' Immediately after the confession he spoke of a settlement. He proposed to give Mary £40 a-year during his life, and £1000 at death, and as much clothing as she would take. (Q.) That offer was declined? (A.) No; but there was no written agreement about it; it was simply a promise. The promise was not carried out. Mr Gardner took dinner and tea with me that evening. At the beginning of the meeting he produced an affidavit* upon oath taken by Mrs Gardner, to the effect that

* This affidavit was as follows:—"I, Eliza Gardner, wife of Robert Gardner, John Laidlaw was the father. He also shewed me a letter of John Laidlaw's; and when he was going away he said, 'Now, this secret will go down with me to the grave.' I remember the words well."

The defender corroborated this statement, but the pursuer and Mrs Gardner denied that Mrs Gardner was present at this interview. The pursuer also denied that any such admission as is above given was made by him. He admitted, however, that he had made the money offer here spoken of, but added that it had been refused.

Although the name of Laidlaw was about this period for the first time mentioned to the Rev. Mr Kay and the defender as that of her father, both the pursuer and Mrs Gardner deponed that about a year after their marriage, on an occasion when Mrs Gardner supposed herself to be very dangerously ill, she had told the pursuer that John Laidlaw was the father of the defender. Laidlaw, it appeared, had been shepherd to Mrs Gardner's brother at Cademuir for some four years prior to the marriage of Mr and Mrs Gardner. Mrs Gardner deponed that Laidlaw never courted her, but that in the month of January or February 1850 she had met him on the hill by appointment, at a distance from assistance, and he had then forced her, and that the birth of the defender was the result of that intercourse.* It appeared that Mrs Gardner had, within the years 1874 and 1875, written to Laidlaw four or five letters as to their intercourse on Cademuir Hill, in consequence of the defender's claims. In March 1874 she wrote him, enclosing a threatening letter as to the defender's parentage addressed to Mr Gardner, and asked him to acknowledge himself to be her father.† To this letter he replied that if she swore that the child was his he would not deny it.‡ In April 1874 Mrs Gardner again wrote Laidlaw, urging

"Sworn before me at Kelso this twentieth day of March one thousand eight hundred and seventy-four. JAMES JOHNSTON, J.P. for county of Roxburgh."

* As to this Mrs Gardner deponed—"That is the only occasion on which I had connection with Laidlaw. (Q.) Did he force you? (A.) I could not resist on the hill; there was no one near me. (Q.) Did you resist as much as you could? (A.) Of course I did, but he had power over me. (Q.) Did you mention that to anybody that day or at any time? (A.) No; I did not mention anything about it until after my marriage. I cannot say if I met John Laidlaw the same night in my brother's kitchen, but I would likely meet him afterwards frequently in my brother's employment. (Q.) Was there any difference between you and John Laidlaw after what had happened on Cademuir Hill from what had been between you before? (A.) I shewed no difference before people. . . . . There was no difference in my conduct towards Laidlaw after the occurrence which I have described."

† This letter was in the following terms:—"Gattonside, Friday night.—Dear Sir,—Mr Gardner has got a threatening letter to-day, and I send you a copy of what I think you should write out, and sign and send it by return of post. The sooner that things are settled for I think I cannot stand it much longer.—Yours truly, E. GARDNER. P.S.—By doing this, it will be the only thing that will bring it to a settlement soon."

would have told me before you left Cademuir; at least you ought to have done so, for the truth saves one from much trouble afterwards. I cannot deny that we met that day on the hill; but I did not waylay you, for we met by appointment when you were going to Peebles. I often wonder I am spared; but I try, with aid from on high, to cast my burden upon the Lord, and I believe it is him that sustains me; and I trust never to see either his or her face again, after the way we have been used. She told Mr G. that I had bribed you with money to say you was her father. I cannot believe you would be guilty of such a lie. You need not be afraid of Mr Key claiming you as his father-in-law; but I pray to God that you will send me a written acknowledgment that she is your daughter. I would like to have it to shew him a copy of it, for without that he will put in the papers at the marriage daughter of Mr G. No fear of him putting daughter of Mr J. Laidlaw. But in next day's paper there would be a contradiction of it, and daughter of Mr John Laidlaw in place of Mr G.'s. When we meet before the judgment throne of God you will then can not deny her as your daughter, but I hope the Lord will open your heart to send me an answer in peace. I hope you will read this.—I remain, E. G. P.S.—If you like, I could send you a copy of my oath. If you send me what I want, you shall never be troubled with them nor me again."

† As follows:—"Peebles, April 10, 1874.—Mrs Gardner,—I did not intend to write till I was in Edinburgh, but I will not win before Thursday next. So you may expect word from me on Saturday morning. I had a visit from Mr Kay about a fortnight ago. He put several questions to me, and told me some things that I knew nothing about, but I told him that she might be to me, though you had never told me till now; but he said it would be a serious job for all that was concerned.—I am, yours, &c., JOHN LAIDLAW. P.S.—I have wrote this because I thought you would be getting out of patience; but if I could be made sure, I would not delay one moment in writing what you want."

‡ The Rev. Mr Kay deponed as follows regarding an interview he had with Laidlaw:—"My conversation with Laidlaw took place in a bedroom in his own house. We had a good deal of conversation about the matter, and I remember distinctly that, after talking about a number of things, he looked me broadly in the face, and said, 'If he took the child home to Traquair Knowe at first, there would be nought of this now.' He also said he could not take with the paternity of it; that he could not say he was the father. (Q.) Did he admit having connection with her? (A.) No; he never admitted having carnal connection with her. That was the kind of way in which he put it. He said he

Gardner v. Gardner.

He endeavoured to explain away the terms of his letter of 12th March 1874, by saying that he wrote it because he thought the defender and Mr Kay were being "too hard on" Mr and Mrs Gardner.

Mrs Hutchison, the woman who had nursed and brought up the defender, deponed that the monthly nurse, now dead, who attended Mrs Gardner at the defender's birth, told her that Mrs Gardner had said Mr Gardner was the father of the child. She also deponed, that when she got the child in Milne's Hotel, as there were no baby clothes ready, Mrs Gardner had said, "Give her her father's plaid," and that she had got a plaid marked with "R. Gardner," which had been afterwards returned through Dr Thatcher. This evidence as to the marking on the plaid was corroborated by a Mrs Grindlay, a friend of Mrs Hutchison's, who had seen the plaid in her possession. The pursuer and Mrs Gardner denied that he ever had had such a plaid.

It further appeared that the £40 annuity and the £1000 at his death, offered by the pursuer as mentioned above was a very liberal offer in his circumstances.

Mr and Mrs Gardner had two children of the marriage living in family with them.

On 15th November 1875 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"In the first place, finds, as matters of fact (1) that the pursuer was married to Mrs Eliza Brodie or Gardner in August 1850; that about six weeks after the marriage Mrs Gardner gave birth to a child, and that the child to which she then gave birth is the defender in the present action; and (2) that the defender never had carnal intercourse with his wife prior to their marriage, and, consequently, the defender is not and could not be the child of the pursuer: In the second place, finds as matter of law that, the facts being as above set forth, the defender is not entitled to assert or otherwise represent that she is the child of the pursuer: Therefore repels the defences, and finds, declares, and decerns in terms of the conclusions of the summons: Finds, in the circumstances, no expenses due, and decerns."*

had had nothing more than 'toozling.' (Q.) Did he deny the paternity? (A.) Yes; I am perfectly certain of that. (Q.) In what way did he put the denial? (A.) I put the question to him, 'Do you take with this child, and say it is yours?' He said, 'No, he could not say that.' I then said, 'Do you repudiate the paternity?' He said he did repudiate the paternity. I think that is the substance of what was said and the words. (Q.) You don't bind yourself down to exact expressions? (A.) I am giving it as near as my memory can recall it. I remember using the word repudiate—'Do you repudiate the paternity?' He said, 'Yes.' (Q.) There is no doubt that what you have told us is the substance of what took place? (A.) It is, decidedly. (Q.) And there was no doubt left on your mind as to what he said, and the position he took up? (A.) None whatever; I was convinced that Laidlaw was not the father. (Q.) You were convinced that he said so? (A.) Exactly so."

* "NOTE.—This is a remarkable case, and affords a new illustration of the old saying that 'truth is sometimes stranger than fiction.'

"The pursuer here seeks for a decree finding and declaring 'that the defender is not the child of the pursuer,' and decerning and ordaining the defender 'to desist and cease in all time to come from asserting or otherwise representing, directly or indirectly, that she is the child of the pursuer.' The defender resists such a decree upon the ground that she is, or at least, in the circumstances, must be held to be, the child of the pursuer.

"In the outset it may be premised that there is no doubt whatever that the defender was born after the pursuer's marriage, and that she is the child of the wife of the pursuer. The defender was taken away the day, or the next day

The defender reclaimed.

Argued for her;—Although the law of Scotland is not the same as the but one, after her birth; and for more than twenty years the child was not seen by the mother, nor the mother by the defender. But the identity of the defender with the infant to which Mrs Gardner gave birth in the circumstances to be immediately explained is abundantly proved, and, indeed, has never been disputed. The question, and the only question on which issue has been joined is,—'Whether that child is not also the child of the pursuer, the husband of Mrs Gardner.'

"Similar questions have often been raised, and almost as often decided. There is authority touching such cases as old as any that can be adduced in any department of the law; and whatever may be said of individual decisions, or the dicta of individual Judges, it is the fact that the law upon this subject has remained unchanged. A child born in wedlock has always been presumed to be a lawful child; in other words, to be a child of the husband of the mother. But in Scotland there never was a time when this presumption might not be overcome, provided the proof was sufficient. Each case, therefore, as it arose, was a case of circumstances; and the result depended upon the strength or weakness of the facts which were established.

"The strength of the presumption, it may be added, is itself affected by circumstances. There are expressions in some of the authorities which seem to imply that the presumption of paternity resulting from marriage with the mother previous to the birth of the child arises only when the marriage existed at the date when the child must have been begotten. But this, the Lord Ordinary thinks, is an erroneous view of the matter. Presumption there is when the child is born in wedlock, however soon the birth may have supervened. And, obviously, there is reason in this rule. Take the present case by way of illustration. The pursuer was married in August 1850. The defender was born in the ensuing October; the pursuer knew, before his marriage, that his wife was pregnant; and the fact that he married the mother of the defender, knowing at the time that she was with child, seems, according to every reasonable consideration, to suggest a presumption almost, if not altogether, as strong as would have existed if the pursuer had happened to be the husband of the defender's mother at the time of the defender's conception. No doubt the reasons for the presumption are not the same in the two cases. In the present case a moral element is the source from which the presumption is elicited. Can it be otherwise than presumed that a man who marries a woman, knowing that she is pregnant, is the father of the child? We are so constituted that we cannot help concluding that he is, unless the contrary be indubitably established. In the other case the presumption results from that which is taken for granted, the intercourse following upon marriage. But it is really almost, if not altogether, as conceivable that the intercourse to which the conception it to be ascribed is not intercourse with the husband, as that a man who knew his wife was pregnant when he married her should not have had intercourse with her before the marriage. The Lord Ordinary, therefore, regards the present case as one within the operation of the ordinary rule, that a child born in wedlock is to be presumed the child of the husband of its mother. The defender was born in wedlock; and so she must be held to be the child of the pursuer unless the contrary shall be proved to the satisfaction of the Court. Has the contrary been so established?

"In dealing with this question, the Lord Ordinary observes, in the outset, that here there is the oath of the pursuer, and there is also the oath of his wife, the mother of the defender, that there never was sexual intercourse between them until after their marriage. Mrs Gardner further swears that a man named Laidlaw, who is now a flesher in Peebles, but who, at the time when the defender was begotten, was a shepherd in Cademuir on her brother's farm, where she resided, is the father of the defender; and she describes the place where and the date at which the one act of copulation which produced her pregnancy occurred. Laidlaw was called as a witness for the pursuer; and if he, upon law of England, which provides that nothing can shake the absolute presumption in favour of the legitimacy of a child born even one hour after oath, had corroborated Mrs Gardner's testimony, there would have been, in the present case, all the proof which, even in the days when the rule pater est, &c. was most stringently applied, seemingly was required. But Laidlaw denied that there had been sexual intercourse between him and the mother of the defender; and consequently what has, in the circumstances, to be considered is, whether, without his evidence, or, to put the thing more strongly, despite of his evidence, the case of the pursuer has been established. Laidlaw's denial, the Lord Ordinary thinks, cannot be regarded as conclusive. Indeed, nothing said by Laidlaw can, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, be taken as true, because he so swears. His deposition abounds with contradictions as well as with palpable falsehoods, and is in most important particulars a flagrant example of wilful prevarication. His letters to Mrs Gardner, which were put before him, and upon which he was examined, are not of themselves evidence that the statements they contain, and the inevitable inferences these statements suggest, are true; but they prove, and in this way they are by the general tenor of his deposition amply corroborated, that he is a witness whose sworn testimony is not to be believed. The consequence is, as the Lord Ordinary conceives, that Laidlaw's evidence must in effect be disregarded. Corroboration of Mrs Gardner's testimony it certainly is not; and as a contradiction, which probably it was intended to be, it is self-condemned. All this, however, is subject to the observation that Laidlaw's conduct, when first informed of the defender's claim to be recognised as the child of the pursuer, and appealed to for an acknowledgment that he was the father, is something like real evidence of at least the probability of the story told by Mrs Gardner. She and Laidlaw had not met since her marriage to the pursuer in 1850; and there had, neither directly nor indirectly, been any communication between them till the first of Mrs Gardner's letters relative to the defender's pretensions was sent to him, less than two years ago. That the appeal which was then made should have been ventured upon if he could not have been the father of the defender is very unlikely; and it is far more unlikely that, on such a supposition, he could or would have answered that appeal in the way he did. He in effect admitted—for his letters will bear no other interpretation—that there had been intercourse; but he refused, without further assurance, to admit that the defender was his child. The position he took up was simply this,—'Intercourse there was, but it does not follow that the defender was my child. Satisfy me that she is, and the paternity will be admitted.' Strange it would be, very strange indeed, that a man should be selected, and a man, too, who, on his own shewing, had been in former days a lover, who, when asked to declare that the defender was his child, should meet in such a way such a request, if, at the time the defender must have been begotten that had not occurred between him and Mrs Gardner to which conception might be ascribed. Therefore, though the words of Laidlaw upon oath are not, the real evidence of his conduct is, the Lord Ordinary thinks, a corroboration, at least to some extent, of what has been sworn to by Mrs Gardner.

"Nevertheless, there is not his oath in corroboration; and so the consequence of the want of that must next be considered. The want is not necessarily a defect fatal to the case of the pursuer. Every such case, as has already been observed, is a case of circumstances; and if the evidence presented to the Court satisfactorily proves that the defender is not the child of the pursuer, judgment to that effect not only may, but must be pronounced. Bearing in mind, then, that there are the oaths of the pursuer and of Mrs Gardner, it remains to be seen whether, in addition to the element of corroboration afforded by Laidlaw's conduct which has already been mentioned, there is not something more, and that something of the most conclusive kind, by which the case of the pursuer is supported.

"The pursuer was married to Mrs Gardner in August 1850. His home was then at Traquair Knowe; but the defender, who was born six weeks after the marriage, was not born there. Nor was this an accident. It was pre-arranged. Mrs Gardner came to Milne's Temperance Hotel in Edinburgh, and there she gave birth to her child. The day after, or the next day but one, the infant was taken away. Everything connected with the event was, to use the words of Mr Milne, the hotel-keeper, 'shrouded in mystery.' And so well was this mystery maintained, that for more than twenty years neither the defender, nor the nurse who took her away, knew or suspected where either parent was to be found. Mother, indeed, as well as father, remained to the defender, to her nurse, to those among whom she lived, to every one who took an interest in her, utterly unknown. Board for the defender was paid quarterly by Dr Thatcher, the money being provided by the pursuer till the defender was fourteen years old. Then she was left to provide for herself, which she did for more than six years by working in one of the mills near Loanhead. Such is the defender's history. On the question whether this treatment was right or wrong opinions may differ; but the Lord Ordinary thinks opinions cannot differ as to the difficulty, if not the impossibility, of reconciling it with the idea that the defender is the child of the pursuer, or that there had been intercourse between the pursuer and the mother of the child in which its conception might have originated. Acts are often as strong evidence as words; and, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, the conduct of the pursuer testifies as strongly as his oath that the defender is not, and could not be, his child.

No. 120. marriage, still there is always a presumption in favour of legitimacy.[1] If the conception can have taken place subsequently to the marriage, a presump-

"If the pursuer and Mrs Gardner are to be believed the case of the pursuer is complete; but there are circumstances, on the strength of which the counsel for the defender contended in the course of an argument remarkable for its ability, that even allowing for such elements of real or supposed corroboration as exist, the testimony of the pursuer and Mrs Gardner on the cardinal point is not to be trusted. As regards the pursuer, it was said that the idea of his marriage, in the knowledge that Mrs Gardner was with child, is so inherently incredible that, whatever be the confirmatory evidence, it must be rejected. Improbable it is, certainly, but not necessarily incredible. In affairs of love it has often been said—and the saying has often been verified—'there is nothing too strange to be true.' The pursuer had long courted the woman who is now his wife; he was deeply in love; and, though he was shocked by the announcement that she was with child to another man, his attachment remained unbroken; and this proved stronger than his self-respect. He acted under a double impulse. His affections could not be extinguished; and, moreover, he both desired and hoped that if he married his sweetheart things could be so arranged that her shame, which otherwise must inevitably have been divulged, and his own weakness, would remain concealed. The fact is, that for twenty years both were concealed. Not a relative, not a neighbour, not one interested in the pursuer or in Mrs Gardner, knew or imagined what has now been revealed to the world. This expectation, therefore, was not unreasonable; and, consequently, it cannot be unreasonable to conclude that it might be entertained.

"The payments made by the pursuer for the support of the defender during the first fourteen years of her life, and the offer of a large sum provided her claim to be considered his child were withdrawn, were also, in the argument of the defender's counsel, alleged to be virtual confessions of paternity. The Lord Ordinary, however, cannot so regard them. If the birth was to be concealed, plain it is that the cost of the child's living must, at least in its early years, be provided; and the end to be served was held so important, that the pecuniary cost was held as of comparatively no consideration. Besides, a refusal to pay aliment would not have secured immunity from liability. Mrs Gardner, at any rate, would have been liable for the support of her child; and from her husband, it might have turned out, her debt could be exacted. With reference, again, to tion is raised in the law of Scotland which can only be rebutted by proof of the absence of the husband.[1] Here the child was born after the marriage, and the sum offered by the pursuers for an abandonment of the defender's claim, the view of the Lord Ordinary is that it is not a confession, but a protest against the reality of the defender's pretension. What he was willing to give for her disavowal was far more than she could now or afterwards extort as his child; and the knowledge that she is not, and could not be his, affords the only reasonable explanation of this part of the pursuer's conduct.

"With reference to Mrs Gardner, the strongest observation made upon her evidence was, that it was not consistent with what she said in childbed, when the infant was about to be taken away by the nurse. 'Wrap it up in its father's plaid' are the words imputed to Mrs Gardner; and assuming that she used them, the argument is that they overthrow everything which subsequently was said or done inconsistent with the idea that the defender is the child of the pursuer. Upon this point the Lord Ordinary has to say, first, that the evidence as to the use of the words in question is not all one way. Mrs Gardner repudiated the expression imputed to her; and in some things the evidence of Mrs Hutchison, on whom the defender so much relies, is open to unfavourable criticism. But, secondly, even if the Lord Ordinary were to take for truth all that has been said by Mrs Hutchison, he would not think the use of the words in question such a circumstance as overcomes all the other facts in the case. There is an explanation which seems satisfactory. Mrs Gardner, in the hotel where the child was born, was not spoken of by any one or regarded by any one as anything but a married woman; but everything excepting the name she bore was a mystery. Neither the people in the hotel, nor the monthly nurse, nor the nurse who took away the child, were told or otherwise knew or had the slightest suspicion of who or what Mr Gardner was, or where he lived; and so Mrs Gardner may have thought that the words in question contained no revelation. Looking at them in the light in which they may now be read, the Lord Ordinary's opinion is that they leave unshaken the proof by which the cardinal point in the case is, he thinks, established.

"Unfavourable comments were made upon other parts of the evidence given by Mr and Mrs Gardner. Their statements in particular points were contrasted with those of the defender, and the defender's friend and adviser, the Rev. Mr Kay. Well, there is a discrepancy. Everything said by all four cannot be reconciled. But it does not follow from this that Mr and Mrs Gardner are the witnesses who, in this conflict of testimony, are on the points in question to be disbelieved. The evidence of the defender is, in many particulars, weakened by contradictions, not merely of others, but of her own; and the least that can be said is, that it would be a strong thing to hold her in the right, and Mr and Mrs Gardner in the wrong, upon all or even upon any of the matters as to which there is contrariety of opinion. Mr Kay, again, has made himself as much a party in the case as if he were personally interested in the result; and on the question of comparative credibility the Lord Ordinary sees nothing in the evidence, and he saw nothing in the demeanour of Mr and Mrs Gardner, calculated to suggest or warranting, upon a dispassionate view, the suggestion that they in anything they said were consciously giving what they knew was testimony inconsistent with the truth.

"As to the law of the case parties may be said to be agreed, and therefore the Lord Ordinary thinks it unnecessary to comment upon, or even to mention, all the authorities which were cited for his information. All, and more than all, which have been brought forward on this occasion will be found collected in Brodie v. Dyce, 29th November 1872, 11 Macph. p. 142, the latest of the cases in which a question any way analogous to the present was decided by the Court.

"The Lord Ordinary has now explained his views of this case. These have

riage, but at such time that it could not have been conceived subsequent to the marriage; but still the maxim pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant was broad enough to entitle the defender to the benefit of the presumption, and that being so the question came to be, had it been rebutted by the pursuer. The fact of a man who was courting a woman, and so on intimate terms with her, marrying her in the full knowledge of her pregnancy, raised a strong presumption that he was the father of her child.[1] Stair had laid it down that the concurrent testimony of the husband and wife that the child was not the husband's but that of another man, as to whom they both agree, along with the admission of paternity by the other man, was sufficient to rebut the presumption in such a case as this.[2] But the pursuer's evidence did not come up to this—Laidlaw denied the paternity. In order to make out such a case as the pursuer here required to establish before he could succeed the evidence must be clear, consistent, and leave no room for doubt.[3] Here there was throughout the whole of the evidence of the pursuer and Mrs Gardner contradictions and inconsistencies. When the actings of the pursuer with regard to this child were examined it would be seen that though they may have been unnatural they were not inconsistent with his being the father. He held, at the time of his marriage, a respectable position, and if he had been detected as having committed antenuptial fornication he would have fallen under the jurisdiction of the Church Courts, and both he and his wife would have been disgraced. Subsequently, he would have a feeling of aversion to one whom he had wronged so deeply as he had the defender. As regarded Laidlaw's evidence and the Lord Ordinary's remarks thereon, if the witness was not to be believed when he denied the paternity of the defender, neither could he be taken as supporting the pursuer's case.

been formed after anxious consideration. He is sensible of its importance, but he has no misgivings as to the way in which it ought to be decided. He hopes that, in coming to his conclusion, he has not been unconsciously biassed by a circumstance to which he has not hitherto alluded, and indeed to which no allusion was made by counsel upon either side of the bar. That circumstance is, the resemblance existing, as the Lord Ordinary thinks, between the defender and the witness Laidlaw. Of the reality of this likeness the Lord Ordinary is persuaded, but whether it can be regarded by others as more than a fancy, seeing that it was not even hinted at directly or indirectly by the counsel for the pursuer, is a question more easily asked than answered. Be this as it may, the Lord Ordinary has not made his impression a ground of judgment; and he has explained what he has set forth in this paragraph of his note, because it is possible, though he regards it as improbable, that his views of the case may to some extent have been unconsciously influenced by a consideration, for which, as things are, the only warrant is his own observation.

"The Lord Ordinary has only to add in conclusion that, though he considers the defence unfounded, he thinks it was only natural and reasonable in the circumstances that it should be submitted for judgment of the Court. This is the reason for which expenses have not been awarded."

monstrant did not apply.[1] Any presumption which could arise was one of circumstances—a præsumptio hominis vel facti—which could be rebutted by ordinary evidence such as had been led here.[2] If the pursuer really was the father of the defender he had no adequate reason or temptation to tell untruths about the paternity. But if his own statement were true he had every reason to conceal the truth and preserve his wife's character and cover his own disgrace by quietly admitting the defender's claim. It was contrary to all human experience for a father and mother to cast off their own child.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question we have to decide in this case is whether the pursuer has established that the defender is not his child, and according as that question is decided the remainder of the conclusions of the summons will fall to be determined. The action is one of putting to silence at the instance of an alleged parent against one who asserts that she is his legitimate child. It is an unusual action, as generally the assertion of legitimacy comes from the child, and the father is content to deny the rights of legitimacy until they are established and enforced. I do not see, however, that the action is incompetent, although I do not recollect to have met with an instance of it before. But the pursuer of it undertakes a more weighty burden of proof than if he stood on the defensive.

The case in its detail is a very singular one, and raises questions of importance to the parties, and of some novelty in the law. The undisputed facts are shortly these:—The pursuer, who seems to be in a respectable position in life, had offered marriage to his present wife, who was then Miss Brodie, several years before 1846. She refused him at that time. He went to Australia and returned in 1846, and after some years' courtship he again proposed and was accepted, and they were married in August 1850. At that time Mrs Gardner was pregnant, and it appears that prior to the marriage she had consulted Dr Thatcher of Edinburgh as to her condition, with the knowledge of her intended husband. The marriage took place, and six weeks or two months afterwards the pursuer brought her to Milne's Hotel, in Edinburgh, privately, where she was confined of a daughter, who is the defender in the present action. The infant was immediately given to the care of a nurse, by whom she was carried away and consigned to the charge of a Mrs Hutchison, with whom she resided until very recently. The pursuer made remittances through Dr Thatcher for many years, and apparently the girl was maintained in comfort; but from the time of her birth until 1872, a period of nearly twenty-two years, she never had any personal communication with her mother or the pursuer, although she had become aware of her supposed parentage, and had latterly communicated by letter with the pursuer, chiefly in the way of demands for money. In the end she asserted her right to be recognised as his daughter, and through the Rev. Mr Kay, the Free Church minister at Loanhead, near Lasswade, some communications passed on that subject. In 1874, for the first time, the pursuer alleged that the defender's father was a man of the name of Laidlaw, at Peebles, with whom her mother had been intimate before his marriage, and in consequence of continued assertions by the defender the present action of putting to silence has been raised. The Lord Ordinary has decerned in terms of the conclusions of the summons, after considering a concluded proof, and has found that the pursuer was not and could not have been the father of the defender, and we are now to review his judgment.

There are two opposing theories to account for the conduct of the pursuer and Mrs Gardner in this matter. One is that of the pursuer himself. He says that his intended wife communicated to him, some weeks before the marriage, that she was in the family-way, but without mentioning the name of her seducer; that she had been taken advantage of on one occasion on the hill, and that her condition was the result. He states that, seeing no other way to save her reputation, he hastened the marriage, and adopted the other steps which I have described, but that the child was not his daughter, and that any other proceeding on his part could only have frustrated his object, and given notoriety to what he was anxious to conceal. The other theory is that the pursuer, being the son of a minister, and the brother of a minister, and himself an elder of the church, adopted these proceedings for the purpose not of screening his wife but of screening himself; that he was himself the father of the child, and kept its birth secret to avoid the personal and family scandal which it would have occasioned.

It is impossible not to see that what he did might have proceeded from either of these motives. If in reality he was not the father of the child, and resolved to proceed with the marriage notwithstanding, a course not very reconcileable with the ordinary motives of human nature, the steps which he adopted were those by which alone his object could be obtained. As a single woman it was impossible for Mrs Gardner to have been confined without inquiry and detection, and to expect him, after the sacrifice which he says he made, forthwith to proclaim his wife's frailty, and to make a charge against another which he probably felt he might not be able to prove, would be entirely inconsistent with any view of the fact, and the prolonged cross-examination on this head seems to me entirely without point. In that view, however ill-judged his conduct was, it was not destitute of humanity even to the object of it, for the disclosure of the paternity which he alleges, while it would have disgraced his wife, could have been of no benefit to her daughter. On the other alternative, his conduct would be without defence, for, on that assumption, he sacrificed the status of his legitimate daughter to his own reputation and position in the world.

In cases of this kind, relative to status and legitimacy, especially where the interval of time has been great, more light is to be derived from the presumptions of law and fact raised by the conduct of the parties than can be gained from direct evidence. But before I deal with the presumptions which arise in this case I shall very shortly state the impression which the direct testimony has made on my mind.

The contention of the pursuer is that he is not and could not have been the father of the defender, but that the father is the witness Laidlaw, who at that time was a shepherd in the employment of Mrs Gardner's brother at Cademuir, where he was for ten years from 1846. As far as the pursuer's own evidence is concerned he knew of his wife's intimacy with this man only from her own statement, she having disclosed his name a year after the marriage, when she thought herself dying. Beyond this his testimony only amounts to a denial of any improper intimacy with his wife before marriage. But Mrs Gardner is examined, and tells the story in detail. She says in substance that on one occasion, several months before her marriage, she met Laidlaw on the hill by appointment, and that the intercourse then took place which resulted in the birth of the child. It is impossible to deny that the coincident testimony of the husband and wife is an important element in the case, and has always been so considered in questions of this kind; so much so, that both Craig and Stair lean to the doctrine that the concurrent testimony on oath of the father and mother will be sufficient to overcome the presumption arising from a child being both conceived and born in wedlock. Though I cannot hold this to be law it is still a very important element in this case that not the husband only but the wife also, the mother of the child, encounters the disgrace which the confession implies, and states on oath that not he but Laidlaw was the father. I am very far, however, from saying that the mere statement of the husband and wife is necessarily sufficient to decide the legitimacy of the defender. It would be hazardous to make any such assumption.

The case, however, does not rest there, for Laidlaw, the shepherd, is examined, and he admits that he did meet Mrs Gardner on the hill by appointment. Indeed he says that they often so met; that he sat for an hour with her under the same plaid; that endearments passed between them; and although he denies that they resulted in intercourse, it is quite clear, from the expressions in the letters written shortly before his examination, and from his answers when examined upon them, that these equivocal denials truly amount to an affirmative of the fact which he was intended to prove. I may observe in passing, that of the competency of admitting his testimony and importing into it the letters, the writing of which he acknowledged on oath, I have not the slightest doubt, nor does it signify to the substantial result of his testimony, that though an interested and reluctant witness, he was called for the pursuer.

I am of opinion, therefore, that as far as that fact is material in the case it has been proved that Mrs Gardner had improper intercourse with this man Laidlaw before her marriage. But assuming this to be so, there is one very serious defect in the evidence in establishing the proposition contained in the summons. Laidlaw does not and cannot fix the time of this event. Indeed his letters indicate this very plainly. Notwithstanding his futile attempts to explain away the expressions contained in them, they truly mean nothing but this,—What you say as to our intimacy is quite true, but before I can say I am the father of your child you must satisfy me as to when this took place, for I do not recollect it, and if you meant to make this charge you should have done it four-and-twenty years ago.

Such, shortly, is the case of the pursuer on the direct evidence, and the Lord Ordinary, who saw the witnesses, takes the same view of its import. But it is manifest that the intimacy with Laidlaw, even were the time proved, is only half the pursuer's case. He has still to prove—and he undertakes the negative—that he had no intercourse with Mrs Gardner before marriage. Now, on this point there is one consideration, and one only, which is material in the direct evidence for the defender. I attach no importance whatever to the account given by the defender of her conversation with her mother. I think it bears improbability on the face of it. It is impossible to suppose that the mother, who had gone to Loanhead for the purpose of satisfying Mr Kay that Laidlaw was the father of her child, should, immediately after she had made that statement, have told her daughter a story exactly the reverse, knowing, as she must have known, that it would be immediately repeated. The story itself is absurd, for she represents her mother as saying that the man she met on the hill was the pursuer, it being quite certain, on the one hand, that she met Laidlaw on the hill, and equally certain, on the other, that the pursuer would never have chosen such a place for an assignation with his promised wife. The defender, a few minutes afterwards, heard the reverse stated by the pursuer in Mr Kay's presence without remark, because, as she now says, she was pledged not to tell, and she straightway proceeded to put Mr Kay in possession of this alleged communication. Looking to the statement which she makes about the letter which she says her mother wrote to her, which, if it had been preserved, would have been conclusive of this case, I am not disposed to attach weight to her unsupported testimony.

But Mr Kay's evidence stands in a very different position. He distinctly speaks to the pursuer having confessed to him that he had taken liberties with his wife before marriage. I cannot discard this evidence as worthless. It is exceedingly material, although not in itself conclusive. I may add, on this point of the case, that the communications with Dr Thatcher seem all to have proceeded on the footing that the pursuer was the father of the child, although that also is not irreconcileable with the design which the pursuer professes to have been anxious to accomplish.

If the evidence rested there I should have found it to be distressingly perplexing, and I should have doubted whether, although the balance might incline to the affirmative of the summons, the proposition contained in it was proved. I do not regard as of any consequence the alleged inconsistencies in some of this testimony. They are almost inseparable from an investigation of this nature. But if it remains doubtful, as I think it does, first, whether the intimacy with Laidlaw corresponded in point of time with the birth of the child, and secondly, whether the pursuer had taken liberties with Mrs Gardner before marriage, the pursuer cannot prevail. But I pass from the direct testimony to what I consider of far more importance in this case, the presumptions derivable from the conduct of the parties.

We must assume that, in our own law, which in this respect differs from that of England, the application of the maxim, pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant, depends not on the time of the birth but on the time of conception. That has long been a controversy among Continental jurists; and there will be found in the 17th vol. of the French Causes Célèbres a case before the Senate of Turin having features in some respects analogous to the present, with very full and learned arguments on both sides of this question. But with us all our institutional writers are agreed that such is our law. It by no means follows that the fact that the child is born in wedlock may not raise a presumption of fact of the greatest possible moment, and even in those systems which, like our own, reject the maxim as a presumption de jure, where the birth is not in what is called justo tempore, that fact has often been accorded the greatest possible importance. I cannot better express the view which I take of the Scottish law on this matter than in the words of Sir Ilay Campbell, as noted in his Session Papers in the case of Lepper, Hume, 488. "Case of a child produced five months, and no more after the marriage took place. Pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant does not seem to apply. It may perhaps in dubio be presumed that the husband had antenuptial dealings with the woman, but this is a much weaker presumption depending on circumstances, and not præsumptio juris et de jure. All that can be said is that the favour is for legitimacy, i.e. legitimation per subsequens matrimonium, which our law allows, and therefore will presume this rather than bastardy, if no circumstances to the contrary appear. But here the circumstances are almost conclusive that Brown is the father." See Session Papers, vol. 107, No. 72, Fac. Lib.

We must look, therefore, to what the presumptions are deducible from the conduct of the parties. One thing the pursuer has in his favour. He did not treat the defender as his legitimate daughter. He sent her away and kept her out of sight, and therefore she had no reputation of the status of being legitimate. But, on the other hand, there are these four considerations, which tend very strongly in an opposite direction: They are, first, that Mrs Gardner's pregnancy took place during the pursuer's courtship, and was followed by marriage; secondly, that the pursuer admits that he was aware of her condition when he married her; thirdly, that the pursuer did not openly disclaim the child or charge any one else with being her father, but, on the contrary, assumed the burden of her maintenance and education as incumbent on himself; and, lastly, that he never said to any one that he was not the father, or put the paternity on Laidlaw, for four-and-twenty years.

As to the first, the presumption arising from courtship and subsequent marriage, I may refer to an opinion of the celebrated Chancellor D'Aguesseau, recounted by Merlin in his Repertoire,—a work which, under the head of Legitimité, contains the fullest desertation on this subject of which I am aware. It will be found at page 230. The French law coincided with ours in regard to the maxim, pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant; and D'Aguesseau, speaking of the presumption which may arise, when the child is born in wedlock but not justo tempore, puts the two cases of the marriage being anterior to the time of conception, and the intercourse not being followed by marriage at all; and then he proceeds,—"But if there be found at the same time both an intimacy (frequentation) at the time of conception and also a marriage at the time of the birth, can one not say that these two facts united form a presumption less strong, it is true, than the first, because it is absolutely founded on marriage, but much stronger than the second, because it is not founded solely on the previous intimacy, and that the marriage which followed gives it a degree of force of evidence and of authority which it is almost impossible to resist." This dictum, from so high an authority, is followed by a detail of several cases, one of which, that of L'Heritier, bears a very singular resemblance to the present, and in it the legitimacy of the child was sustained. I cannot but regard as a very important circumstance that the conception took place during the period of the pursuer's courtship, and that it was followed by marriage. But the second consideration which I mentioned adds infinite force to the first, for it is not only a presumption of fact, but it is a conclusion founded on the ordinary laws of social action, that if a man marries a woman in that condition it is because it is the only reparation he can make her. It may not be so in point of fact, but he who follows this course must expect to have the ordinary convictions of society applied to him. I do not say that the presumption may not be overcome, although that has been the law of England for centuries; and even Craig, in his treatise, sneers at this peculiarity of the law of England, which he thinks inconsistent with their rejection of legitimation by subsequent marriage. But the force attributed to such an act by great lawyers receives a strong testimony from the fact that the Code Napoleon, while following the civilians who hold the right of the husband to disclaim a child not born justo tempore, provides, in the 314th article,—"A child born within 180 days from the marriage shall not be disavowed by the husband in the following cases,"—and the first of the cases is,—"If he had knowledge of the pregnancy before marriage." We do not and cannot follow this as authority, nor should I lay down the rule in these terms, but I think that, coupled with the previous courtship, it lays upon the pursuer an obligation of unquestionable proof, which he has not been able to sustain.

As regards the third, that the husband never publicly disavowed the child but continued to aliment and support it, while it does imply that he was ashamed of its birth, implies also an admission of his parental obligation; or even if it did not necessarily support that inference, it is inconsistent with that of prompt, distinct, and unequivocal repudiations, which is essential to prevent the legitimate construction which the public and the law will put upon his acts. Here, again, the Code Napoleon furnishes an illustration, for it goes so far as to provide, sec. 316,—"In the different cases where the husband is authorised to disavow, he must do so within a month if he be on the spot where the infant is born." Lastly, the lapse of time, for which the pursuer is entirely responsible, raises the strongest presumption against his attempt, after the lapse of twenty-four years, when many of the witnesses who could have given testimony must be dead, the events passed from memory, and most of the details unknown, to deny the paternity which he has practically assumed during the whole period, and to fix that paternity on another who never heard of the charge during the whole of that interval. I think that would, in many cases, and would in this, be of the most dangerous results to the public. The status of legitimacy is matter of public policy, and depends more, as I have said, on presumptions arising from conduct than on direct evidence of a fact on which certainty never can be attained. The story of the pursuer may be true, but his conduct, in my opinion, has precluded him from proving it.

Lord Neaves.—The conclusion I have arrived at is the same as that reached by your Lordship, and the grounds on which I have come to that conclusion are in every important particular similar to those you have stated.

The law makes a general presumption of legitimacy in favour of all the lieges, even where the parentage is unknown,—that is, ex quocunque patre. There is another presumption, founded on the maxim pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant, but this only arises in full force where the child is born at such a time that it could have been begotten during the subsistence of the marriage. There is not the same presumption where the child is born within too short a time after marriage—say, two or three months. In such a case other facts must concur to infer legitimacy. That is the opinion of Erskine and other authorities, and it is a reasonable rule.

A child born two or three months after marriage might rather be presumed to be that of another man than the woman's present husband. Take the case of a married woman whose husband dies and who marries again in three months,

Gardner v. Gardner.

" or ere those shoes were old with which she followed" her first husband's body. Then, if a child is born in other three months, that child would be presumed to be the child of the first husband.

I doubt much whether, in such an inquiry, it is relevant to consider whether some man other than the woman's husband might or might not be the father of the child. The question rather is, whether the man pointed out by the marriage is or is not presumably the father. I doubt if the complexion of a child would entitle any one to fix the paternity of that child. Similarity or dissimilarity and possibility are not the questions in such a case. In a case such as the present we must be guided by the additional circumstances which come in aid of the presumption, such as it is, which is raised here. The presumption is not full, because the child was born at a time when it undoubtedly could not be the fruit of the marriage. What is to be found is whether any, and what circumstances, in addition to the fact of marriage, exist, so as to strengthen whatever presumption is raised by the leading fact. I think that if a man marries a woman who is visibly pregnant at the time this will strengthen the presumption, if not make it insuperable. It is contrary to the nature of men's minds for a man to marry a woman who is about to produce the child of another man. Cases have occurred where women so marrying have not known that they were pregnant, and in that case the husband would probably be equally ignorant. But the case before us is one where the pregnancy was well known both to the wife and to the husband. Not only had the husband been told by the woman, but, at his suggestion or desire, Dr Thatcher was consulted, and advised an early marriage. That marriage took place, and then the parties came to Edinburgh, and Dr Thatcher was called in in a regular way to attend the confinement. I have no doubt that Dr Thatcher lived and died in the belief that this child was the result of connection between these two married persons, who had presumably anticipated their marriage, and to whom he had given the advice.

Moreover, we must look to the behaviour of this pursuer at and immediately after the birth of the child. He allowed it then to be considered and treated as his own. I am of opinion that a man who so deals with a child as his own, and allows it to be reputed his at birth, raises the strongest possible presumption in favour of the legitimacy of that child and of his own paternity. If a married woman gives birth to a child, it seems to me that her husband must at once make up his mind whether he will repudiate it or not. He cannot and ought not to play a double part—first recognising it, and then repudiating it. I need not go through the other circumstances of the case noticed by your Lordship. I think it sufficient to say that there was neither impossibility nor improbability in the supposition that the pursuer was the true father of the child. The parties were acquainted and on intimate terms. The woman was not of inaccessible virtue, and the pursuer was not averse to taking liberties. It was natural that though she was his child he should keep her out of the way for a time so that the chronology of events might not excite remark, and that after a time he might be averse to bring her back where she might take precedence of his other children; but his supporting her so long through Dr Thatcher, and his never telling her who her father was, if she had another father, is inexplicable, and if true would have been unjust and reprehensible. Altogether, I am of opinion that the rules of law in such delicate questions require that we should negative the conclusions of this action.

Gardner v. Gardner.

LORD ORMIDALE.—As observed by the Lord Ordinary, this is a remarkable case; and, I may add, one, as well in its form as in its circumstances, of a very unusual description. No objection, however, has been taken to its competency, and I do not say that it is incompetent. But there can be no doubt that the pursuer in such a case, having regard to all its circumstances, and the decree of declarator, concluded for to the effect that the defender is not his child, and that she "ought and should be decerned and ordained to desist and cease in all time to come from asserting or otherwise representing, directly or indirectly, that she is the child of the pursuer, and that she ought to be put to perpetual silence thereanent," undertakes a very onerous burden, and one of which he cannot, I think, be relieved except on the clearest and most conclusive evidence.

I am not, however, to be understood to mean that the pursuer is confronted with the maxim pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant in the sense that he must be held to be the father of the defender in respect she was born, although not conceived, in wedlock, unless he proves the impossibility of his being so from impotency, or want of opportunity of intercourse, owing to absence from the country, or other circumstances. On the contrary, the proved and undisputed fact that the defender was born within two months after the pursuer's marriage to her mother must be held, on the authorities cited in the course of the argument, to render inapplicable the maxim referred to. It rather appears to me, therefore, that the Lord Ordinary, while he has decided against the defender, has extended and applied the maxim pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant too favourably for her, keeping in view the short time which elapsed between the date of the marriage of the pursuer with her mother and her birth.

But although the defender can, in the circumstances, take little or no benefit from the presumption embodied in the maxim referred to, there are other presumptions arising from the circumstances of the case which the pursuer has to contend with, and to overcome, before he can succeed.

There is the presumption arising from the circumstance that some time—according to the pursuer, four or five weeks—before his marriage with the defender's mother, he became fully aware that his wife was with child. That he should, notwithstanding this, have married the defender's mother, assuming that he was the father of her child, is quite intelligible, and not surprising. By doing so he only made her the reparation which was due from him, and to which she was entitled. And besides, by marrying the mother at the time he did, he would not only legitimate his offspring, but also make it certain that his child would be born in wedlock. It is to be presumed that a person not insane but in the full possession of his faculties, as the pursuer was, intended what his acts and conduct were calculated fairly and reasonably, if not necessarily and unavoidably, to lead to. On the other hand, it is all but incredible that the pursuer, an educated man of mature years (about forty-five), and occupying a respectable position, should have voluntarily and deliberately married the defender's mother in the knowledge that she was far advanced in pregnancy with a child which could not possibly be his, but the fruit of her connection with some other man, and that, too, while—if he is to be believed—he was paying his addresses to her in honourable courtship. The presumption is, to my mind, all but irresistible, that neither the pursuer, nor any individual circumstanced as he was, would have so acted. To suppose the contrary would be to disregard all the ordinary motives and springs of human action. Nor do I think it improves the position of the pursuer, but, on the contrary, renders his conduct all the more unaccountable, that

Gardner v. Gardner.

Lord Ormidale.—As observed by the Lord Ordinary, this is a remarkable case; and, I may add, one, as well in its form as in its circumstances, of a very unusual description. No objection, however, has been taken to its competency, and I do not say that it is incompetent. But there can be no doubt that the pursuer in such a case, having regard to all its circumstances, and the decree of declarator, concluded for to the effect that the defender is not his child, and that she "ought and should be decerned and ordained to desist and cease in all time to come from asserting or otherwise representing, directly or indirectly, that she is the child of the pursuer, and that she ought to be put to perpetual silence thereanent," undertakes a very onerous burden, and one of which he cannot, I think, be relieved except on the clearest and most conclusive evidence.

I am not, however, to be understood to mean that the pursuer is confronted with the maxim pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant in the sense that he must be held to be the father of the defender in respect she was born, although not conceived, in wedlock, unless he proves the impossibility of his being so from impotency, or want of opportunity of intercourse, owing to absence from the country, or other circumstances. On the contrary, the proved and undisputed fact that the defender was born within two months after the pursuer's marriage to her mother must be held, on the authorities cited in the course of the argument, to render inapplicable the maxim referred to. It rather appears to me, therefore, that the Lord Ordinary, while he has decided against the defender, has extended and applied the maxim pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant too favourably for her, keeping in view the short time which elapsed between the date of the marriage of the pursuer with her mother and her birth.

But although the defender can, in the circumstances, take little or no benefit from the presumption embodied in the maxim referred to, there are other presumptions arising from the circumstances of the case which the pursuer has to contend with, and to overcome, before he can succeed.

There is the presumption arising from the circumstance that some time—according to the pursuer, four or five weeks—before his marriage with the defender's mother, he became fully aware that his wife was with child. That he should, notwithstanding this, have married the defender's mother, assuming that he was the father of her child, is quite intelligible, and not surprising. By doing so he only made her the reparation which was due from him, and to which she was entitled. And besides, by marrying the mother at the time he did, he would not only legitimate his offspring, but also make it certain that his child would be born in wedlock. It is to be presumed that a person not insane but in the full possession of his faculties, as the pursuer was, intended what his acts and conduct were calculated fairly and reasonably, if not necessarily and unavoidably, to lead to. On the other hand, it is all but incredible that the pursuer, an educated man of mature years (about forty-five), and occupying a respectable position, should have voluntarily and deliberately married the defender's mother in the knowledge that she was far advanced in pregnancy with a child which could not possibly be his, but the fruit of her connection with some other man, and that, too, while—if he is to be believed—he was paying his addresses to her in honourable courtship. The presumption is, to my mind, all but irresistible, that neither the pursuer, nor any individual circumstanced as he was, would have so acted. To suppose the contrary would be to disregard all the ordinary motives and springs of human action. Nor do I think it improves the position of the pursuer, but, on the contrary, renders his conduct all the more unaccountable, that on his ascertaining, before the marriage, the condition in which his wife was, she refused to disclose to him the name of the individual with whom she must have had illicit intercourse, notwithstanding that he desired and pressed her to do so.

And what is the reason given for such extraordinary, and I think I may say unnatural, conduct on the part of the pursuer? None, positively none, that is worthy of serious consideration. He says, no doubt, that if he did not go on with the marriage he was afraid the defender's mother might do injury to herself, but I can see nothing in the proof to support the pursuer in this statement. His wife does not do so, and she is not even asked a question on the subject.

Without, therefore, going the length of saying, in accordance with the opinion referred to in a footnote at page 403 of Phillip's Treatise on Evidence (vol. i., 8th ed.), "that if a man married a woman visibly pregnant it is a conclusive inference of law that the child is legitimate," I must repeat, what I have already said, that the pursuer is at least met at the outset by a very strong and weighty presumption adverse to his contention in this case, which it is incumbent on him to get over by very satisfactory evidence.

Another adverse presumption, scarcely less formidable, which the pursuer has to encounter, is that arising from his own as well as his wife's silence for so long a period as about twenty years, during which he kept the defender in ignorance of her paternity, and abstained from intimating to Laidlaw, whom he now says is her father, or mentioning to any one else that he was not himself her father. I must own my inability to reconcile such conduct with what I must hold to have been his duty to the defender, whether he was her father or not. If he was not her father, or at least was not to be held as adopting that position, what right had he to treat her as he did? What right had he to send her away, almost immediately after her birth, with Mrs Hutchison, and leave her for many years in the keeping and charge of that person without disclosing who her father was? I find it difficult to answer these questions, and when I keep in view that for twenty years or more he supplied the requisite funds for the defender's upbringing—acting so far towards her as if he were her father—I feel myself almost driven to the conclusion that he was either in very truth her father, or must be held to have adopted her as his child, and is now barred from maintaining that she is not.

In support of the same view, the consequences to the defender in the loss of evidence bearing on the question of her legitimacy is not to be overlooked. Take, for example, Dr Thatcher senior, who was consulted by the pursuer some time before the marriage as to Mrs Gardner's condition, and who acted as accoucheur at the birth of the defender, and Mrs Robertson, the sick-nurse who attended the defender's mother at the birth, and for sometime afterwards, both of whom have long since died: It cannot be doubted that Dr Thatcher senior, and Mrs Robertson, might and most probably would have been able, if alive, to throw a great deal of light on the present subject of inquiry. Dr Thatcher could have explained what he meant on ascertaining the condition of Mrs Gardner a short time before her marriage, by telling the pursuer the sooner the better she was married. He could not well have advised the pursuer to marry her if he was not satisfied that he was the cause of her condition. And Dr Thatcher could also have given an explanation not only of the particulars noted in his visit-book, as shewn in the excerpt therefrom, No. 62 of process, but stated what would have been most material, who were "the child's parents," referred to in his memorandum, No. 63 of process. As to Mrs Robertson, again, the serious nature of the loss to the defender sustained by her death appears from the evidence of Mrs Hutchison, the person with whom the defender was after her birth sent away, and with whom she resided for many years. Mrs Hutchison says, among other things,—"I called the child Mary Gardner. I got the mother's name from Mrs Robertson." And again, in a subsequent part of her evidence, Mrs Hutchison says, on being asked whether Mrs Robertson told her about the father of the child,—"No, she never said anything, but that Mr Gardner was the father, but she said that. (Q.) Did she say that Mrs Gardner told her so when on childbed? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Did she tell you that Mrs Gardner had told her so frequently afterwards? (A.) Yes." It is true that, from other answers given by Mrs Hutchison, the real import and effect of what she says she heard from Mrs Robertson is attended with some doubt, and cannot now be cleared up in consequence of the death of Mrs Robertson,—another striking example of the great disadvantage to which the defender is subjected by the ignorance in which the pursuer managed to keep her for such a length of time in regard to everything connected with her parentage. It is hard, however, that the defender should suffer more than is unavoidable from the loss of evidence not arising from any remissness on her part but solely from the conduct purposely persisted in for such a length of time by the pursuer. To some extent, therefore, I think it only just and conformable to legal principle that the evidence now lost to the defender must be presumed, if it had been available, to have told against the pursuer.

At the same time, and giving all due effect to the presumptions to which I have now referred, I cannot say that the pursuer is to be held as precluded from rebutting them, and shewing, if he can, that he is entitled to the decree for which he concludes, and which the Lord Ordinary has pronounced in his favour. The question is, has he done so?

Although a considerable number of witnesses have been examined in the case, it rather appears to me that the determination of the disputed question depends substantially upon the presumptions I have noticed, and the view that may be taken of the testimony of the pursuer himself, his wife, and John Laidlaw, on the one hand; and the defender, the Rev. Mr Kay, and Mrs Hutchison, on the other.

The great object of the pursuer in the proof was to make out that prior to his marriage with the defender's mother she had carnal connection with John Laidlaw, and that he and not the pursuer is the defender's father. It would no doubt be very important for the pursuer, although not conclusive, if it had been established that before his marriage sexual intercourse had taken place between his wife and Laidlaw. But I must own I am not quite satisfied that the proof warrants such a conclusion. The only evidence bearing on the matter is that of the pursuer's wife and Laidlaw himself. Now, in regard to the pursuer's wife, I feel myself unable, looking at her conduct from first to last, to give any effect to her testimony, except in so far as it is otherwise distinctly and unequivocally supported and corroborated. But not only are her statements uncorroborated but they are also far from consistent or credible in themselves, and in many particulars, of more or less importance, directly contradicted and shewn to be incorrect by the other evidence in the case. Thus, while she says in one part of her evidence, when examined as a witness, that Laidlaw had connection with her only once, she, according to the pursuer's statement in the record (Cond. 4), told him that she had connection with Laidlaw "on two or more occasions," and when pressed at her examination she says,—"I only remember of two times," explaining, however, that on one of them he succeeded, but on the other made the attempt merely. Again, while in one part of her evidence she says that she was waylaid and violated by Laidlaw notwithstanding her resistance, she in another part admits that she had met him by appointment on the hill-side, where the alleged violation took place, and that she always thought a great deal of him. And certain it is that there is nothing whatever to shew that she complained to any one, or otherwise acted at the time as it must be presumed a virtuous woman would have done had she been waylaid and violated by her brother's shepherd. On the contrary, she expressly says that "there was no difference in my conduct towards him after the occurrence of what I have described." Over and above all this there are the inconsistent and contradictory statements regarding the matter made by the pursuer's wife to the defender and Mr Kay. The defender says that her mother told her she had been waylaid by a man with a plaid, who, without ever speaking to her, got the better of her and then went away, evidently meaning to convey the impression that the man was a stranger to her. Then on Mr Kay coming in and asking her who the man was, she said she could not tell, but he was a gentleman, and had a plaid on. She no doubt denies that she made this statement, but Mr Kay distinctly corroborates the defender in regard to it, and for my own part I can see nothing in his evidence, or otherwise in the case, to lead me to discredit the statements of Mr Kay, especially in so far as they coincide with those of the defender.

Nor is the matter regarding the account given by the pursuer's wife of the meeting she had with Laidlaw or some other man on the hillside of Cademuir improved by the statements of the pursuer himself, for not only are they in themselves inconsistent and contradictory in many essential particulars, but they are also inconsistent with and contradictory of the statements made by his wife, and the communications made by him to the defender and Mr Kay. Thus, while the pursuer says that when prior to his marriage his wife told him of her being in the family-way he got no further information from her except that she had "been forced by a blackguard on the hill," and that although he certainly pressed her on the subject she would tell him nothing except that she had been "waylaid by a blackguard and abused," and that she gave him to understand it was a man she had never seen before and whom she knew nothing about,—the pursuer's wife says that although the pursuer asked her who the man was "he did not press me to tell him." And the matter does not rest there, for, according to the defender and Mr Kay, the pursuer at one of his interviews with them expressly stated that he did not know who the defender's father was, further than that he was a dissipated man, and out of the country; although, long before this, according to his own and his wife's testimony, he was told by her that Laidlaw was the father. Not only is this flagrant contradiction established by the evidence of the defender and Mr Kay, but by the testimony of the pursuer himself; for he expressly says that "when my wife first told me the circumstances connected with her getting into the family-way she spoke of a blackguard having waylaid her on the hill, and when she thought she was dying; a year after we were married, she revealed the name of the man—John Laidlaw." And Mr Kay says that, in answer to some questions of his, the pursuer stated "that Mrs Gardner had been met by a man on the moor and that he had forced her, and that having forced her she was in this condition. I put the question to him, where is that man? He said he did not know. I asked, is he in the neighbourhood of your place, or in the neighbourhood just now? He said, not just now. Could he be found? I asked. No, he said. Where was he? I asked. He said he thought he was not in the country at all, and that owing to his conduct with Mrs Gardner he had become a dissipated man. I have a distinct recollection of Mr Gardner telling me these things."

But further still, and what perhaps is of more importance than anything that has been yet noticed, it is clear—unless the defender and Mr Kay are to be held as perjured witnesses—that the pursuer had confessed to him that he had at least attempted, if he did not succeed, to have sexual intercourse with Mrs Gardner before their marriage. The defender states that, at one of the pursuer's meetings with Mr Kay, when she was present, she heard him say that he had once tried to take advantage of Mrs Gardner. "I heard him say that. Mr Kay had asked him about the hill meeting, and Mr Gardner said he had once tried to take advantage of her." Mr Kay is even more full and explicit. He says,—"Mr Gardner and I had a meeting in March 1874. Mrs Gardner and Mary were present. (Q.) Was anything said on the occasion by Mr Gardner as to anything taking place between him and Mrs Gardner prior to their marriage? (A.) Yes. By that time Mary had told me her mother's story to her, and I told Mr Gardner what Mary had said, and, among other things, that Mr Gardner had said that he had attempted to force her once, and also a second time. To which he returned answer, and said, Well, I confess I tried it once. (Q.) That was, that he had endeavoured before marriage once to have connection? (A.) To force her. (Q.) To have connection? (A.) Yes. (Q.) What was it you understood he had tried to do; to commit a rape, or to have connection with her? The position I put is this: I am told that you courted Mrs Gardner, and had frequent meetings with her, and on one occasion you tried to force her when she was unwell, and you did not succeed. On a second occasion you forced her, having trysted her to a different place on the moor, and that you had succeeded only too well the second time. He immediately added, Well, I confess to having tried it once. He did not confess to having been successful. It was at that meeting, immediately after the confession, that he made an offer of £1000. He just said, I am here to make a settlement."

Bearing in mind these portions of the evidence, together with the whole proof, so far as it is of any materiality, I must own my inability to come to the conclusion that the pursuer has established his case. On the contrary, I am disposed to think, when I keep in view the evidence of Mrs Hutchison, of the defender Mary Gardner, and of Mr Kay, that the paternity of the defender has been made out against the pursuer rather than Laidlaw. I am not to dispute, however, that the testimony of the defender, especially as regards the letter she says she received from her mother, but destroyed, acknowledging that the pursuer was her father, is open to much unfavourable remark. In regard, therefore, to the defender's own testimony, I have given effect to it only in so far as it is distinctly supported and corroborated by Mr Kay, whose evidence, I cannot see, is exposed to any well-founded objection. He has no disqualifying interest in the controversy; and it is only fair to presume that an educated man, and a clergyman, as he is, would tell the truth, and nothing but the truth, as I believe he has done. The testimony of Laidlaw stands differently, and is certainly, in many respects, very equivocal and unsatisfactory. But he is the pursuer's witness. Now, according to the pursuer's contention—and the exigencies of his case require it—Laidlaw must be held as stating what is false in all the more important points at issue between the parties, especially as stating what is false when he says that he never at any time had sexual intercourse with the defender's mother.

In the words of the Lord Ordinary, "his deposition abounds with contradictions as well as with palpable falsehoods, and is in most important particulars a flagrant example of wilful prevarication. His letters to Mrs Gardner, which were put before him, and on which he was examined, are not of themselves evidence that the statements they contain are true; but they prove, and in this way they are by the general tenor of his deposition amply corroborated, that he is a witness whose sworn testimony is not to be believed." All I can do with evidence so characterised by the Lord Ordinary, I think correctly, is to refuse any weight to it as against the defender.

In this view the pursuer's case is left on the evidence of himself and his wife. Now, although the pursuer denies that he had actual connection with the defender's mother before their marriage, it is proved, I think, by testimony which cannot be disregarded, that he on one occasion, at least, before the marriage, endeavoured to have connection with her. And the proved, and indeed admitted, levity and looseness of conduct—not to use any stronger language—of Mrs Gardner, prior to her marriage, renders it not unlikely that the pursuer may have gone further than he has admitted, and might have been the defender's father. As previously observed by me, it is all but impossible to suppose he would have married her mother at all in the condition he knew her to be in, except in the knowledge that he himself was or might have been the cause of that condition. Neither is it unreasonable that the pursuer, the son of a clergyman, the brother of another, and himself an ordained elder of the Presbyterian Church, should have been anxious to conceal the birth of the defender, and the circumstances in which it occurred.

But whatever may have been the motives of parties, and whatever may be the truth of the case, the pursuer cannot prevail without establishing, by clear and unmistakeable evidence, that he is not the father of the defender. And although unwilling to interfere with the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, who, it is evident, from the able note to his interlocutor, has bestowed great pains on the case, I am unable, having regard to all the circumstances, and the presumptions against the pursuer arising from his own actings and conduct, to come to the conclusion that he has relieved himself from the burden he has undertaken. On the contrary, the only conclusion I can come to is that the pursuer has failed to establish his case, and therefore that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ought to be recalled, and the defender assoilzied from the conclusions of the summons.

LORD GIFFORD.—This is a very interesting and important and a very difficult case, and it is only with great hesitation, and after very anxious consideration, that I have come to concur in the opinion now expressed by all your Lordships, that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ought to be recalled, and the defender assoilzied from the conclusions of the action.

In one point of view the question is entirely one of fact dependent upon the evidence, and the Court are called upon to decide, in point of fact, upon that evidence, whether or not the pursuer is the father of the defender, Mary Gardner. In another, and perhaps a more accurate point of view, however, the question is one as to the effect and force of certain legal presumptions from which paternity is to be inferred, and the difficulty of the case consists in rightly estimating the force and effect of the presumptions which arise from the circumstances proved in evidence, and in determining whether these presumptions have or have not been sufficiently overcome by the contrary evidence relied on by the pursuer. "The birth of a child," said Lord President Blair in Routledge v. Carruthers, 19th May 1812, "is a fact which may be proved by witnesses, but the conception is a fact that can never be proved," but can only be inferred from the position and relation of the supposed father. Paternity, in this view, is always a matter of inference or presumption, never of direct proof; and according to the special circumstances of each case the presumption or inference of paternity will be more or less strong—in some cases being so strong as to be almost irrefragable, and in other cases being so weak as to be easily overcome.

No. 120.

Gardner v. Gardner.

The best known, and in general the strongest of these presumptions, is expressed by the rule pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant,—a child conceived and born in marriage is presumed to be the child of the married spouses. In strictness this maxim only applies to cases where the child may have been conceived during the marriage, and I think it is the result of all the authorities that the maxim does not apply where the child is born ten months after a marriage is dissolved, or within six months after its celebration. In such cases, however, other presumptions may arise from the special circumstances which may raise an inference almost as strong as that which arises in the proper cases to which the maxim is strictly applicable. In the present case I agree with your Lordships that the brocard does not in strictness apply. Mary Gardner, the defender in this action, was born only six weeks after the marriage of Mr and Mrs Gardner. It is therefore impossible that she could have been conceived in wedlock, and so the nuptiæ cannot of themselves demonstrate who the father was.

The presumption arising from conception, or possible conception, during marriage, is a mere presumption which may be rebutted and overcome by clear and satisfactory contrary evidence. The law of Scotland has never made or treated this strong presumption as a presumptio juris et de jure. It must yield to evidence, and I think the law of Scotland has always been that the presumption may be overcome not only by evidence that it was physically impossible that the husband of the mother could be the father of the child, but by every species of moral evidence sufficient to satisfy a reasonable mind that the child was begotten by some one else than the husband. From the authorities which have been cited to us this seems also to be the rule in England, at least since the decisions in the Banbury Peerage case, and in the subsequent case of Morris v. Davis, 1837, 5 Clark and Finnelly, 463.

Now, I am of opinion that the rule of law is exactly the same in regard to all other presumptions of paternity which may arise from the special circumstances of each particular case. They are all mere presumptions which may be overcome, and not fixed rules which must be accepted as conclusive; and the two questions which will arise in every case, and which arise in the case now before us, are, first, what is the strength of the presumptions which the circumstances create; and, second, is the contrary evidence sufficient to overcome and to set aside these presumptions.

In the present case I shall confine myself to indicating very shortly the grounds of my opinion that the presumptions which arise in favour of Mary Gardner's legitimacy—that is, the presumptions that the pursuer is her father—are so cogent that they have not been overcome even by the very considerable body of contrary evidence relied upon by the pursuer.

No. 120.

Gardner v. Gardner.

In the first place, a certain presumption of paternity arises from the bare fact that a man knowingly marries the mother of an illegitimate child previously born. But this is a very weak presumption. In the absence of all other evidence, all that can be said is probably that it is more likely than not that he is the father. Such presumption would be greatly strengthened if previous to the marriage the mother of the illegitimate child had been the mistress or concubine of the man who afterwards married her, and had cohabited with him at or about the time of conception, and the adoption or acknowledgment of the child as his by the husband would probably make the presumption almost conclusive, though still capable of being rebutted by contrary proof.

Where, as in the present case, a man marries a woman who at the time of marriage is in a state of pregnancy, the presumption of paternity from that mere fact is very strong, and is perhaps in almost all such cases in entire accordance with the actual truth. Still farther, where the pregnancy is far advanced, obvious to the eye, or actually confessed or announced, as in the present case, to the intended husband, a presumption is reared up, which, according to universal feeling, and giving due weight to what may be called the ordinary instincts of humanity, it will be very difficult indeed to overcome. The man who marries a woman in the condition in which Mrs Gardner was on 29th August 1850, the date of their marriage, when she was seven or eight months gone with child, says, almost as emphatically as he could do by the most express words, "I am the cause of the pregnancy, and the father of the expected child."

No doubt, if Mr Gardner could shew that he could not be the father, the presumption must yield. If at the date of the marriage he had newly returned from Australia,—if he had landed from the ship only a day or two before the marriage,—the impossibility of his being the father would have met and overcome all presumptions. But his position was very different. He had been an old suitor of Miss Eliza Brodie (now Mrs Gardner) before his emigration. She had originally refused his proposals; but he returned to this country four or five years previous to his marriage, and he renewed his addresses, which were ultimately accepted, although the precise date of the acceptance does not appear. There seems to have been a courtship of considerable duration. There were very frequent meetings between Mr Gardner and Miss Brodie, and there was abundant opportunity for intercourse if the parties were so disposed. In such circumstances, it is unfortunately true, as we are otherwise aware, that in certain districts and in certain ranks of life improper intercourse does sometimes take place before marriage, and the fact is undoubted that a very considerable number of births are registered where the conception must have taken place before any formal marriage was celebrated. Now, wherever an avowed and open courtship has taken place, and there have been opportunities of access, and thereafter the man marries the woman in an advanced state of pregnancy, knowing that she is so, and hurrying on the marriage, as happened here, for that very reason, I do not say that the presumption of paternity is absolutely conclusive, but I do say it is almost as strong as such a presumption can be. No words, no express declaration on the part of both the man and the woman, could be stronger than the mere fact of marriage under such circumstances. It is as if both the man and the woman had expressly confessed their premature indulgence, and hastened to do what they could to repair their fault. To my mind, in such a case, the presumption is quite as strong as the mere presumption which arises when a child is conceived during marriage that the husband is the father. Indeed in some aspects it seems to be even stronger, for it has in it the element of express or actual confession or avowal, which does not always arise, or arises with less force, from the mere subsistence of a nuptial tie.

Suppose, what sometimes used to happen, and used to happen in former times much more frequently than now, that parties who marry as Mr and Mrs Gardner did, submit to Church discipline, and are reproved or temporarily suspended from Church ordinances for antenuptial fornication—and such proceedings used to be very common in some of the churches in Scotland—would not the presumption of paternity be quite as strong as if the child had been conceived after the marriage ceremony? I think it would, and in an extended sense of the maxim it would apply with peculiar emphasis—Pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant.

Still it is conceivable that even in such a case the husband who marries his pregnant bride may not be the father of her child. His marriage and his conduct may be explained in some other way. We have heard, at least, of childless men with large possessions thus attempting to secure an heir, and exclude distant or hated relatives. At least such cases may be figured, and proof might be brought so cogent as to illegitimise the child so fraudulently and surreptitiously adopted. But nothing of this kind arises here. The pursuer might have been the father of Mary Gardner—every likelihood—every probability—his own implied avowal, asserts that he was, and at the very least there is laid upon him by these circumstances, going no farther in the history than I have already done, an onus as weighty almost as it is possible to conceive of removing the presumption by some preponderant proof.

Now, the pursuer's case is that he married Miss Brodie in an advanced state of pregnancy, not because he was the father of her child, not because he had antedated the rights or privileges of marriage, but in order to screen his wife from the disgrace of having an illegitimate child with which he had nothing to do, but which she said was the consequences of a criminal assault of which she was the innocent victim. He says it was an act of generosity on his part, to cover Miss Brodie's grievous calamity, and to hide for ever the knowledge of an event which she said was to her a miserable misfortune, but which certainly others would hold to have been her fault and her crime. The pursuer says that Miss Brodie told him that she was pregnant in consequence of her having been forced and violated on Cademuir Hill.

Now, I do not say that it is impossible that this can have been the pursuer's motive in marrying Miss Brodie in the state of pregnancy in which she then was. It is possible, just as the strangest and most unexpected events are often shewn to be within the range of possibility. But while I admit the abstract possibility of the statement which the pursuer now makes, I think I may say that it is a statement which the law will not take off the pursuer's hands without the most pregnant, undoubted, and unimpeached evidence of its truth. Now, unfortunately for the pursuer, of such evidence the pursuer has really none, for, when analysed, the whole rests upon the single uncorroborated and utterly unsupported assertion of Mrs Gardner alone.

It is said that Miss Brodie told her intended husband that she had been forcibly violated without her consent. There is no evidence whatever of this, and her statement to her promised spouse is admitted to have been false in many particulars and details. She said to him that "she had been waylaid by a blackguard on the hill and abused," and she led him to believe that she did not know who the man was; but in her own examination she was forced to admit that she had not been waylaid, but had met with Laidlaw on the hill by assignation and appointment. I do not believe that any rape took place; but it is enough to say that there is not the slightest evidence at which the law for a moment could look as instructing such an occurrence. There was no complaint at the time, no information given to her friends, no exhibition of marks of violence, no such marks to exhibit. There were subsequent meetings between Miss Brodie and Laidlaw without complaint, and without her making any difference in her treatment of him. Mrs Gardner herself says that Laidlaw afterwards attempted liberties with her, which were unsuccessful, but of which still she made no complaint. Can such an extraordinary story be credited now, as told by Mrs Gardner, after the lapse of four-and-twenty years, she having given quite a different account of it to her intended husband at the time when she first mentioned it? No doubt it was urged that Miss Brodie was entitled to deceive her promised husband, so as to get him to marry her, and I do not dispute that some excuse may be stated for her; but what is this but to say that under a strong motive she told lies to her husband at first, and the result is that she cannot now be trusted as a witness, and as the sole witness on whom we are now asked to rely. The whole case at this point of it is made to turn upon her statement alone, and to discredit Mrs Gardner is to destroy the whole structure which the pursuer sets up.

If the question had arisen immediately upon the birth of the child, or before its birth, but after the marriage, I cannot but feel that the presumption of that child's paternity would not have been overcome by all the evidence which is now laid before us.

But the case does not stop at the birth of the child, and it is not in the same position as if the pursuer had then repudiated the child or declared it his wife's bastard. The circumstances attending the birth are important. Mr Gardner placed his wife in a temperance hotel in Edinburgh to be confined there. No doubt he did so secretly, and without giving his name or address, but can it be doubted that he did so avowedly as the father of the child of which she was pregnant? I do not go into the details of the evidence, but his every act was a confession and avowal, to Dr Thatcher, to the hotel-keeper, to the hotel-keeper's wife, to the waiters, to the midwife, to the sick-nurse, and to everybody else, that he was the father of the child. His sending Miss Brodie to Dr Thatcher before the marriage, and his own visit to Dr Thatcher to learn the result of the examination, will admit of no other interpretation, and constitute proofs or evidence or avowals of paternity which, in an action of filiation, would be absolutely conclusive.

The pursuer says he did all this in order to "smother up the thing as much as possible." But what does this mean? It means, that is, he avowed the child as his in order to conceal the fact that it was not his. He led, or allowed others to assume, that he was the father of his wife's child, in order to conceal what she said was the fact, that she had been violated. But he could only "smother up the thing" by adopting the child as his, and after having once done so and continued to do so I think he is now barred from maintaining that the whole was a pretence and a falsehood.

Suppose Mrs Gardner had died in childbed, and the pursuer had then repudiated the child, what defence could he have had to an action of aliment by the parish authorities, or to a subsequent action by the child itself.

I give full weight to the repudiation of a child by both the married spouses even when the child is conceived during the subsistence of the marriage, and I quite admit that moral evidence without physical impossibility may sometimes be sufficient to bastardise a child, even though both conceived and born while a marriage subsisted. But there is high authority for holding that not the slightest regard is to be paid to such disclamation by the spouses after they have once in any way whatever acknowledged the child. Now, it seems to me that all through Mrs Gardner's residence in Milne's Temperance Hotel, both spouses treated and virtually acknowledged the child as theirs, that all through the pursuer's communications with the late Dr Thatcher he virtually confessed to Dr Thatcher that he, the pursuer, was the father of the child. I cannot doubt that when Dr Thatcher, after having examined Miss Brodie, told the pursuer that the marriage should go on at once, that he meant the pursuer, as the father, should at once marry the pregnant mother. I will not take from the pursuer his ambiguous description of Dr Thatcher's words, that without referring to any person, he only said,—"Let the marriage go on." I take it to be clear that what he said to the pursuer was virtually "Marry her at once," for the pursuer's conduct was too explicit an acknowledgment of paternity to need any farther words.

And then the history still confirms the confession with which it began. For years the pursuer goes on paying the defender's aliment, first through old Dr Thatcher, and then through his son. Every payment was an acknowledgment by the pursuer that he was the girl's father. It is vain to say that the pursuer made these payments as for the support of his wife's bastard, and that he did so because he was liable for his wife's debts contracted before marriage. The plea is absurd, and absolutely inconsistent with the pursuer's whole actings throughout. Nobody ever dreamt such a thing, and the pursuer, after a lapse of five-and-twenty years, is not entitled now to put it forth with any expectation that it will be believed.

The lapse of time seems to me to be almost a conclusive element against the pursuer. Without his evidence, and without the evidence of his wife, Mrs Gardner, admittedly the pursuer would have no case whatever. If Mr and Mrs Gardner had died any time during the course of the last four-and-twenty years, —nay, if even one of them had died before proceedings were instituted,—it would have been hopeless to attempt to disprove the defender's legitimacy. No hearsay, no written declaration, no bequest of bastardy, would do. Now, I altogether dispute the right of the pursuer, by himself or in conjunction with his wife, to hold the question of the defender's legitimacy in suspense at their pleasure, that they make her as they please at any time of their lives illegitimate, and declare her a bastard, but still retain in their own hands the arbitrary power of being silent, and by dying without proceedings thus bequeath to her a legitimacy which she could not claim as matter of right. When husband and wife resolve to repudiate a child of the wife's as a bastard they must do so instantly, or at least timeously, when witnesses are alive who can speak to the material facts. Delay in such a case may become an absolute bar. I think the delay has become so in the present case, and this altogether apart from the implied acknowledgment of paternity which the pursuer's conduct inferred.

The continued and persistent conduct of both parents in excluding the defender from their family, and treating her so differently from Mrs Gardner's other children, is strongly founded on by the pursuer. It is impossible to justify such conduct, but I am not prepared to say that in its commencement at least it is not accounted for by the natural anxiety of the pursuer and of his wife to conceal the fact that a child was born six weeks after marriage. The pursuer was an elder of the Established Church—he could scarcely have retained his eldership if it was publicly known that he had a child born six weeks after marriage. His father and brother were ministers of the Established Church. Such a disclosure would have been extremely unpleasant to them. It is conceivable that concealment begun for such motives should be continued from the awkwardness of afterwards introducing into the family a child of whom no one had previously been allowed to hear.

I have only a word to add on the credibility of certain of the witnesses. I have already said that I cannot trust the evidence of Mrs Gardner. From whatever motives, and with whatever excuses, she has undoubtedly given different accounts of the matter at different times, and it is almost fatal to the whole case if she is not to be implicitly relied on. I cannot help thinking that the pursuer also has to some extent been seriously attacked as to his accuracy and credibility. If Mr Kay's evidence is to be trusted, and there is nothing to impugn it, the pursuer made admissions and confessions totally inconsistent with the case which as a witness he maintained. Mr Kay could hardly be mistaken as to the pursuer's statements and admissions to which he depones, and no prepossession in favour of the defender would account for such statements as were mistakes or misapprehensions. They very seriously tell against the pursuer's credibility. The evidence of Laidlaw I feel myself compelled almost altogether to lay out of view. It is plain he is a person upon whose testimony no reliance whatever can be placed, and although the statements and implications in his letters might well be held evidence against himself if he were the defendant in or a party to an action, I think it would be unsafe to read them when coupled with his oral testimony as evidence against the present defender. The evidence of the defender herself I am also unable implicitly to rely on, but the case stands quite clear of her testimony. Of course she cannot know anything of the material facts and circumstances on which the case depends, and although I lay out of view her account of her mother's statements, this does not materially affect the real issue.

The result is that I have come to be of opinion, though with difficulty, and not without hesitation, especially considering that the Lord Ordinary reached an opposite conclusion, that the pursuer has not adduced evidence strong enough or cogent enough to overcome the weighty, and, it appears to me, the concurrent presumptions which arise from the whole history of the case, and which compel me to hold in law, whatever may be the state of the occult fact, which I cannot reach, that the pursuer must be held to be the father of the defender. This leads to decree of absolvitor from the whole conclusions of the action.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor;—"The Lords having heard counsel on the reclaiming note for Mary Gardner against Lord Craighill's interlocutor of 15th November 1875, Recall said interlocutor: Find that the pursuer (respondent) has failed to prove that he is not the father of the defender (reclaimer) Mary Gardner: Find the defender entitled to expenses, and remit," &c.

Church—Allocation of Area—Quoad Sacra Parish—Stat. 7 and 8 Vict. cap. 44, secs. 8 and 9.—The lands of certain heritors in the parish of J. were, in 1855, under the provisions of the Act of 7 and 8 Vict. sections 8 and 9, disjoined from the parish of J. quoad sacra, and, along with certain portions of other parishes, erected into a quoad sacra parish. In 1874 the parish church of J., the area of which had been for a long period divided among all the heritors of the parish according to an extrajudicial agreement, was excambed for a new church. In an application by the heritors to have the area of the new church divided by the Sheriff, held that heritors whose lands were entirely within the quoad sacra parish were not entitled to share in an allocation of the area of the new church according to their valued rent, but the question of their right to a family seat in the new church reserved—(Lord Deas dis. on the grounds (1) that the excambion did not affect the rights of the seat-holders in the old church, and that the seats in the new church fell to be allocated as the seats had been allocated in the old at the date of the excambion; and (2) that if an allocation had been necessary, as in the case of a new church erected by the heritors, the heritors whose lands were in the quoad sacra parish were entitled to share in the allocation according to their valued rent, in respect that they were still (in his Lordship's opinion) liable for the expense of maintaining the original parish church; and Lord Mure dis. on the former of these grounds).

Opinions reserved as to whether the heritors whose lands had been disjoined quoad sacra were still liable for the maintenance of the fabric of the church of the old parish.

1st DIVISION, with three Judges of 2d DIVISION. Sheriff of Roxburgh, Berwick, and Selkirk. M.

A PORTION of the ruined abbey of Jedburgh had from a remote period been fitted up and used as the parish church of Jedburgh. The parish included both the burgh and a large landward district. The area of this church had been extrajudicially divided among the provost and magistrates and the heritors in 1793, and as additions were made to the accommodation these were also extrajudicially divided.

In 1869, the church having fallen into disrepair, the late Marquis of Lothian, the proprietor of the rest of the abbey, who was desirous of acquiring the old church with a view to the restoration of the abbey ruins to their ancient state before the foundation of the church, and to their preservation as ruins, offered to erect a new parish church at the sight of and to the satisfaction of the heritors, and to convey it to them on condition that they would convey to him the old church in the abbey. This offer was accepted, and the late and present Marquises of Lothian proceeded to feu a site and to erect a new parish church for the parish of Jedburgh. This new church was completed in November 1874, when a deed of excambion between the Marquis of Lothian and the committee of heritors of the parish of Jedburgh was executed, whereby the new church was conveyed to the committee of heritors in exchange for and in lieu of the old church in the abbey. This deed contained no reference to the existing state of possession of the area of the church by the heritors, nor any provision as to the division of the area of the new church among the heritors.

The clerk to the heritors then presented a petition to the Sheriff (Pattison) in the names of the Marquis of Lothian, as principal heritor of the parish, and himself, as clerk to the heritors and as representing them, praying the Sheriff to divide the area of the new parish church among the heritors "in terms of law."

In February 1855 a portion of the landward part of the parish of Jedburgh, along with small portions of the neighbouring parishes of Oxnam and Southdean, had been disjoined and erected into a new quoad sacra parish called the parish of Edgerston, in terms of the statutes 1707, cap. 9, and 7 and 8 Vict. cap. 44, secs. 8 and 9. The question thus arose in the division of the area of the new church at Jedburgh whether the heritors of the part of the old parish of Jedburgh, which had been attached quoad sacra to the parish of Edgerston which had a church of its own, were entitled to a share of the area of the new church at Jedburgh in proportion to the valuation of their lands, including those attached to Edgerston. The lands of only two of the heritors, viz., the Duke of Roxburghe and Mr Rutherfurd of Edgerston, were entirely within the quoad sacra parish of Edgerston.

It appeared that in point of fact the majority of the tenants and inhabitants of the lands attached quoad sacra to Edgerston had continued to occupy their old seats in the parish church of Jedburgh, as they did not approve of the seat-rents charged in Edgerston Church.

The Sheriff, after hearing parties, pronounced an interlocutor on 30th April 1875, wherein, among other findings, he decided with regard to this question as follows:—"Finds that by decree of the Court of Teinds, dated the 21st day of February 1855, the church of Edgerston, situated within the parish, was, under and in terms of the statutes 1707, c. 9, and 7 and 8 Vict. c. 44, sections 8 and 9, erected into a parish church in connection with the Church of Scotland, and a considerable portion of what was then the parish of Jedburgh was disjoined quoad sacra from the said parish, and along with small portions of the parishes of Oxnam and Southdean, the whole constituting a district about seven miles in length by about three miles in breadth, erected into a parish quoad sacra in connection with the Church of Scotland, to be called now and in all time coming the church and parish of Edgerston: Finds that, in so far as regards the dividing and apportioning of the area and seatings of the new parish church of Jedburgh recently erected, the heritors of the land so disjoined and erected into the parish of Edgerston quoad sacra are not to be considered as heritors of the parish of Jedburgh: . . . Finds that the remaining two-thirds fall to be allocated and divided among the other heritors of the parish (excluding as aforesaid) according to their valuations as appearing in said valuation-rolls." *

* "NOTE.— . . . With regard to the landward heritors, the question is more difficult.

"It is as parishioners properly that the heritors within the parish are made liable to build and repair the parish church, &c., according to the value of their respective lands. Sir George Mackenzie, in his Observations upon the statute 1572, chapter 54, says that the law burdens them with the repair of the church 'because they get the advantage in it of the word and sacraments.' They have in consequence, and for the same reason, a right in the like proportion to the area and seatings of the church. But this is not an absolute right, like that to their lands, for the exclusive benefit of the heritors themselves. They hold it for behoof also of the tenants and residenters on their lands, that these persons may also get the same 'advantage' in the church 'of the word and sacraments.' The heritor is bound to give the benefit to his tenants and the residenters on his lands within the parish. He cannot alienate his lands and retain a right to the area of the church. Nor can he alienate his share as a separate right of property and retain the lands. It must go with the lands in respect of which it is assigned to him, subject to the conditions and burdens; nor can the right be converted to any other use or purpose than that of hearing the word and partaking in the sacraments, and other religious ordinances of the church. It is altogether an obligation and a right of a peculiar kind, being part of the machinery by which the constitution and law of this country ensure provision being made for the worship of God and the support of

The Duke of Roxburghe and the other heritors, whose lands, or parts thereof, had been attached quoad sacra to Edgerston, appealed against this the Christian religion, according to the doctrines and system of church government adopted and recognised by law. Keeping these things in view, the question arises, whether the heritors, whose lands have been disjoined from the parish by competent decree of the Teind Court, and erected along with other heritors' lands into another parish quoad sacra, are still to be considered as heritors of the parish from which they have been so disjoined, and as such entitled to the same proportion of the area of the parish church as if their lands still formed part of the parish.

"It was maintained on the part of the Duke of Roxburghe, whose whole lands within the original parish of Jedburgh are disjoined therefrom, and along with others erected into the quoad sacra parish of Edgerston, that it was incompetent in this process to pronounce any judgment which would have the effect of excluding the Duke from a portion of the area of the new parish church, because this would be dealing with a heritable right, and also that in respect of the right which he possessed in the old parish church this could be done only by way of reduction and declarator. Reference in support of these pleas was made to the cases of Smith, 22d June 1826 (4 Shaw, 738), and of the Magistrates of Hamilton, 23d June 1846 (8 Dunlop, 844). These cases, however, do not support any such general proposition; neither of them applied to the case of a new church. And even as to the churches to which they related (being old churches, in regard to which an existing and long-established state of possession was sought to be subverted without any material change of circumstances), they both proceeded upon the ground of special onerous agreements in regard to the particular seats there in question, and which had been made and acted upon for upwards of fifty years. There is no case of that kind presented as regards the Duke of Roxburghe, either in reference to the old church or the new. Besides, a judgment to the effect supposed does not deprive the Duke of Roxburghe of any heritable right which he has as heritor to the area of the parish church. It proceeds on the ground that he is not an heritor to that effect, in consequence of his lands no longer forming part of that parish, but being disjoined therefrom. If that is so, it is not the judgment of the Sheriff which excludes him from an area of the parish church, but the decree of the Court of Teinds, by which his lands were disjoined from the parish and attached to another parish. And the Sheriff's judgment only gives effect to that decree according to his understanding of it. When called on to divide the area of the church among the heritors according to law—which is a proceeding quite competent before him—he must have jurisdiction to ascertain who the heritors are among whom the division is to be made. With regard to the plea that a reduction or declarator was necessary, because otherwise the Sheriff would be depriving him of the right which he had in the old parish church, this assumes that the whole right which at one time existed in and to the area of the old church is imported or transferred to the new parish church, a proposition which appears to the Sheriff not to be well founded.

"Besides, since that right, such as it was, was assigned to the Duke, the circumstances are changed. His position in the parish is no longer the same. And this just raises the question in another shape: What is the effect in this matter of the decree of disjunction and erection already mentioned?

"That decree proceeds at the instance of, among others, the Duke of Roxburghe himself, the late Marquis of Lothian, William Oliver Rutherfurd, Esq. of Edgerston, and others, and it recites, inter alia, the Act of Parliament of Scotland, 1707, authorising the Court of Session, as Commissioners for the Plantation of Kirks and Valuation of Teinds, to, inter alia, disjoin too large parishes, and to erect and build new churches, &c. It also recites the Act 7 and 8 Vict. c. 44, entituled 'an Act to facilitate the disjoining or dividing of extensive or populous parishes in that part of the United Kingdom called Scotland,' and the 8th and 9th sections thereof, and after setting forth the erection of the church of Edgerston, manse, offices, and pertinents connected therewith, it proceeds as follows :—' That the said church has existed for a considerable period, and has been found of great advantage to the inhabitants of the district within which it is placed, which district is situated principally within the parish of Jedburgh, and partly within each of the parishes of Jedburgh, Oxnam, and Southdean, also in the said Presbytery; that with reference to the population and superficial extent of said parishes, and more particularly to those of the parish of Jedburgh, which contains a population of about 6000, it is highly desirable that an additional place of worship and additional spiritual superintendence should be provided and permanently secured in connection with the Church of Scotland, and for this purpose that a certain portion of the said parishes should be disjoined therefrom, and erected into a new parish quoad sacra.' It then sets forth that there has been the necessary provision made to secure a permanent endowment for the minister of the said new church and parish, and that the petitioner Mr Rutherfurd had undertaken, and was ready to make provision for the maintenance of the fabric of said church and others. It recites an application to the General Assembly for, and their grant of a constitution to, the said church, and the terms thereof, and that the property of the church had been vested in certain trustees named, and that the terms of the constitution had been complied with, and a decree of the Presbytery pronounced approving of the disjunction and erection of said church of Edgerston. It sets forth the description and boundaries of the district to be attached to the said parish and church of Edgerston, and adds, 'that this district above set forth and described, which is about seven miles in length by about three miles in breadth, contains a population of about four hundred; and although hitherto used only as a missionary station, there is at present a considerable congregation in connection with Edgerston church, and a corresponding number of communicants, and both are steadily on the increase.' By the decree the 'Court erect the church of Edgerston, situated within the parishes of Jedburgh, Oxnam, and Southdean, and Presbytery of Jedburgh, into a parish church in connection with the Church of Scotland; have disjoined, and hereby disjoin, quoad sacra, from the said parishes of Jedburgh, Oxnam, and Southdean, the district now attached to the said church,' the description of the boundaries of which district then follows; 'and have erected, and hereby erect, the said district into a parish quoad sacra in connection with the Church of Scotland, to be called now, and in all time coming, the church and parish of Edgerston; and have found and declared, and hereby find and declare, that the minister and elders of the said church shall have and enjoy the status, and all the powers, rights, and privileges of a parish minister and elders of the Church of Scotland,' &c. . . . .

interlocutor. No appearance was made in support of the Sheriff's judgment. The cause was heard by the First Division in November 1875, No. 121. June 1, 1876. Duke of Roxburghe, &c.

" Now, what is the effect of disjoining lands from a parish quoad sacra, erecting them into another parish, and attaching them to another church? The church of Edgerston is declared to be a parish church, and the minister and elders are to have and enjoy the status and all the powers and privileges of ministers and elders of such. No doubt this is only quoad sacra. But it was long ago decided in the case of Drummond v. the Heritors of Monzie, Moneidie, Crieff, and others (1773, M. 7920), that the heritors of the lands annexed quoad sacra are not liable to contribute for upholding 'the fabric of the parish kirks from which they are disjoined.' A decision to the like effect was recently pronounced by Lord Ardmillan in the Outer-House in the case of the Scottish North-Eastern Railway Company v. Gardner (29th January 1864, 2 Macph. 537); and although that part of his Lordship's judgment was not affirmed in the Inner-House, because it was held not to fall within the conclusions of the summons, Lord Ormidale expressed his concurrence in it. Reference may be also made to the views thrown out by Lord Neaves in the case of the Duke of Abercorn (17th May 1870, 8 Macph. 746). No authority contrary to these cases was quoted to the Sheriff. No doubt in the case of Monzie and Crieff the heritors of the new parish were found to be liable in the expense of upholding the church in the new parish, but the lands were only annexed quoad sacra, and only disjoined and was again heard by them with three Judges of the Second Division in February 1876.

Argued for the appellants;—(1) This church was not a new church erected by the heritors in fulfilment of any statutory obligation upon them. It was a surrogatum for the old Abbey Church. The division of the area fell therefore to be made in the same proportion as that in which the area of the Abbey Church had been made, and as it existed at the date of the excambion. The new church was conveyed in the deed of excambion to the committee of heritors by name, and one of that committee had no lands out of the quoad sacra parish. The intention of the parties in entering into the excambion was clearly that matters should remain as they were as regarded the division of the area. (2) The heritors whose lands had been disjoined and erected into the quoad sacra parish would still be liable to maintain the fabric of the parish church to which they were still attached quoad civilia, and that in proportion to the valuation of all their lands in the parish as it was originally constituted. That being so, they were entitled to a part of the area of the parish church proportioned to their valued rent on the principle cujus commodum ejus debet esse incommodum. There was no allocation of area in the quoad sacra church to the heritors whose lands were attached to it, nor was there any obligation on them to maintain the fabric of that church; the quoad sacra from the former parish. It was not a disjunction and erection in general terms or quoad omnia. It is therefore the same as in the present case. It is true that the heritors of the disjoined lands are under the statute of Victoria not liable to be assessed for the expense of repairing the church and manse of the newly erected parish to which they are attached, and that the statute requires provision to be made otherwise for that purpose by obligation secured over the lands of the obligant. The statute and constitution of the church also provide that the rents of a portion of the seats of the church (but of a portion only) may be partly applied to that purpose in relief of the obligation.

"But this is just another way of throwing the burden of supporting the church on those for whom it is provided. For it seems not to make much difference in principle whether the heritor pays such expense for the benefit of himself and his tenants, recouping himself, so far as they are concerned, by the rents which he exacts from them, or that they and he pay it in the other form of seat-rents. The terms of the decree establish that the church and parish were erected for the accommodation of the inhabitants of the district, and it is to that church that they are expected and intended to resort to 'for the word and sacraments.' Accordingly the lands are disjoined from the parish of Jedburgh quoad sacra; they are no longer parts of that parish. It may be difficult to define all that the words quoad sacra mean; but surely it cannot be doubted that the preaching of the word and administering the sacraments and partaking are inter sacra, and these are the very benefits contemplated by the law in respect of which there is laid upon the heritors the burden and duty of providing and repairing churches, and in respect of which there is given to them, as the counterpart, a right for themselves and the tenants and occupants of their lands in the area of the church. It would surely be an extraordinary thing that the law should provide two parish churches, two parish ministers, and two kirk-sessions for the inhabitants of the same district. It appears to the Sheriff that the disjunction of the lands quoad sacra from the parish of Jedburgh would have no meaning if things were to remain in this respect exactly as they were before; and if the heritors in these disjoined lands were still to be liable for the repairing, and, if necessary, rebuilding the church of the parish from which they have been disjoined, and entitled to a portion of the seatings therein, and that for the benefit of the inhabitants of a district for whose convenience in rebus sacris a new parish church has been erected by decree of the Court of Teinds, in the terms and on the considerations therein expressed."

statute provided for that otherwise.[1] Seat-rents had to be paid for accommodation in a quoad sacra church. This case was a very different one from the case of Drummond,[2] referred to by the Sheriff in his note. What was attempted there was to have a new division of the area of an old parish church which had been divided and possessed as so divided for seventy years. In that case also there were burdens attaching to the lands which had been annexed quoad sacra which had to be paid in the old parish.

LORD PRESIDENT.—My Lords, this is an appeal against an interlocutor pronounced by the Sheriff of Roxburghshire on a petition presented to him by the heritors of the parish of Jedburgh for the division of the area of a newly built church in that parish. The Sheriff, before proceeding to the actual work of dividing the area, thought it right, by the findings in his interlocutor, to clear away several difficulties that had presented themselves or had been suggested in the course of the discussion before him. With most of these we are not concerned. But that part of his interlocutor which is objected to principally by the appellants is in these terms :—" Finds that, by decree of the Court of Teinds, dated the 21st day of February 1855, the church of Edgerston, situated within the parish, was, under and in terms of the statutes 1707, c. 9, and 7 and 8 Vict. cap. 44, sections 8 and 9, erected into a parish church in connection with the Church of Scotland, and a considerable portion of what was then the parish of Jedburgh was disjoined quoad sacra from the said parish, and, along with small portions of the parishes of Oxnam and Southdean, the whole constituting a district about seven miles in length by about three miles in breadth, erected into a parish quoad sacra in connection with the Church of Scotland, to be called now and in all time coming the church and parish of Edgerston : Finds that, in so far as regards the dividing and apportioning of the area and sittings of the new parish church of Jedburgh recently erected, the heritors of the lands so disjoined and erected into the parish of Edgerston quoad sacra are not to be considered as heritors of the parish of Jedburgh." But in a subsequent part of his interlocutor, after defining the portion of the area that is to be appropriated to the burgh, and leaving two-thirds for the landward part of the parish, he finds " that the remaining two-thirds fall to be allocated and divided among the other heritors of the parish (excluding as aforesaid) according to their valuations as appearing in said valuation-rolls."

Now, the import and effect of this judgment is very clear. It settles that, in dividing the area of this new parish church, the heritors of lands which are no longer part of the parish of Jedburgh, but have been, with other lands, erected into a separate parish quoad sacra, have no right to claim any portion of the area of the parish church.

The question is one of some importance, and, it may be, of general application, although disputes regarding the division of the area of a parish church are by no means common ; and, indeed, these things are, as we know, almost always settled by arrangement. But there can be no doubt that when a new parish and was again heard by them with three Judges of the Second Division in February 1876.

Argued for the appellants;—(1) This church was not a new church erected by the heritors in fulfilment of any statutory obligation upon them. It was a surrogatum for the old Abbey Church. The division of the area fell therefore to be made in the same proportion as that in which the area of the Abbey Church had been made, and as it existed at the date of the excambion. The new church was conveyed in the deed of excambion to the committee of heritors by name, and one of that committee had no lands out of the quoad sacra parish. The intention of the parties in entering into the excambion was clearly that matters should remain as they were as regarded the division of the area. (2) The heritors whose lands had been disjoined and erected into the quoad sacra parish would still be liable to maintain the fabric of the parish church to which they were still attached quoad civilia, and that in proportion to the valuation of all their lands in the parish as it was originally constituted. That being so, they were entitled to a part of the area of the parish church proportioned to their valued rent on the principle cujus commodum ejus debet esse incommodum. There was no allocation of area in the quoad sacra church to the heritors whose lands were attached to it, nor was there any obligation on them to maintain the fabric of that church; the quoad sacra from the former parish. It was not a disjunction and erection in general terms or quoad omnia. It is therefore the same as in the present case. It is true that the heritors of the disjoined lands are under the statute of Victoria not liable to be assessed for the expense of repairing the church and manse of the newly erected parish to which they are attached, and that the statute requires provision to be made otherwise for that purpose by obligation secured over the lands of the obligant. The statute and constitution of the church also provide that the rents of a portion of the seats of the church (but of a portion only) may be partly applied to that purpose in relief of the obligation.

"But this is just another way of throwing the burden of supporting the church on those for whom it is provided. For it seems not to make much difference in principle whether the heritor pays such expense for the benefit of himself and his tenants, recouping himself, so far as they are concerned, by the rents which he exacts from them, or that they and he pay it in the other form of seat-rents. The terms of the decree establish that the church and parish were erected for the accommodation of the inhabitants of the district, and it is to that church that they are expected and intended to resort to 'for the word and sacraments.' Accordingly the lands are disjoined from the parish of Jedburgh quoad sacra; they are no longer parts of that parish. It may be difficult to define all that the words quoad sacra mean; but surely it cannot be doubted that the preaching of the word and administering the sacraments and partaking are inter sacra, and these are the very benefits contemplated by the law in respect of which there is laid upon the heritors the burden and duty of providing and repairing churches, and in respect of which there is given to them, as the counterpart, a right for themselves and the tenants and occupants of their lands in the area of the church. It would surely be an extraordinary thing that the law should provide two parish churches, two parish ministers, and two kirk-sessions for the inhabitants of the same district. It appears to the Sheriff that the disjunction of the lands quoad sacra from the parish of Jedburgh would have no meaning if things were to remain in this respect exactly as they were before; and if the heritors in these disjoined lands were still to be liable for the repairing, and, if necessary, rebuilding the church of the parish from which they have been disjoined, and entitled to a portion of the seatings therein, and that for the benefit of the inhabitants of a district for whose convenience in rebus sacris a new parish church has been erected by decree of the Court of Teinds, in the terms and on the considerations therein expressed."

church is erected,—where the nature of the work is not merely an extension of the old church or repairs of the old church, but the erection of a new church,—the heritors or any of them are entitled to apply to the Sheriff to have the area divided among them according to their legal rights. Now, the legal rights of the heritors in connection with the parish church are, I think, very well settled. I do not think there can be any dispute about what they are. The heritors have the burden, which is imposed by statute, of building and maintaining parish churches, as well as other ecclesiastical buildings, and the buildings which they so build and maintain are in law the property of the heritors. But I need hardly add that they are only property in trust,—in trust, that is to say, for the whole body of the parishioners within the parish; and when, in the division of the area among the heritors, the accommodation in the parish church comes to be appropriated so much to one heritor and so much to another, I think, in like manner, each individual heritor becomes trustee for those of the parishioners that reside upon his estate. The portion of the area that is assigned to him is not his property in any sense of the word. The heritors are joint proprietors of the parish church itself, in trust, as I said already; but the portion of the area that is assigned to each heritor is given to him not to be occupied exclusively by himself and his family,—not to be shut up, for that is illegal,—not to be hired out for money, for that is equally illegal,—but to be used for the benefit of the parishioners who are resident upon his estate; so that each individual heritor, after the division is made, is equally a trustee for a portion of the parishioners, as the whole heritors, before the division was made, were trustees for the entire parish. Now, I do not at all doubt that both the burden and the right of the heritors in this matter are civil burden and civil right, and fall to be adjudicated upon by civil jurisdiction only. All that is perfectly clear. The title of the heritors to the parish church is a title founded upon civil law, and their burden to maintain and uphold the parish church is a burden imposed upon them by public statute. But it does by no means follow that those for whom they hold the parish church in trust have civil rights in connection with it. That would be a most dangerous assumption. The parishioners other than the heritors, I apprehend, have no right or interest in the parish church except such rights and interests as are entirely inter sacra. They are entitled to attend the parish church to hear the word, and there to have the sacraments administered to them, and they are entitled to the pastoral superintendence of the minister of that church, and they are liable to the kirk-session of that church in all ecclesiastical discipline and censure; and, so far, there can be no doubt that the parishioners are exclusively interested in that church, and I may say, at the same time, exclusively attached to that church, for according to the ecclesiastical law of Scotland it is their proper church, and they have no other. But when a parish is erected quoad sacra under the operation of the statute 7 and 8 of the Queen, and a portion of an old parish is cut off from that old parish and erected into a new parish quoad sacra, what is the result to the people of that district which is so disjoined and erected? My Lords, for answer to that question I look to the case of Hutton v. Harper, and I really have nothing to add to what I there said, and in which I understood that all your Lordships who were present and took part in that judgment concurred. I said then, as I am prepared to say more shortly now, that the people within the district that is so disjoined and erected have, after the disjunction and erection, no parish church but the new parish church quoad sacra. To it alone they are in law entitled to resort as their parish church. They are subject to the pastoral superintendence of the minister and to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the kirk-session of that quoad sacra parish and church. They must resort there for the administration of the sacraments and the solemnisation of marriage, and that is the proper place, as we also held in that case, for their banns to be proclaimed. Now, that being so, the question arises in the present case, first, whether the people who formerly were in the parish of Jedburgh, but are now in the parish of Edgerston quoad sacra, are not completely severed and cut off from all connection with the parish church of Jedburgh. I am speaking now of the body of the parishioners, not of the heritors, and to that I think there can be but one answer,—that they are most effectually cut off from and have no longer any right or interest in the parish church of Jedburgh, and that their only parish church is the parish church of Edgerston, which, according to the judgment in Hutton v. Harper, is just as much a parish church as the parish church of Jedburgh.

Well, then, if that be so, the question comes to be, whether the heritors, the proprietors of those lands which form the new parish quoad sacra, are nevertheless entitled to have a portion of the area of the old parish church of Jedburgh allocated to them in the same way as if the erection of the new parish had not taken place. It is said that they are not relieved from their liability to maintain the old parish church, and that it would be very strange if they were to be subject to that liability and not to have the corresponding privilege of having a portion of the area assigned to them. That is at first sight very plausible; but if you remark for a moment what is the purpose for which a portion of the area is assigned to those heritors I think we shall find there is really no strength in the argument at all. The purpose of assigning a portion of the area to those heritors is that they may accommodate the tenants and residenters upon their estates. But the tenants and residenters upon their estates are bound to go elsewhere, and do not go to the parish church of Jedburgh, for it is no longer their parish church, and if these gentlemen, being, as I have said, trustees for the parishioners, find they have nobody for whom they can use the portion of the area they ask to have assigned to them, it would be very strange that they should still be entitled to have it. They are not entitled to shut it up; they are not entitled to let it out for money: What can they do? They cannot fill it with their own people, and therefore, even if it were assigned to them, they could make no use of it. Now, that seems to me to be a plain practical answer to the demand which is here made. It may very well be that, notwithstanding this, they may still be liable in the old burden of maintaining the parish church of Jedburgh. I am very far from giving an opinion upon that question, because it is not before us, and we could not decide it even if we were willing to do so.

But assuming that that is so,—assuming that the heritors of the disjoined district are still liable to bear their share of the maintenance of the parish church of Jedburgh—I do not think it in the least degree follows that they are entitled to what they now demand. It might perhaps have been very properly provided in the statute 7 and 8 of the Queen that they should be relieved of that burden, or it might very properly have been provided that they were not to be relieved of their burden, although they no longer had any interest in the division of the area, and I think it is to be regretted that the statute did not decide the matter the one way or the other. The truth is, that the legislation in that statute is in some of these respects rather imperfect legislation, and all that we can do is to say what is the natural and necessary legal consequence of that which the statute has done in those cases in which it has not itself provided for those consequences.

I do not at all agree with the view which the Sheriff takes of the case of Crieff. I think the authority of that case is questionable. There are a variety of reports of the case, and a perusal of the Session Papers has rather led me to the conclusion that there was no very general question decided there at all,—that the case was one of a very special kind indeed,—and, therefore I confess I do not attach any importance to that authority. I proceed entirely upon what I conceive to be the direct, legitimate, and necessary consequence of the erection of a parish quoad sacra under the operation of the statute 7 and 8 of the Queen.

My opinion, therefore, is, that the interlocutor of the Sheriff, so far as it is complained of here, is well founded.

Lord Deas.—It is historically known that, from a remote period, probably from about the time when Presbytery was finally established in Scotland, down to the year 1874, or thereby, those of the parishioners of Jedburgh who adhered to the Establishment habitually assembled for the purposes of public worship in a portion of the nave of the old abbey of Jedburgh, which has immemorially been considered and dealt with as the parish church. In order to adapt it for that purpose great liberties were from time to time taken with the elegant architecture of the abbey, by roughly building up portions of the windows, introducing an intermediate ceiling, and other alterations, which, although made at much expense, greatly deteriorated the appearance of the venerable pile, as those of your Lordships who have had occasion, as I have had for many years, to hold Circuit Courts at Jedburgh, must often have seen. In the meantime, the late Marquis of Lothian, the proprietor of the abbey, whose cultivated tastes, matured by study and improved by travel, naturally suggested to him such a task, had become desirous to remove the blots which hid or defaced the beauty of the building, and marred its effect as an interesting relic of antiquity. With this object the late Marquis, in 1869, entered into an agreement with the heritors, including the burghal community of Jedburgh, and with the Presbytery, to erect, at his own expense, a parish church on a different site, such as in all respects would satisfy the heritors and Presbytery, and bound himself thereafter to enter with them into a contract of excambion, conveying that church in perpetuity to the heritors, in consideration of their conveying to him all right and interest they had in the existing church (which is therein recognised as being the then existing parish church), the Marquis engaging that, after the materials thereof should be removed, so far as consistent with the stability of the ancient building, the abbey should be retained as a preserved ruin, accessible to the public, under appropriate regulations, in all time coming. After the death of the late Marquis, his brother, the present Marquis, desirous to carry out in all respects the designs of his predecessor, acquired the necessary ground, and erected thereon the handsome new church, the area of which is now sought to be divided, and commenced expensive operations, still in progress when I was on circuit there a few weeks ago, upon the abbey itself, besides erecting (what I do not observe to have been stipulated for) a new manse, in order to get quit of the old manse, as an obstruction to the view of the ancient ruins. On the new church being completed, the deed of excambion and agreement now before us, of 17th and 20th November 1874,—stipulated for in the agreement of 1869, and embodying and giving effect to the purposes and conditions of that agreement, —was duly executed by all the parties concerned. This deed of excambion formally dispones and conveys the ground on which the new church is built, and the church itself, to the persons therein named, and their respective successors, "as trustees for the said heritors of the parish of Jedburgh," that is to say, for the whole heritors of the civil parish, "heritably and irredeemably," and, on the other hand, the committee of heritors appointed for the purpose, "as representing the said heritors of the parish of Jedburgh, and duly authorised as aforesaid to execute these presents on their behalf," with consent of the Presbytery of Jedburgh, disponed and conveyed to the Marquis, "and his heirs and assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably, All and Whole the present parish church of Jedburgh, situated within the abbey of Jedburgh and county of Roxburgh, together with the materials of the said church, and all right, title, and interest of the heritors of the said parish of Jedburgh, and of the community of Jedburgh, in the said church, and materials thereof," the Marquis becoming bound, on the terms already mentioned, as to the preservation of the ruin.

Nearly twenty years before the date of the contract of excambion (viz. in February 1855) the lands now forming the quoad sacra parish of Edgerston had been disjoined from the parish of Jedburgh, and erected into a separate parish quoad sacra, under sections 8 and 9 of the statute 7th and 8th of the Queen, c. 44; but it is not alleged that this had had any effect, or led to any change, upon the previously existing allocation and possession of the area of the old church, as settled by voluntary agreements in 1793 and 1834. The decree of disjunction and erection was necessarily an echo of the 8th and 9th sections of the statute under which it proceeded. The individual contributors became bound and gave security for permanently repairing and upholding the previously existing fabric of the church, now called the church of Edgerston, manse, offices, and appurtenances, and for payment of the prescribed stipend to the minister. The whole sittings were directed to be specially appropriated in terms of the statute—viz., one-tenth to be free to all comers; a portion, not exceeding two-tenths, to be let at rents not exceeding a rate to be fixed by the Presbytery; a pew to be set apart for the minister; another for the elders; and the remaining sittings to be let in a manner to be agreed on by the minister and the contributors for the endowment of the church, and the proceeds to be applied to the purposes specified in the statute. No right was conferred on the heritors of the quoad sacra district to seats in the church unless they chose to pay for them. In their capacity of heritors they obtained no unconditional rights, and became liable to no burdens in connection with that church, or the district assigned to it; and, on the other hand, nothing was said, or, so far as I see, could have been said, in the decree, consistently with the statute, to deprive them of any rights of occupancy, or relieve them from any burdens connected with the then existing parish church of Jedburgh.

Matters had been in this position for nearly twenty years when the contract of excambion now under consideration was entered into, and to which no objection is taken as being other than a legal and binding contract. The conveyance in that contract is a conveyance of an heritable subject in favour of the whole heritors of the civil parish of Jedburgh, and the consideration given for it is, in like manner, a conveyance of an heritable subject which previously had been vested in the whole heritors of that parish. The question did not and could not arise what would have been the respective liabilities and rights of parties if a new church had required to be erected at the expense of the heritors. It had not even been determined or ascertained that a new church had become necessary. Mr Bryce, with whose eminent qualifications we are all familiar, had reported that, by expending £2700, in the way he pointed out, "the church will become fitted for public worship," with the same amount of accommodation as it then afforded, while Mr Bell, the only other man of skill employed, reported that, by an expenditure of £2000, the church "would form an equally suitable and more noble place of worship than could be got beyond the walls of the abbey for ten or twelve thousand pounds." In short, it was not the necessity for a new church to accommodate the congregation, but the laudable desire of the noble Marquis to vindicate the dignity and beauty of the historic building which led to the agreement under which the new church was erected, and to the contract of excambion subsequently executed.

The question at issue, therefore, rather appears to me to be limited to this:—What is the fair and legal import and effect of the contract of excambion of November 1874? The old church accommodated about 1000 sitters; the new church, it was explained at the bar, accommodates about 150 more than that number. The one church has been excambed for the other, and the natural result of that excambion appears to me to be that the parties who were previously in possession of the one should now be entitled to possession of the other. The case is not varied by the fact that the Marquis had to build a church to be conveyed by the excambion, in place of being possessed of an existing church suitable to be so conveyed. It is still a case of excambion of one church for another, and nothing can be more expressive of the nature of the transaction than the word excambion itself, which is both the legal and the conventional name of the contract.

It is true that, although, after enlarging the number of free sittings which are proper to be set apart in every parish church, the number to be allocated would have been the same as before, there would necessarily be a change of arrangement, rendering judicial regulation necessary; but for this the Sheriff was just as competent where the question arose upon a contract of excambion as if it had arisen in any other way. It is true, as the Sheriff remarks, that the petition craves a division of the area "in terms of law," but that I take to be in terms of law applicable to the agreement which is expressly narrated and founded on in the petition. How far the Sheriff's judgment might or might not, in certain events, preclude a declarator in this Court, it is not necessary here to consider; but I am not, for my own part, disposed either to throw out the proceedings for want of jurisdiction, or to hold them conclusive as amounting to an arbitration. An arbitration certainly they are not, and were never meant to be. They are a reviewable process, or they are nothing. It is on the merits that I am disposed to differ from the able judgment of the Sheriff. I think what he should have done was simply to have regarded the new area as substituted for the old,—allocating it, as nearly as might be, as the parties themselves had previously and immemorially allocated it, and making no farther changes than the different arrangement of the seats rendered necessary. There was no expense to be allocated either for building or for repairs. All that fell to be done was to modify and regulate the possession so as to give effect to the contract of excambion.

If, however, your Lordships do not think this limited view sufficient, of itself, for the disposal of the case, I am then of opinion that the first thing to be considered is who would have been liable for the expense of the church if it had fallen to be built by the heritors themselves?

I cannot find any difference of opinion among the authorities that the two things go together—the liability for the expense of erecting a new church, and the right to a share in the allocation of the area of that church.

It is upon this principle that questions between the burghal and landward portions of a parish have been settled. We have the weighty opinion, to this effect, of Lord Braxfield in the first case of Crieff, nearly a century ago (Hailes, pp. 892-3),—"They who profit by a church when built should naturally be at the expense of building it. Here the town must have three-fourths of the area of the church, because three-fourth of the inhabitants of the parish live in the town, and consequently it must pay three-fourths of the expense." In the same case Lord Monboddo said,—"If the inhabitants of the town pay nothing, they can have no share in the division;" and the Lord President observed,—"If the heritors build the church the area must belong to them." Accordingly the interlocutor of the Court expressly found that the expense of that portion of the church which was allotted to the landward heritors must be defrayed by them according to their respective valued rents, and their share of the area divided among them in the same proportion; and that the expense of the portion allotted to the burghal proprietors must be defrayed by them according to their respective real rents, and their share of the area divided among them in the same proportion (M. 7927).

The same principle, viz., that the burden of building and maintaining the church infers a corresponding right to a share of the area, is distinctly laid down in the late case of Reid v. The Commissioners of Woods and Forests, 10th February 1850, 12 D. 1211, and runs through all the cases.

It has been suggested that, in the present case, we are not called upon to consider whether the heritors in the quoad sacra parish do or do not remain liable to maintain the church of the old parish, and to rebuild it if that should become necessary. I cannot take that view of the matter. The immediate question, no doubt, is their right to a share of the area. There is no burden at present exigible, because the Marquis has liberally agreed to relieve them of whatever is instantly payable; but their permanent liability either remains or does not remain, and upon that depends their having right or having no right to a share of the area in this process of division, if it is to be regarded, as your Lordship proposes to regard it, as a regular process of that description. To exclude them from all share in the division of the area of the church, without reference to whether they are or are not liable to contribute to the maintenance and ultimate re-erection of the church, would be to divorce two things which, in their own nature, are, and in the practice of the Court, always have been, inseparably united. Such a course would neither be just nor judicial. It is in respect of the permanent liability or of the non-liability alone that our judgment can proceed, whether these words be used in the judgment or not, and that question is, therefore, as I have said, the first point to be considered.

Now, apart from the effect of the quoad sacra disjunction and erection, nobody will dispute, that, in a landward parish, liability to build and maintain the parish church rests exclusively and equally on all the heritors in proportion to their valued rents. This is, in substance, matter of statutory enactment, because, although the old Scotch statutes, which I need not go over, bear to lay the burden upon the parishioners, the word parishioners has been invariably construed as meaning heritors. In the present case there is no dispute between the landward heritors and the burghal heritors or proprietors. These two classes of parties are agreed between themselves, so that, for the purposes of this argument, the question is to be taken as arising in a purely landward parish. That question simply is, does the statute 7 and 8 Victoria, c. 44, when it is followed by a disjunction and erection of a quoad sacra parish, under sections 8 and 9, relieve the heritors in that quoad sacra parish from a liability which, by the previously existing statute law, lay upon them, equally with the other heritors of the original parish, to maintain, and, if necessary, to rebuild the parish church.

If we are of opinion that this is the meaning and effect of these sections of the statute we ought so to lay it down. But, for my own part, I cannot find this in the statute. There is a clear distinction, which was given effect to in the case just mentioned of Reid v. The Commissioners of Woods and Forests, between a disjunction and erection quoad omnia, under the earlier sections of this statute, and a disjunction and erection quoad sacra, under sections 8 and 9. That difference is not new. Every lawyer knows that, long before the date of this statute, the Commissioners of Teinds had and exercised the power in both ways, but the effect of the one was never confounded with the effect of the other. The provisions I have noticed in sections 8 and 9 of this statute relative to the stipend, seat-rents, and supporting the fabric of the new church, manse, &c., contrasted (as was observed in Reid's case) with the terms of the previous sections, make it clear that, as to these matters, this statute does not destroy the distinction between the one kind of disjunction and erection and the other. Liability for the expense of maintaining and rebuilding the parish church is a civil liability. No ingenuity can plausibly represent it as anything else. It is precisely similar, in this respect, to liability for the stipend. The one is a burden on the lands and the other a burden on the teinds, and it might just as well be contended that a mere disjunction and erection quoad sacra relieved the teinds of the one burden as that it relieves the lands of the other. On the same principle the uniting of lands to a parish quoad sacra tantum does not render the lands so united liable to civil burdens in the parish to which they are so united, as was long ago found in Park v. Maxwell, 13th July 1748 (M. 8503, and Elchies, voce Manse, No. 3), where lands united quoad sacra to the parish of Carmunnoch were held not liable to contribute towards building a manse for that parish. Bankton accordingly (book 2, tit. 3, sec. 50) lays down the law thus:—"Part of a parish on some occasions is dismembered from one parish and united to another quoad sacra only, i.e., in respect of divine service. This is done where it is more commodious for the inhabitants of the dismembered part to attend the ordinances at the neighbouring parish church than at their own, and only subjects them to the cure and charge of the minister of the adjacent parish; but in all questions of a civil concern it remains still a part of the same parish of which it was formerly before the annexation; and the heritors therein are not bound to contribute to the repairs of the church or manse of the parish to which the lands are united in that manner;" and he cites the case of Park v. Maxwell, which I have just referred to. Erskine lays down the same doctrine, and says,—"But such annexation affects only the inhabitants; the lands continue in all civil respects part of the old parish"—(2, 10, 64). The case of Thomson v. Pollock and others, 17th November 1808, F. C., which related to the maintenance of a pauper child, illustrates the same principle. The interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, which was unanimously adhered to, expressly bore to be in respect that the lands which were annexed quoad sacra to the parish of Gorbals "are locally situated within the parish of Govan, and that the said act of annexation does not affect the civil rights of the parties."

There can be no distinction, in this respect, between civil rights and civil burdens. In the opinion of your Lordship (the Lord President), concurred in by the other Judges then present (six in number), in the late case of Hutton v. Harper, 7th July 1875 (2 Rettie, p. 893), your Lordship expressly mentions "the maintenance of churches" among the burdens which, subsequent to the Reformation, have been "naturally and even necessarily classed inter civilia."—(Vide, p. 900). I quite concur in your Lordship's opinion upon that point, as well as in the soundness of the judgment pronounced in that case, which, indeed, has been affirmed by the Court of last resort. But that case stands in contrast to the present. The proclamation of banns, there in question, was an act performed within the church to satisfy not the civil law, but the rules of the Church. It is one of the tritest principles of the law of Scotland that marriage is a civil contract perfected by consent alone. The marriage is just as valid in law without as with the proclamation of banns, which could not well therefore be regarded otherwise than as a quoad sacra act. The obligation to maintain, in perpetuity, the parish church of Jedburgh is an obligation quoad civilia attaching to the lands in the district, which have not been disjoined quoad civilia from the original parish, and the civil law consequently demands implement of that obligation. The case of Hutton, therefore, only illustrates the difference between a quoad sacra act and a civil liability or a civil right.

Holding that the heritors in the quoad sacra parish of Edgerston remain liable to maintain, and, if necessary, to rebuild the parish church of Jedburgh, I think it follows, as a necessary consequence, that, in a process of division, they are entitled to a proportion of the area, unless, by prescription or agreement, some different arrangement has been sanctioned, which, in the present case, is not averred.

The only authority which has been supposed to imply the contrary is the Crieff case of Drummond, 2d February 1773, F. C., and M. 7920. But that case, when carefully examined, will be found to be quite consistent with the rule commodum sequitur onus, and to have been intended, in fact, to carry out that rule. The reports, or rather notices, of it (for they cannot be called reports) give nothing but the judgment,—the effect of which depends entirely on the circumstances, which are not given to any extent, probably just because they were so special that the case could not form a precedent for any other. I have attentively read the Session Papers, so far as extant, and I have come to the conclusion that the judgment had reference to the views contended for by the respective parties in the very special circumstances of that case, and was not meant to disturb the general law as laid down by Bankton (ii. 8, 50) and Erskine (ii. 10, 64), and recognised in all previous decisions, both as to rights and burdens connected with a parish church.

The pursuer of the action was Mr Drummond, whose lands of Logiealmond were disjoined quoad sacra from the parish of Monzie, and annexed quoad sacra to the parish of Moneidie. The parties who appeared as defenders were, 1st, the Duke of Atholl, whose lands of Glenalmond were disjoined quoad sacra from the parish of Crieff and annexed quoad sacra to the parish of Monzie; 2d, certain heritors of the original parish of Monzie; and 3d, certain heritors of the original parish of Moneidie.

The decreet of disjunction and erection referred to had been pronounced in 1702, and included portions of various other parishes, the ground assigned for that decreet of disjunction being distance from the parish kirks. Mr Drummond's lands of Logiealmond, for instance, were upwards of ten miles from the parish kirk of Monzie but quite near to the parish kirk of Moneidie. The parties being at variance as to the possession which had followed by the tenants of Logiealmond in the kirk of Moneidie, it was agreed to hold certain declarations, taken before the minister, as evidence. From these declarations it appeared that, from the date of the decreet downwards, Mr Drummond's tenants of Logiealmond had been accommodated with seats in and attended the kirk of Moneidie, in place of the kirk of Monzie; that, up to 1722, they sat in a loft on the north wall of the kirk of Moneidie; that in that year a loft was built for them, at their own expense, on the west wall of that kirk, which was called Logiealmond loft; that they occupied this loft till it was broken down and removed in the course of some alterations being made upon the kirk; and that, from that time forward, they still continued to come to the same kirk and sat in it wherever they could find room. It was said there had been some formal division of the area of the kirk of Moneidie prior to the date of the decreet, but of this there was no evidence, and it was not alleged that there had been any subsequent division.

Before these declarations were taken a supplementary summons had been brought by Mr Drummond against the heritors of Moneidie, which is not among the papers preserved. But it is stated, narrativé, in the information for the Moneidie heritors, that the leading conclusions of that summons were in these terms:—"1mo, that he (Mr Drummond) and his tenants of Logiealmond had an undoubted and just title to a share of the area either of the kirk of Monzie or Moneidie, in proportion to his valued rent, and that a division, either of the one kirk or the other, ought to be made and a seat set apart for him; and that he should be free in all time coming of the expense of repairing and upholding the church, churchyard dike, manse, and schoolhouse of the said other church. 2do, Or, in case it should be found that he was not entitled to a share of the area of either of the churches of Monzie or Moneidie, that, in that case, he should be free of any expense of repairing or upholding the same."

The same paper further bears:—"These processes having afterwards been conjoined by the Lord Ordinary, it was contended for the pursuer at a calling of this date (6th December 1770) that he was entitled to kirk-room in one or other of the kirks of Moneidie or Monzie, and was only bound to uphold one or other of them, and declared that, if he was freed of all burden of the kirk of Monzie, he would, at his own expense, build and uphold an aisle to the kirk of Moneidie for accommodating himself and his tenants; but that, if he was not freed of the burden of the kirk of Monzie, the heritors of Moneidie must find room for him."

As regards the heritors of Moneidie, they "declared that they were willing to allow Logiealmond to build an aisle to the church of Moneidie at his own expense; but that, as they had peaceably enjoyed, past all memory, their possession of the body of the church, which was no more than sufficient for their own accommodation, they could not be obliged to give up those possessions in order to accommodate Logiealmond, or to lay any additional burden on themselves." No. 121.

June 1, 1876. Duke of Roxburghe, &c.

On the other hand, the heritors of Monzie pleaded, in substance, that the pursuer, Mr Drummond, must find kirk-room as he best could in the kirk of Moneidie, in which he and his tenants had been in use to be accommodated, but that he must remain liable to repair the kirk of Monzie. For the Duke of Atholl it was specially contended, "that as the tenants of his lands annexed to this parish had been in possession, long past the years of prescription, of the seats which they now possess in the church of Monzie, they could not now be disquieted by the pursuer, whose lands had been annexed to the parish of Moneidie, where his people have a right to seats and to attend divine ordinances."

It was in this state of the pleadings that the interlocutor was pronounced, which is said to have been in these terms:—"The Lords find that the heritors of the lands annexed quoad sacra are liable in their proportion of upholding the fabric of the kirks to which they are annexed, and in no other parochial burden: Find that they are not liable to contribute for upholding the fabric of the parish kirks from which they are disjoined; but that they remain liable in all other parochial burdens in these parishes; and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed accordingly."

It is obvious, from these quotations, that it would be very unsafe, to say the least of it, to hold that the judgment in the case of Drummond was intended to alter or disturb the general law, as ruled in previous cases, and laid down by the institutional writers. That judgment rather seems to have been intended to give effect to the usage which, for nearly double the period of the long prescription, had followed upon the decreet of 1702, and to the mutual concessions and expressed wishes of the parties, with such modifications only as were necessary to make the result arrived at a consistent result. But the principle affirmed, after all, was that the right to the area and the burden of supporting the fabric of the church, must go together; and that is precisely the principle which the appellants seek to vindicate in the present case. They are bound to support the fabric of the church of Jedburgh, and consequently they claim a share of the area of that church. They have no right to any share of the area of the church of Edgerston, and they are admittedly not bound to support the fabric of that church. In both of these respects the case differs from the case of Drummond, which, whatever view may be taken of it, cannot form a precedent for the Sheriff's judgment in this case. There was indeed, in the case of Drummond, no quoad sacra church or quoad sacra parish at all. It was a case of prescriptive usage and special arrangement with reference to different parish churches, properly so called, and decided no question of general law. The existence of the judgment in that case could not be unknown to the Judges in the comparatively recent case of Reid v. The Commissioners of Woods and Forests, for besides being noticed in the Faculty Collection and the Dictionary, it was referred to in a note by the first editor of Erskine, who does not, however, seem to have looked beyond the interlocutor, which, as I have said, is all that is to be found in either of the reports. But the Judges, in Reid's case, obviously did not regard the judgment as disturbing the old doctrine enunciated by Lord Braxfield in the case of Crieff. On the contrary, the Lord Justice-Clerk expressly said, in Reid's case, that the disjunction and erection being only quoad sacra, the heritors "remain liable for the maintenance of the old church," the new church being maintained from the rents of the seats, which the heritors might take or not as they chose; and Lord Mackenzie observed,—"If the heritors are relieved from the maintenance of the church, they have no right to have a division of the area."

It is not because I suppose that your Lordships will think the case of Drummond, to any extent, or in any view of it, a precedent for the Sheriff's judgment here that I have thought it right to analyse that case thoroughly, but because the imperfect notice of it in the books is calculated to mislead, and the Session Papers, even to those who have access to them, being diffuse and voluminous, the true nature of it is not easily ascertained. Laying it aside, I venture to say that the authorities are uniform to the effect that, at the date of the passing of the Act 7 and 8 Vict., cap. 44, the law was that the heritors were bound to build and maintain the parish church, and were entitled to participate in the division of the area in proportion to the valued rent (or real rent as the case might be) on which they were assessed.

The statute in question does not say that when a disjunction and erection, applicable to a portion of the parish, takes place, under sections 8th and 9th of the statute, this shall affect either the burden of maintaining the parish church or the right to participate in the area. It is said that this is done by implication. Or rather it must be said (and the current of opinion among your Lordships seems, accordingly, to be drifting to that) that the right is taken away by implication, but the burden remains. This is attributed to imperfect legislation. I can understand that if the Legislature had expressly abolished the right to participate in the area of the parish church, and said nothing about the burden, we might have had to give effect to the abolition, although we thought the legislation imperfect in saying nothing of the burden. But I can find no implication here which, if it applied to the right, would not apply to the burden. Nor, so far as I can see, have any grounds been suggested for such implication which a Court of law can give effect to, either as to the one or the other. The legislation may, very possibly, be imperfect; but if so, it is an imperfection which the Legislature alone can remedy. If we were to attempt to deal with it we should be legislating and not judging.

None of your Lordships, I presume, will say that the right of an heritor to sittings in a parish church for himself and his tenants is a quoad sacra right. I never heard that suggested either at the bar or on the bench; and if there be any authority for it I am ignorant where it is to be found. We have no consecration of parish churches in Scotland. It is nearly two centuries ago since the Lords found, in the case of Lithgow v. Wilkieson (15th January 1697, M. 9637), "that both seats in churches and burial-places were not res sanctæ et religiosæ, so as to be extra commercium, but were conveyable by infeftment and affectable by creditors,"—that is to say, they were adjudgeable by creditors along with and as pertinents of the lands; or, where there was a right to a particular aisle or seat secured by infeftment followed by prescriptive possession (of which there are known instances), that right might be adjudged from the owner. The case of Lithgow seems to have been a competition for a family seat between the purchaser of a few acres of the lands, whose disposition made no mention of the seat, and the purchaser of the mansion-house, whose disposition expressly conveyed the seat; but the merits of that competition do not enter into the purpose for which I mention the case.

I may observe, however, that the allocation of a family seat to a principal heritor is simply a sub-division between himself and his tenants of the portion of the area corresponding to his whole valued rent, as was found in the case of The Earl of Marchmont v. The Earl of Home and Others, 17th December 1776, M. 7924; so that there never can be a good claim to a family seat unless there be a good claim to a share of the area corresponding to the heritors' whole valued rent.

No. 121.

Duke of Roxburghe, &c.

Nor can I see the consistency of holding the right of the heritor to be a civil right, and the right of his tenants to be a quoad sacra right. The heritor may farm his own lands—many heritors do—or he may farm a portion of his lands, sometimes larger, sometimes smaller. Is the right to vary from civil to sacred, and sacred to civil, according to such circumstances, which are constantly varying? That would be very anomalous; and equally so that the same act of sitting in the church which was quoad sacra in the tenant should be quoad civilia in the landlord—in other words, that the right to the same seat should be civil or sacred according as a heritor or a tenant happened, for the time being, to occupy the seat. The only consistent view is that the right must be the same whoever exercises it. If it were a quoad sacra right the minister and kirk-session might be expected to have a control over it. But it was determined a century and a half ago that they have none.—Heritors of Falkland v. The Minister and Kirk-Session (20th February 1739, M. 7916).

The right to a portion of the area of a parish church is a pertinent of the lands. It is comprehended in the infeftment, and is just as much a civil right as the right to the lands themselves. It is not only a civil right, but it is a heritable right. It descends to the heir-at-law along with the lands, and it passes to a purchaser or other disponee of the lands as part and pertinent, although not mentioned in the disposition. So much is this the case that it cannot, unless under very peculiar circumstances, be separated from the lands, nor even from the occupancy of the lands. The tenant's claim to the sittings corresponding to the valued rent of the lands he occupies is a claim in his own right, to vindicate which nothing is necessary but production of his lease of the lands, although the lease may be silent on the subject of these sittings. These very restrictions on the power of the proprietor, in the use and disposal of the right, afford the strongest illustration that can well be given of its being an inherent pertinent of the lands, and never to be held disjoined from them by implication.

In the case of Duff v. Brodie (29th June 1769, M. 9644) the report bears:—"The question was, whether a seat in a church was understood to be carried by a disposition of the lands, without being expressed in the disposition?" "The Lords found the pursuer (the disponee) entitled to the seat."

In the case of Peden (21st November 1770, M. 9644) a rural estate was purchased by the burgh of Paisley, at a judicial sale, without any mention being made of the church-seat. A house and garden in the town of Paisley were, at the same sale, purchased by a lady, Mrs Cochrane, who took possession of the seat, and used it undisturbed for several years. The magistrates having then objected to her disponee, Mrs Peden, retaining the seat, Mrs Peden applied to the Sheriff to vindicate her possession. The Sheriff found she had no right to the seat. The Lord Ordinary remitted simpliciter, and the Lords unanimously adhered.

Mr Erskine accordingly says (ii. 6, 11),—"The right in the area of the parish church, though it cannot properly be called part of the lands contained in the charter, is yet so closely connected with them that it is carried to the purchaser as pertinent, in virtue of the natural right that every landholder has in such a proportion of it as corresponds to the valuation of his lands in the parish;" and he cites the case of Duff, which I have just referred to.

No. 121.

June 1, 1876. Duke of Roxburghe, &c.

But it is suggested (and this seems the view mainly relied on) that there are no longer any parties connected with the lands to occupy the relative seats in the parish church.

This, however, depends upon the pleasure of the heritors in the quoad sacra parish and their tenants. There is nothing, that I know of, to prevent any or all of them continuing to attend the parish church as formerly, if they think proper. They may prefer to occupy their free seats in the parish church to paying for seats in the quoad sacra church, or they may choose sometimes to attend the one church and sometimes the other. There is happily no thirling of those who adhere to the Church of Scotland to a particular clergyman or a particular church. It is common enough for those of us who have town houses and country houses to take the benefit of the only ordinances known in the Scotch Church, viz., baptism and the Lord's Supper, sometimes in the town church and sometimes in the country church, whether it be a proper parish church or a quoad sacra church. And there may be those who do not care to take the benefit of the ordinances in either church, but who are not thereby disqualified from occupying the seats appropriated for them in either church, or from delegating their right to do so, temporarily and gratuitously, during pleasure, to any friend or friends in the parish, although they cannot let the seats, or make them, in any way, a source of profit. The jurisdiction which a clergyman of the Church of Scotland has over members of his congregation is purely ecclesiastical and of the slightest possible description. The ordinance of baptism may be duly administered, and marriage may be celebrated, quite consistently with the rules of the church, by any ordained clergyman at any time and in any place. Baptisms in private houses, by Established as well as Dissenting clergymen, are common, and marriages in Scotch churches, in modern practice at least, are all but, if not entirely, unknown. Admission to the sacrament of the Lord's Supper is refused only on the ground of objectionable life or doctrine; and even this refusal does not affect the right of the party, where he has that right, to sit in the church, or any of his other civil rights. Nor is it considered an ecclesiastical offence, but rather a merit, for a member of a particular congregation of the Church of Scotland to have joined at the dispensation of the Lord's Supper in another congregation of the same church where he happens to be at the time, and is known to the minister and kirk-session who sanction his doing so. Accordingly all the clergymen, from other congregations, who assist a brother clergyman in dispensing the sacrament, habitually, themselves, become communicants, in his church, on these occasions.

Moreover, in this question of division of the area of a parish church the law does not inquire whether the heritor and his tenants will attend the parish church or not. It is enough that they are capable of attending,—that is to say, that they are examinable persons, which they are held to be if twelve years of age. In allocating the area of a parish church among the heritors no distinction falls to be made between Churchmen and Dissenters, whether Roman Catholics, Episcopalians, Free Churchmen, United Presbyterians, or Dissenters of any other class. The right, as I have said, is a pertinent of the lands, and does not depend on the religious views either of the heritor or his tenants for the time being, or the churches which they habitually attend. Accommodation falls to be provided for two-thirds of the whole examinable inhabitants upon these lands, whatever may be their creeds, of which accommodation they may or may not avail themselves at their pleasure.

No. 121.

It was so decided in the case of Tingwall, 22d June 1787, M. 7928. The Lord Ordinary found "that when it becomes necessary to build a new church the heritors of the parish are bound to provide one sufficient for the accommodation of the parishioners capable of attending public worship; and that this is a burden under which they acquired and held their estates." The Court made this judgment more definite by finding that the heritors "are obliged to build a church capable of containing two-thirds of the examinable persons in the parish, not under twelve years of age, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed accordingly."

The report also bears that "this was laid down as a general rule to be observed in all time coming."

The rule has accordingly been held fixed and enforced ever since, wherever it has been sought to be enforced. It was commented on and considered, in that view, in the comparatively recent case of M'Leod v. Carment, 9th February 1830, 8 S. and D. 475. The direct question in that case was, whether the large portion of the population of the parish of Rosskeen, who spoke the Gaelic language, fell to be taken into account in building a new church. The practice of the clergyman was to preach in Gaelic on one part of the Sunday and in English on the other. Lords Glenlee and Cringletie, without impugning the general doctrine, raised a doubt, at first, whether the fact of two services being provided, at neither of which could it be expected that both the Gaelic and the English population should attend, did not make the case distinguishable from the case of Dissenters. The Lord Justice-Clerk (Boyle) said the question was one of the most important of the kind which could occur,—"Whether in providing additional accommodation we are to look to the language spoken; and because one-half is Gaelic and the other half English, we are only to provide for half the population. This certainly has the merit of novelty. The principle would just lead to this, that if the heritors can shew that part of the population are Catholics or Dissenters, who will not attend, they are to be left out of view. This doctrine was never entertained in regard to difference of religious opinion, and it should not be listened to on account of difference of language."

Lord Pitmilly observed,—"We can have no difficulty that we are not to take into view that the one-half is English and the other half Gaelic any more than if they were Dissenters. We are to hope all will be able to attend. No doubt the objection has the merit of novelty, but that is a demerit in a Court of law; and as there is no authority or dictum to support it we must hold that the church should be built to accommodate two-thirds of the whole examinable population."

The case was allowed to stand over till a subsequent day, when both Lord Glenlee and Lord Cringletie stated that, on consideration, they concurred with the opinions of the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Pitmilly; so that the judgment was unanimous.

Having regard to these undoubted principles of law, I am not able to see grounds for depriving the heritors in the quoad sacra parish of the pertinential right, inherent in their lands, simply because there is a quoad sacra church in which they may obtain seats by paying for them. It is true they and the other heritors did not build the new parish church of Jedburgh, but they gave the former church in excambion for it, which was substantially the same thing. If they have been benefited, to any extent, by the generosity of the noble Marquis, the heritors of the original parish have equally been so. They would be equally liable with these other heritors to rebuild the church if it were burned down to-morrow, and they are equally liable with them to repair it so soon as it requires repair, whether by natural decay, or by dry-rot getting into it, or by a storm destroying the windows, removing the slates in whole or in part, or from any other cause.

On the whole, I am of opinion, 1st, that, taking the case upon the contract of excambion, the one church ought to be held to come in place of the other, and the heritors generally should be held entitled to continue in possession of the one as they were of the other; 2d, that, taking the case in a more general view, the result is to entitle the whole heritors to participate in the division of the area of the church in the same proportion in which their lands are liable for its support.

LORD NEAVES.—This case comes before us in peculiar circumstances as regards the facts, and in a peculiar form as regards the pleadings.

A new parish church for Jedburgh having lately been erected, it became necessary to have a division and allocation of its area. In 1855, now twenty years ago, a considerable portion of the parish was disjoined from the rest, and erected into a parish of Edgerston quoad sacra. In the division and allocation of the proper parish church, now in course of being made, the question has arisen whether the heritors of lands in the quoad sacra parish of Edgerston are to be admitted to, or excluded from, the division. The question having come before the Sheriff, he has decided that the quoad sacra heritors are to be excluded, and against that judgment an appeal has been entered by the excluded heritors. No appearance has been made by the other heritors, or by any one to support the Sheriff's judgment.

In ordinary circumstances this Court might be justified in altering the judgment complained of, in respect it is not supported by an appearance on the part of those in whose favour it was pronounced. But the view has been taken, and in that view I cannot refuse to concur, that this allocation being a matter of public and permanent interest, we ought not to dispose of it merely as a case in absence and causa incognita, but ought to consider it upon the merits, and support the Sheriff's judgment if we think it right. At the same time it cannot be doubted that the non-appearance of those who ought to have been respondents has placed us at considerable disadvantage.

On the merits it must be confessed that the case has been found to be attended with a good deal of difficulty, and suggests ulterior matters that may possibly occur in this or in other cases of the same kind, which require very grave consideration. The difficulties thus suggested are mainly owing to the very defective and unsatisfactory nature of the Act of 7 and 8 Vict., under which mainly the erection of the new quoad sacra parish was carried out.

The basis of that erection necessarily was that the original parish was too large for its due ministerial administration, and that the inhabitants of a specified portion of it should be detached from the old parish and placed under the spiritual and ecclesiastical control and discipline of a new and separate minister and kirk-session. The necessary effect of such a step was to remove a large portion of the existing congregation of the original parish, and to that extent to diminish the parties adhering to it, and not only liberating the new district from attendance on the old parish church but positively excluding them from it, and ordering them to worship and attend ordinances in the new parish church, under the new minister. The logical accompaniment of that change should have been that if not the whole area, yet at least the portion of the area hitherto occupied by those who were now extruded, should be allocated among those who remained, thus making room for the assumed increase of the parishioners, and disposing of the sittings thus left vacant. But from a fear, probably, of going beyond the strict limits of a quoad sacra arrangement, no such measure seems to have been adopted, and I cannot help thinking that if the old parish church had still stood and been available there would have been no warrant or power to alter the existing allocation of the area, and a large portion of it might still have been appropriated to the use and service of absentees. It is a strange anomaly in the case that now, at the distance of twenty years, we are called upon and considered competent to make a new allocation, which was just as necessary and proper at that early period as it is now.

Had the new church of Jedburgh come into existence in the ordinary and usual way, we should have stood face to face with one of the chief difficulties that attend this case. The church would have been built by the heritors, and the double question would have arisen whether the whole heritors were bound to contribute to its erection, and, if the quoad sacra heritors were so bound, whether they could be excluded from the allocation of area in the church which they had thus concurred in erecting. That same question occurs here, not practically but speculatively, as bearing upon the general position of parties, and it is impossible to deny that the mode of its ultimate solution has an important influence on the practical point which now occurs. None of the heritors here have been put to the expense of building the new church, which has been erected and presented to them by the liberality or generosity of the Marquis of Lothian; but even still questions will hereafter arise as to the maintenance of the church, and ultimately even as to its reconstruction if it should be injured or destroyed. I cannot, however, hold the arrangements thus made to amount to an excambion of the old church so as to make the old allocation literally transferable to the new church. Physically it is impossible, and the new church and its area must be divided of new, and I see no specialties in the case that prevent or exempt us from looking upon the present as a new allocation as at the date at which it is now made.

With regard to the question as to the liabilities of parties as to the maintenance of the old church, the Sheriff in his note has very summarily and very easily got over these difficulties. He lays it down as being quite fixed as a general rule that heritors of lands annexed quoad sacra are not liable to uphold the parish church from which they are disjoined. I cannot concur in this positive opinion. The case of Drummond, on which it is rested, does not appear to me to rule a case like the present. The annexation there, which occurred more than a hundred years ago, was not identical with that which was effected here under the modern Act.

This difference is suggested by the very first finding of the Court in the case of Drummond referred to, viz., "that the heritors of the lands annexed quoad sacra are liable in their proportion of upholding the fabric of the kirks to which they are annexed." This being found, it was reasonable, if not inevitable, that the other and correlative finding should be "that they are not liable to contribute for upholding the fabric of the parish kirks from which they are disjoined." No such combination of findings could here be pronounced, and therefore the supposed parallel between the cases is destroyed. It cannot here be found that the annexed heritors are liable proportionably in upholding the quoad sacra church, for no such liability is or could be imposed upon them, it being a statutory condition of the erection of such a quoad sacra parish not only that a church shall be provided at first, but also that "due provision shall be made for the future maintenance of the fabric of the said church;" and this accordingly appears to have been done in the present case, it being expresly set forth that the petitioner, Mr Rutherfurd, "had undertaken and was ready to make provision for the maintenance of the fabric of the said church."

It seems plain in this way that the annexed heritors could not bring themselves literally under the case of Drummond, and could not maintain that they would have a double burden to bear if they were still to maintain the original parish church. There may be other grounds for their claiming exemption from maintaining the old church, but the result of such a claim must be considered as doubtful, and cannot be anticipated as a certainty in the way laid down by the Sheriff.

If the annexed heritors are virtually secured against the expense of maintaining the quoad sacra church—and they seem undoubtedly to be so to some extent—there is not the same equity in their demanding a cessation of their liability for maintaining the old church, and that burden might conceivably be due without injustice and without its entitling them to a share of the old area. The contribution of heritors to maintain a church and a minister in every parish is not a mere counterpart of their sharing the area and having sittings. It is the essential idea of an established church that the land of the country should provide the means of general Christian civilisation. An heritor cannot escape from such liability by being a Dissenter or a Papist or a Jew. We live in a Christian country, where Christianity is to be taught and upheld for the national benefit throughout all parishes, and no parishioner, i.e., heritor, can escape the liability by declining to go to church, or going to another church which he may prefer, either from cheapness or anything else.

Prima facie, all the heritors of a parish are bound to bear this tax just as their teinds are due to the minister. The annexation of lands to another parish, whether new or old, quoad sacra tantum, does not, prima facie, infer a change of liabilities quoad civilia, which money payments undoubtedly are.

Neither can it be said that the denial of seats in the proper parish will extinguish the liability to contribute, more especially when the arrangement stands as it does here—that the annexed heritors have no similar contribution in their own parish. They may have other inconveniencies to balance their general conveniency, but they are not made liable in more than once and single payment of the expense of maintenance.

The point immediately before us is this—A new parish church of Jedburgh has been obtained, and it is necessary to divide and allocate its area. Such a step is inevitable, for it is impossible to transfer the old allocation to the new area, which is not likely to correspond to it either in shape or extent. The conflicting views are these—Shall we divide the area among all the heritors of the original, and still legal, parish, or only among the heritors who are not disjoined? This question drives us to the consideration, what is the practical object of the division? Except for practical uses, the division might stand over indefinitely, and the general right of the heritors in the area remain pro indiviso. But it seems difficult to resist the view that it is for occupation that the division is made—it is with reference to sittings in the church during public worship that the process is to be gone through. Now, on that basis the question comes to be, shall we include in this occupational division—this allocation of sittings —those who cannot, or cannot legally, occupy or sit there, to the exclusion of those who can and ought to be there; for a want of room may thus be the result, the common case of the creation of a new parish being that there is an increase in the population of the whole. The rateable allocation of this area among the whole heritors would virtually ignore or render useless the new erection. It seems difficult to reject the Sheriff's view without holding either that the quoad sacra heritors may hold sittings which those who hold them are excluded from occupying, or that they may turn those sittings to profit by letting them to whom they will. In the one case they would be playing the part of the dog in the manger; in the other they would be making the transfer of their seats a matter of merchandise, for they themselves are under a perpetual ecclesiastical alibi, being bound to be at their assigned post elsewhere on all days of public worship. The result may be that while the heritors as a body may still be trustees of the whole church for behoof of those whom it may concern, and may thus be bound to maintain it, they yet may be barred and precluded from nullifying the erection quoad sacra by encroaching on the too limited space which the original church possessed, and which would be as much crowded as before if no vacuum was to be left for the expansion of the remaining congregation.

On the whole, while feeling the difficulties and anomalies of the case, I cannot bring myself, in the circumstances, to alter the Sheriff's interlocutor, though not concurring in all or the most important of his grounds of judgment, and not wishing to prejudge any question not immediately before us.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—The newly-erected parish disjoined from Jedburgh, and now called Edgerston, affords an accommodation which the law holds to be the legal and appropriate accommodation for the inhabitants of the new district forming that new parish. I quite agree with your Lordship in the chair that the law, without compelling attendance, assumes the attendance of all within the district at that new church. The parishioners are provided with accommodation, and are legally held to be there accommodated. But the heritors in the parish of Edgerston had undoubtedly certain rights of property within the old abbey, and may now have certain rights within the parish church of Jedburgh. I think the right of each heritor is divisible on principle into two parts. So far as his personal right to attend in his place in that old church goes it is a right of property for his own benefit. In so far as his right is for the benefit of tenants, cottars, and dependants, it is a territorial right of the nature of a trust for them; and I adopt what I think your Lordship in the chair has most clearly explained,—the distinction between the two. We have no question here raised about personal or family sittings. I wish at present to give no opinion about that. A claim for family sittings may be much stronger than any claim now made; but the claim now made is for territorial sittings, and I think that while the right of the heritor is a civil right, the right of the beneficiaries for whom he holds in trust the territorial right is a right inter sacra. It has been decided that the proclamation of banns of marriage is inter sacra, and that being decided, effect was given to the principle in the case of Hutton v. Harper. But, if the proclamation of banns be inter sacra, is the proclamation of the gospel not inter sacra? Is the hearing of the gospel not inter sacra? Is the worship of the church not inter sacra? To use the words given in the old Act, is the having recourse to it "for word and sacraments" not inter sacra? I think it is, in every one of these respects, and therefore I view the decision in the case of Hutton v. Harper as having great weight on the question now before us. I think that, whatever may be the claim—on which I do not at present venture to adjudicate—of the heritor to a right to a personal sitting, or to a family sitting, in the new church at Jedburgh, which has now been erected by arrangement, through the generosity of Lord Lothian,—whatever may be the extent of the heritor's right to family sittings there, I do not think he has a right there, as a civil right, to secure accommodation under the territorial trust for the benefit of those who dwell in the quoad sacra parish of Edgerston. These parties themselves are not so restricted as to be compelled to attend, but they are regarded in law as attending appropriately and legally that church at Edgerston, and I think they attend it in the exercise of a right which is in them inter sacra. Upon that view I think the Sheriff has rightly decided. I think his judgment is a very complete and clear judgment, though I do not agree with all the terms and expressions of opinion, some of which are not quite applicable to this case; and, on the whole matter, I think we should adhere to the judgment of the Sheriff, very much—indeed, almost entirely—on the views so well explained by your Lordship in the chair.

Lord Ormidale.—In this novel case, as it appears to me to be, the question for the decision of the Court is, whether the appellants, whose lands are situated within the recently erected quoad sacra parish of Edgerston, are entitled to have allotted to them a portion of the area or sitting accommodation in the new church of the parish of Jedburgh commensurate with their lands.

It does not appear to me that this question can be affected by the circumstance that the new church of Jedburgh has been built in consequence of, and in accordance with, the transaction referred to in the record of the nature of an excambion between the Marquis of Lothian and the other heritors of the parish. The proceedings now in question, which have been taken for a division of the area or sittings of the church, do not depend on any such specialty. The petition is presented to the Sheriff by, and in name of, the Marquis of Lothian "as the principal heritor of the parish of Jedburgh," and of William Millar, solicitor, Jedburgh, as "clerk of the heritors of said parish for and as representing said parish." And after setting out that a new church had been completed and handed over to and received by the heritors, and is now the church of the parish of Jedburgh, and that it was ready for occupation, but that it was necessary before occupying it that it should be "divided amongst those having right thereto in terms of law," the petition prays the Sheriff to proceed with the division accordingly.

There being, therefore, nothing special in the case arising out of the transaction between the Marquis of Lothian and the other heritors of the parish, I proceed to consider the question as if it had related to a new parish church, built in consequence of the decay or insufficiency of one which had previously existed. And in so dealing with the question I am disposed to think that it must be answered adversely to the appellants, and in conformity with the Sheriff's judgment.

No. 121.
Duke of Roxburghe, &c.

The lands belonging to the appellants, and the parishioners residing on these lands, are within the newly erected quoad sacra parish of Edgerston. The district, or the greater part of it, comprehended by this newly erected parish, was disjoined from the parish of Jedburgh, and erected into a new one in virtue of the Act 7 and 8 Vict. c. 44, entituled "An Act to facilitate the disjoining or dividing of extensive or populous parishes in that part of the kingdom called Scotland." It is true that the disjunction and erection was only quoad sacra; but it cannot be doubted, I think, that the right to the occupancy of a church for the purposes of divine worship and the dispensation of religious ordinances is of the nature of res sacræ, and if so, it necessarily follows that the connection of the parishioners, including the appellants, resident within the new quoad sacra parish, is now, in regard to church accommodation, with the new quoad sacra church, and that their previously existing connection for that purpose with the parish church of Jedburgh has been severed. It would be very anomalous, and I think most unreasonable, and contrary alike to the terms and objects of the statute, to hold that the appellants, in respect of their lands which are within the newly erected parish, the church of which has been substituted by the statute as their proper place of worship instead of the church of Jedburgh, should nevertheless be entitled to accommodation in the latter as well as in the former. Supposing they were held to be so entitled, they and their lands could not be said to be disjoined from the old and annexed to the new church and parish even quoad sacra; and in this way the statutory disjunction and erection of the quoad sacra parish of Edgerston might be in a great measure, if not entirely, rendered nugatory and unmeaning,—a result all the more startling when it is kept in view that it would be brought about by the very individuals who took a leading part in getting the new quoad sacra parish of Edgerston disjoined and erected.

Nor am I able to understand for what legitimate object the appellants can desire to have a portion of the area of the parish church of Jedburgh allotted to them, and the parishioners resident on their estates, seeing that they have such accommodation more conveniently in the church of Edgerston. They cannot use at the same time sittings in both churches. And they are not entitled to dispose of to others, as if they belonged to them in property, the seats in either church, or to insist that they should remain unoccupied. The area or sitting accommodation in a parish church does not belong to the heritors, and cannot be disposed of by them like the rest of their property. It pertains to them merely, and at most, in trust for the parishioners residing on their estates, who, again, have no right to it except for religious purposes. But as for all such purposes the appellants' estates have been disjoined from the parish of Jedburgh, and annexed to the newly erected parish of Edgerston, there are in truth and reality no parishioners for whom the appellants can claim sitting accommodation in the church of Jedburgh, and consequently the appellants' right and interest to maintain the present controversy entirely fail.

These are the grounds upon which my opinion has been formed that the Sheriff's judgment appealed against is right, and ought to be affirmed. And in coming to this conclusion it does not appear to me to be necessary to determine whether the appellants, if they are to have no accommodation in the church of Jedburgh, are bound to contribute towards the expense of maintaining the fabric of that church. There are, indeed, no termini habiles for determining that question in the present case; and for myself I desire to reserve my opinion in regard to it. I may remark, however, that the case of Drummond v. The Heritors of Monzie (1773, M. 7920) seems to have been different in some important particulars from the present. There no new parish, even quoad sacra, was erected, as here, the portion disjoined from an existing parish having been annexed to another already existing parish. There, also, different from the present case, the heritors of the disjoined lands, while they were on the one hand held "not liable to contribute for upholding the fabric of the parish kirk from which they are disjoined," were, on the other hand, held liable "in their proportion for upholding the fabric of the kirk to which they were annexed." But here, as in every case of the erection of a quoad sacra parish in terms of the statute, provision is made for keeping up the fabric of the church. Neither can I very well see how the observations of the Judges in the case of Drummond, which was raised and decided under essentially different circumstances from the present, and of course long before the passing of the Act under which the disjunction and erection now in question took place, can have much, if any, application at all to the present case. A similar remark may be made in regard to the dicta, some of which have been referred to, of the text writers and other authorities, who did not and could not deal with such a question as that we have been here called upon to dispose of.

For the reasons I have now stated I am of opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff ought to be adhered to, and the appeal dismissed.

LORD MURE.—There are two separate and distinct questions here raised for decision in the view I take of this case: 1st, Whether the appellants, the heritors in the portion of the parish of Jedburgh which has been disjoined from that parish and erected into the new parish of Edgerston quoad sacra, are entitled to an allotment of sittings in the new church in the parish from which they have been disjoined; and 2d, If they would not be so entitled in the ordinary case, whether there are any specialties connected with, or arising out of, the excambion of the old for the new parish church of Jedburgh, which can give them that right. Neither question is raised in a satisfactory shape, for the proceedings are here entirely ex parte; and, in the absence of a full argument, I have felt great difficulty in forming an opinion upon them.

(1) The solution of the first of them appears to me to depend mainly upon whether the appellants would still be liable in a share of the expense of repairing or rebuilding the church of the parish from which they have been disjoined. To this extent I concur in the opinion of Lord Deas. Because it is, as I apprehend, the fact of a party being required to contribute towards the expense of erecting a parish church in respect of his having property in the parish in which the church is, which gives him a claim to a share in the allocation of seats. Now, the Sheriff has here held that the appellants, because their lands have been disjoined from the parish of Jedburgh, and added quoad sacra to the newly erected parish of Edgerston, have been freed from all obligation relative to the repairing or rebuilding of the church at Jedburgh, and are, on that ground, not entitled to any share of the sittings in the new church. And if that be so—if these heritors are in law now freed from the burden of assessment for church building purposes in connection with the parish of Jedburgh—I should be disposed to concur in the interlocutor appealed from. This is, however, in my opinion, by no means a clear proposition, although there is a great deal to be said in favour of it,—having regard to the rules on which the Court appear to have proceeded in deciding the case of Drummond, referred to in the Sheriff's note. But if these heritors, on the other hand, still remain subject to the burden of maintaining the old church, on the grounds so clearly explained by Lord Deas, it is very difficult to say that they are not entitled to the correlative right of a share in the area of the church of their original parish, although they may, by force of the new erection, be declared to be heritors in the new parish, and in that view have now no property in the parish for which the new church is required.

The effect of the Act of 1844 in this respect is remarkable. For it not only provides for disjoining the lands from the old parish, but it makes express provision for the erection and repair of the church in the new parish irrespective of any assessment upon the owners of the disjoined lands, and thereby tends to shew that the intention of the Legislature may have been to leave the burden, relative to the maintenance of the church, in the original parish, where it was before. At the same time the lands have, by force of the statute, been expressly taken out of the parish of Jedburgh as regards ecclesiastical arrangements, so that the appellants are no longer heritors, in an ecclesiastical sense, in the parish from which they have been disjoined. And when, in these circumstances, there is no express provision made in the Act of 1844 relative to the rebuilding of churches in new parishes quoad sacra, in the event of that becoming necessary, although provision is made for their repair, I am not prepared to say that, should a question be raised in such a newly erected parish relative to the liability of the heritors for the building of a new church, the Court, having regard to the rules laid down in the case of Drummond, might not hold the proprietors of the lands annexed quoad sacra, liable in the expense of erecting a new church, and so free from all obligation to bear the same burden in the parish from which they had been disjoined. But these are questions which cannot be satisfactorily disposed of in this case. They have not been regularly argued—although they may have been put hypothetically, sometimes the one way and sometimes the other, in the course of the discussion—and cannot therefore be now authoritatively settled; and I am free to admit that I have not formed any decided opinion one way or other upon this matter. The result, therefore, of my consideration of this part of the case is that I am not, as at present advised, prepared to say that I think the Sheriff was wrong in holding the principles of the case of Drummond to apply, or to differ from the conclusion which I understand the majority of your Lordships have come to.

(2) But on the other question, viz., the effect of the excambion, I am of opinion that the argument of the appellants is well founded. For although there does not seem to have been any express stipulation, in the proceedings relative to the excambion, to the effect that the appellants were to have right to seats in the new church, I think that this may be held to be implied in the transaction. Because the nature of that transaction, as disclosed in the deed of excambion, appears to me to be that, when the old church was exchanged for the new, the latter was to be conveyed to the whole heritors of Jedburgh, including the appellants, as a surrogatum for their right to the old church, which was conveyed by them to Lord Lothian; and that they were thus to acquire in the new church rights equivalent to those which they had in the old. There is nothing in the proceedings to shew that these appellants abandoned, or ever intended to abandon, their right to sittings in the new church, corresponding to those which they held in the old one. And the circumstance that they may be, in one view, no longer heritors in the parish of Jedburgh, is not, I conceive, of itself conclusive against their right to claim sittings in the new church. Various decisions are noted by Mr Dunlop in his work on Parochial Law (p. 37, sec. 65), and among them the cases of St Andrews and North Leith, in which parties, who were not heritors in the parish, were held entitled to retain seats in the division of a parish church; and I can see no reason in principle why a similar rule ought not to be acted on here. I shall not, however, detain your Lordships by enlarging on the grounds on which I think that this should be done. On this point I concur in the opinion of Lord Deas; and the circumstance that none of the other heritors have appeared here to oppose the claim of the appellants goes far, in my opinion, to shew that such was their understanding of the arrangement.

No. 121. June 1, 1876. Duke of Roxburghe, &c.

LORD GIFFORD.—I concur in the opinion expressed by your Lordship in the chair, and in the result arrived at by the majority of your Lordships. I am of opinion that the heritors of lands in the disjoined quoad sacra parish of Edgerston are not entitled as such to any share or allocation of the area of the newly built parish church of Jedburgh, but that the area of that new church, after setting apart one-third thereof for the community of the burgh of Jedburgh, must be allocated and divided among the heritors of the existing landward parish of Jedburgh, excluding the district forming the quoad sacra parish of Edgerston.

The disjunction and erection of the quoad sacra church and parish of Edgerston was effected on 21st February 1855, by a decree of the Commissioners of Teinds, pronounced in terms of the statute 7 and 8 Vict., cap. 44. The decree bears that the church of Edgerston is erected into a parish church, and that the district therein specified is erected "into a parish quoad sacra in connection with the Church of Scotland, to be called now, and in all time coming, the church and parish of Edgerston." The minister and elders of Edgerston church are declared to have and enjoy the status, the powers, rights, and privileges of a parish minister and elders of the Church of Scotland, and provisions are made for the patronage of the church and parish of Edgerston, and for various other incidents attending the erection of a quoad sacra parish. It is clear, therefore, that the new district marked out as Edgerston parish is no longer quoad sacra a part of the original parish of Jedburgh, although it is still a part of the original parish quoad civilia.

The question which arises is—What rights, duties, and privileges are included under the expression quoad sacra in the sense of the statute 7 and 8 Vict., cap. 44,—what parochial or ecclesiastic rights, duties, or burdens are transferred from certain parts of the old parish of Jedburgh to the new parish of Edgerston, and what rights and duties are to remain as before?

Now, it may be, and I think it is, extremely difficult accurately and precisely to define abstractly what are inter sacra and what are inter civilia, but into that wide and intricate region I do not need to enter, for the question is limited to the special meaning and intention of this particular statute. What are inter sacra in the sense of this Act? Keeping in view the purpose for which the quoad sacra church and parish have been erected, I cannot doubt that it was intended that the inhabitants of the newly erected district should resort for worship and for the ordinances of religion to the newly erected quoad sacra church —indeed, under the old practice in disjunctions, there used to be a decerniture to that effect—and if so, then they are no longer expected to worship in the church of the original parish, and no seats will require to be provided for them in any new parish church erected for the original parish. Indeed, the very purpose of providing a quoad sacra church is that by reason of the increase of population in, or the local situation of, the disjoined district, or for some similar reasons, it is judged expedient that the population of a particular district shall no longer be under the ecclesiastical superintendence of the minister of the original parish, nor have accommodation provided for them in the original parish church; but in things ecclesiastical—for this, I think, is the true meaning of the word sacra—they shall be held to be parishioners of the newly erected district. The right of sitting in a church to hear preaching, or to join in worship, or to partake of ordinances, is clearly an ecclesiastical privilege or duty, and not in the sense of this statute inter civilia. The property of the seat itself—that is, either the ground it occupies or the materials of which it is constructed—may be the subject of a civil suit or of civil question, but the use and enjoyment of the seat is an ecclesiastical privilege—that is, in the sense of this Act, is inter sacra. In this view it is quite as much inter sacra to hear preaching or to receive sacraments as to preach or to administer sacraments. In the provision of this statute surely preaching and prayer are inter sacra, and hearers and worshippers, as much as those who conduct the service, are engaged in a sacred duty. It seems to follow that whenever a new allocation of the area of the original parish church becomes necessary it shall be confined to the parishioners residing within the limited district, and shall not include those within the newly erected territory.

It is true that although the area of the church is intended for parishioners, it is in point of form allocated to heritors, but this seems to be a mere mode of arranging the use of the area, the heritors being trustees for the parishioners, who are often a more fluctuating and changing body.

It is also true that the expense of providing a new church is laid upon the heritors; but this has been introduced by custom, for originally the burden both of providing and of maintaining the fabric of the church was laid upon the parishioners of the parish.

The question of the expense of the new church does not arise in the present case, for the new church has been provided under a contract of excambion, instead of the old one; but I am not prepared to say that it follows from the decision now to be given that the heritors of the disjoined or quoad sacra district would not be liable to be assessed for the expense of the original parish church. It might very well be that the use of the area of the fabric might be held inter sacra, at least so far as religious ordinances are concerned, and yet the expense of providing the fabric might be held a civil burden, which is not removed by a mere quoad sacra disjunction. The simple payment of money, or the simple obligation to pay money, is always a civil matter. But this question does not arise in the present case.

If it were to be held that notwithstanding the disjunction the heritors of the disjoined district were still entitled as such to a share of the sittings in the original church, it could only be for the purpose of occupying them by themselves and by the residents upon the lands; but this would be to defeat the very purpose for which the quoad sacra church and parish were erected. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff should be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed.

Burgh—Sheriff—Act 20 and 21 Vict. c. 70, sec. 1—Competency of Appeal.—Held that a deliverance of a Sheriff upon a petition for the extension of the boundaries of a burgh under the statute 20 and 21 Vict. c. 70, finding that neither the boundaries described in the petition nor any others which might be within its scope satisfied the requirements of the statute, and therefore refusing the petition, was not subject to review.

2D DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire. I.

IN January 1876 a petition under the Act 20 and 21 Vict. c. 70,* was presented to the Sheriff of Lanarkshire for the extension of the boundaries

* Sec. 1.—"Any ratepayers, to the number of twelve or more, in respect of lands and heritages situated beyond the existing boundaries of any royal or parliamentary burgh in Scotland, may present a petition to the Sheriff of the county in which such burgh or part of a burgh is situated, praying him to take the steps provided by this Act for extending the boundaries of the burgh to the extent to be specified in such petition; and the Sheriff shall, within three weeks from the date of the presentation thereof, define and specify in a written deliverance on the petition such boundaries, which shall include an area two-thirds of which is wholly or partially built on or laid out for building, as in his opinion would be suitable for the extended boundaries of the burgh, and the same shall be thereafter published by advertisement in such manner as the Sheriff shall direct; and it shall be lawful for the proprietor of any unbuilt on land within the proposed extended boundaries, or to the police committee of the county to be appointed in terms of any Act passed during the present session of Parliament, within one month after the last advertisement so appointed, to appeal by note of appeal to any one of the Lords Ordinary of the Court of Session, who shall have power, in a summary way, to dispose of such appeal after such inquiry as to him shall seem fit; and the judgment of such Lord Ordinary dismissing such appeal, or sustaining the same in whole or in part, shall be final and conclusive."

Sec. 2.—"On the lapse of one month from the last advertisement, as aforesaid, without any appeal having been taken, or, in the event of an appeal having been taken, so soon as the same shall have been disposed of, the Sheriff shall, except where the Lord Ordinary shall on such appeal have found that no part of the lands and heritages proposed to be included within the boundaries of the burgh should be included therein, by such advertisement as he shall direct, call a public meeting, at such time and place as he shall appoint, of the ratepayers in respect of lands and heritages situated beyond the existing boundaries of the burgh, and within the extended boundaries thereof, as defined by the Sheriff, or by the Lord Ordinary on appeal, to consider the proposal to extend the said boundaries." . . . The Act then provides further procedure to be taken by the town-council of the burgh to which the district is proposed to be annexed, and by the ratepayers of the district.

of the burgh of Glasgow, so as to include a certain district, in which the petitioners, thirteen in number, resided and paid rates.

The Sheriff ordered certain intimations and advertisements, and appointed the agent for the petitioners and all parties interested to be heard on a specified day.

Various parties having compeared and stated objections orally, the Sheriff pronounced a deliverance in which he "allows the petitioners a proof of their averment that the district described in the petition is built or laid out for building, to the extent of at least two-thirds; and also, that the boundaries described in the petition, or any others that may be suggested to the Sheriff, and that may be within the prayer of the petition, are suitable for the extended boundaries of the burgh of Glasgow: Allows to the compearers above mentioned a conjunct proof thereupon."

After a proof the Sheriff pronounced this deliverance:—"Glasgow, 7th February 1876.—The Sheriff having visited the area in question, in presence of the agents for the petitioners, and for the several parties compearing, having heard them fully, and made avizandum—Finds (1) that the boundaries described in the petition, or any others which might be within its scope, do not contain an area two-thirds of which is wholly or partially built on, or laid out for building; (2) that they are not such as, in the opinion of the Sheriff, would be suitable for the extended boundaries of the burgh of Glasgow: Finds, accordingly, that the Sheriff is unable to define and specify any boundaries within the scope of the petition which would be in accordance with the provisions of the Act 20 and 21 Vict. cap. 70: Therefore refuses the prayer of the petition, and decerns." *

Against this deliverance appeals were presented to the Court of Session by the petitioners, and by the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council of Glasgow.

The respondents objected to the competency of the appeal, on the ground that the Sheriff's deliverance was not subject to review, his functions under the statute being administrative rather than judicial.

Argued for the appellants;—Appeal to the Court of Session as the supreme Court was always competent unless expressly excluded. The Sheriff had treated the matter as a judicial process. He had allowed a proof, and his interlocutor contained a decerniture, all in ordinary form. Moreover the words of the statute were imperative—"The Sheriff shall . . . define and specify in a written deliverance on the petition such boundaries . . as in his opinion would be suitable for the extended boundaries of the burgh." He could not refuse to define any extended boundaries. There were many cases in the books in which the Court had interfered, even where review was expressly excluded, where an inferior magistrate had exceeded his jurisdiction, or refused to exercise that jurisdiction. An appeal to the Lord Ordinary was given against the Sheriff's decision if he granted the prayer of the petition, and defined boundaries. It would be anomalous to hold that if the Sheriff refused to define boundaries his decision was subject to no review. The result would be practically to give him an absolute veto upon the extension of the boundaries of any burgh within his county.

* "NOTE.—. . . For the reasons thus fully explained, the Sheriff is of opinion that two-thirds of the area described in the petition are not of the statutory character, and that its boundaries are not suitable. The petitioners have not suggested, and the Sheriff cannot find, any other area or boundaries within the scope of the petition which would be in accordance with the statute. He has, therefore, no alternative but to refuse the prayer of the petition. The statute does not enable him to pronounce as to the expenses."

No. 122.

June 1, 1876. Dubs, &c. v. Police Commissioners of Crosshill.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—My impression is that this is a matter with which the Court has no concern, that it was not intended that we should have any jurisdiction, and that we have no means of explicating our jurisdiction. Previous to the passing of the statute in question there existed no power whatever for the extension of the boundaries of a burgh, except by special Act of Parliament. It is manifestly a proceeding in which great interests are involved, and the statute provides that unless there is a large preponderance of concurrence of those affected, and unless the Sheriff is satisfied that the thing is right, it shall not be carried into effect. An appeal of a special kind is given to certain parties, viz., persons who are truly owners of agricultural lands and not proprietors of houses, and who therefore are likely to have a special interest in not being put under the regulation of the neighbouring burgh. With that exception, there is no allusion to a right of appeal. The procedure is left with the Sheriff, the town-council, and the ratepayers. Each have their own functions, and I think that in the exercise of them, where there is no provision in the statute to the contrary, they must necessarily be final; at all events no power is conferred upon this Court of reviewing their determination.

No doubt there is a certain awkwardness in the way in which the 1st section of the statute commences. It directs the Sheriff to begin the proceedings on a certain assumption, which in this case has been found not to be true. It provides that upon the application of twelve or more ratepayers the Sheriff shall define such boundaries, "which shall include an area two-thirds of which is wholly or partially built on or laid out for building, as in his opinion would be suitable for the extended boundaries of the burgh." Now, in this case the Sheriff says virtually,—"I cannot say that in my opinion there are any boundaries suited for extended boundaries, for this reason, that I do not find any lands corresponding with the description in the statute, and before I point out an area which is suitable I must find that there is an area of that description, and I find there is none." The effect therefore of the Sheriff's deliverance is that there are no boundaries which he is entitled to include. That is a matter in which he is sole judge. The whole is rather a political than a judicial proceeding, in which certain powers are given to persons who are Judges, and certain powers to others who are not Judges. The effect is that the Sheriff has a veto on the extension of a burgh if he thinks that there are no suitable boundaries for extended boundaries; but that, I think, is what was intended. I am for dismissing the appeal as incompetent.

LORD NEAVES concurred.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I am of the same opinion. Looking at the terms of the statute, I cannot think that it was contemplated by the Legislature that a proceeding of this kind should be litigated as an ordinary judicial process. The whole matter is local, and the duty which the local Judge had to perform was more of an administrative than a judicial character. I do not think that it was incumbent on the Sheriff to allow a proof, although he may, in the exercise of his discretion, have quite properly taken that course to inform his own mind. But he was not bound to do so, as he might, if he had pleased, have ascertained the necessary facts in some other way,—for example, by visiting the ground himself, and employing another or others to make the requisite measurements.

Another consideration goes far to satisfy me that this cannot be treated as an ordinary judicial process. There is no minute of defence, and no record made up and closed in any form whatever. In short, the case, as it has been presented to the Court, has none of the characteristics of an ordinary judicial process. Again, if we were to deal with such a case as a judicial process, it would follow that the litigation could be carried not only from the Sheriff Court to this Court but also to the House of Lords. If the appellant could competently come here he might, if dissatisfied with the result here, appeal to the Court of last resort. I cannot think that such a course was contemplated or intended by the Legislature, or is competent under the statute; and the whole matter is statutory.

It was argued that, in many cases, the Court has entertained an appeal from the determination of local magistrates, even where appeal was excluded, where the local magistrates had committed an excess of power. That may be so. There is always a remedy, in some form or other, against an excess or abuse of power. But I know of no case of an appeal, where, as here, the local magistrate has acted within his powers, in a matter committed by statute to him alone, in which this Court has reviewed his determination on its merits. But if we were to entertain the present appeal, it was conceded for the appellants that we must review the Sheriff's decision on its merits, for there is no complaint that the Sheriff exceeded his powers, or went beyond his jurisdiction. It was merely said that he had gone wrong in the view he took of the merits. But we cannot, where the Sheriff has not abused or exceeded his powers, review the determination he has come to; and if authority were necessary on this point it would be sufficient to refer to the case of Mackintosh v. M'Pherson, Dec. 15, 1834, 13 S. 124, in which this Court refused a bill of advocation against a decision of a Sheriff under a Public-House or Licencing Act, which conferred upon him exclusively the power of disposing of the disputed matter. For the same reason, and on the same principle on which the Court proceeded in that case, I would decide the present.

If there had been a clear excess of power on the part of the Sheriff, or if he had gone out of his jurisdiction, we might perhaps have recalled his judgment, and remitted to him to proceed in terms of the statute. But that is not the nature of the present appeal. We are asked to review the decision of the Sheriff upon its merits, which, it is conceded, were properly before him, and this, I think, it is incompetent for us to do, having regard to the nature of the subject of inquiry, and the statutory provisions under and in terms of which it could alone be gone into.

I therefore, on the grounds I have stated, concur with your Lordships that we should dismiss the present appeal as incompetent.

LORD GIFFORD.—I have come to the same result. I was at first somewhat moved by the argument for the appellants, that to exclude review in this Court, where the Sheriff has refused to design any district whatever, is practically to give the Sheriff an absolute veto on the extension of the boundaries of a burgh. It is said that if the Sheriff designs a district either too large or too small he can be corrected by the Lord Ordinary; and it is urged that if he refuses to designate any district at all his refusal should be subject to some review, and he should not be entitled at his own sole discretion to refuse to set the machinery of the Act in operation at all. There is great force in this; but, on consideration, I am satisfied that the effect of the statute is to give the Sheriff this practical veto on the extension of the burgh, that if in his opinion no part of the proposed district should be added to the burgh, then the proceedings can go no farther. Indeed, I think that this was the intention of the statute.

June 1, 1876.
Dubs, &c. v. Police Commissioners of Crosshill.

The statute appears to assume that in an application like the present, the Sheriff will be able to say that at least part of the proposed district, "two-thirds of which is wholly or partially built on or laid out for building," may suitably be added to the municipality; for the statute does not go on to direct the Sheriff to refuse the application, if he shall be of opinion that no part of the proposed district should be added to the town. But I think that such a direction must be implied from what follows. For where the Sheriff does define a district which he is of opinion may properly constitute the extended boundaries, an appeal is given to the proprietors of unbuilt on ground within the boundaries to the Lord Ordinary, and if the Lord Ordinary finds that "no part of the lands and heritages proposed to be included within the boundaries of the burgh should be included therein," then no further proceedings can be taken.

It is a strong thing, no doubt, that the Sheriff, to whom no form of procedure is prescribed, and who may go upon his own knowledge, should be able to checkmate the whole proceedings in initio, and, by refusing to design any extended boundaries at all, to prevent any statutory advertisement, and to decline to enter upon any farther inquiry. But, then, I think the statute virtually has made it a condition precedent that the Sheriff shall say that in his opinion certain boundaries are suitable. And this is not an unreasonable view. It will operate as a check on continual agitation for the extension of burgh boundaries, and it is quite equitable that twelve ratepayers shall not be able to set all the machinery of the statute in motion, unless, first of all, they shall satisfy the Sheriff that at least part of the district which they propose to annex is suitable and proper to be annexed to the burgh. And, then, how can we review the Sheriff's judgment? We might, no doubt, say, after inquiry, that in our opinion such and such a suitable district exists; but it is not our opinion which the statute requires, but that of the Sheriff himself, and we cannot remit to the Sheriff to say that in his opinion such a district exists. We might reverse the Sheriff's judgment, but we cannot reverse or alter his opinion; and if his opinion to a particular effect is a pre-requisite to the statutory extension, the want of it is fatal to the application.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that the appeals are incompetent, and therefore dismiss the same: Find the respondents entitled to expenses, but limit the same to those of one party, including allowance for appearance by two counsel," &c.

street themselves, and raised an action in the Sheriff Court against the proprietor under the same section for recovery of the expense. The defender averred that the street was not of the description which under the statute he was bound to pave. The commissioners maintained that the defender not having appealed against the notice to the Sheriff under the 286th section of the Police and Improvement Act, 1850, he had acquiesced, and the matter was concluded. Held that the 286th section related solely to matters "the cost attending which was directed to be provided for by way of private or district assessment," and had no application to proceedings under the 64th section of the Nuisances Removal Act, and the relative 310th section of the Police and Improvement Act, directing expenses to be recovered as a debt, and therefore that the defender was not precluded from defending the action on the merits.

Opinion (per Lord Mure) that in any view the finality provisions of the 286th section could not prevent a defender from maintaining that the proceedings of the commissioners were not authorised by the statutes.

THIS was an action in the Sheriff Court of Forfarshire by the Commissioners of Police for Dundee, under the Acts 13 and 14 Vict. c. 33 (Police and Improvement Act, 1850), 19 and 20 Vict. c. 103 (Nuisances Removal Act, 1856), and two local Police and Road Acts, against Robert H. Mitchell, house proprietor, concluding that "in respect of the provisions of the said Acts, and specially of section 64th* of the Act second above-mentioned, and in respect the street within the burgh of Dundee, commonly called Ann Street, was not well and sufficiently paved and flagged, or otherwise made good, previous to the adoption of the first-mentioned Act, and in respect the defender's lands abut on the said street, and adjoin to and front the same, and in respect the said commissioners duly required the defender to cause the said street to be paved in terms of the statutes, and in respect the defender failed or neglected, or refused, or delayed to execute, in terms of said requisition, the work aftermentioned, and yet did not appeal against the said requisition, which accordingly became final, whereupon the said commissioners duly and regularly, and in terms of the statutes, did, or caused to be done, the said work, and incurred expenses in the doing thereof, the defender ought to be decerned to pay to the pursuer the sum of £30, 5s. 2d. sterling, being the expenses incurred and laid out by the said commissioners in paving the said street abutting on and bounding the defender's said lands."

The defence was that Ann Street had been formed and made good before the Police and Improvement Act was adopted, and therefore that no action lay at the instance of the commissioners.

It appeared from the record and productions that the case arose in these circumstances: In 1871 Mr Mitchell, with eighty other proprietors and householders in Ann Street and the neighbourhood, presented a petition to the commissioners setting forth that Ann Street was unpaved, and in bad order, and praying them to cause the carriage-way to be paved. The commissioners resolved to call upon the owners to pave the street, and, accordingly, served notice upon Mr Mitchell, under section 64 of the Nuisances Removal Act above quoted, requiring him to pave the carriage way of the street on which his lands abutted. To this notice Mr Mitchell paid no attention, and the commissioners executed the work themselves, and then raised this action.

The Sheriff-substitute (Cheyne), after a proof before answer, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds in point of fact that in 1871 the Police Commissioners for the burgh of Dundee served notices under section 64 of the Nuisances Removal, &c. (Scotland) Act, 1856, upon the owners of property abutting upon the eastern portion of Ann Street, Dundee, including the defender, requiring them to pave the carriage-way of said street opposite their respective properties in manner therein specified, and, on the owners failing to comply with the said requisition, had the work executed under a contract: Finds, however, also in point of fact, that the carriage-way of said street was made good prior to the adoption in the burgh of Dundee, of the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1850: Finds in point of law that the owners of property abutting on said street are not liable for the expense of the foresaid works, but that the same must be defrayed out of the general police rates: Therefore assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the action: Finds him entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "NOTE.—After full consideration, I am satisfied that the defender is not precluded by his non-appeal against the commissioners' order from objecting in this process to the power of the commissioners to issue that order. In all that regards the execution of works, the necessity of them, their style, &c., in other words, all matters of detail involving the exercise of discretion, I fully concede that, subject only to a summary appeal to the Sheriff, the commissioners are final, but, in my humble opinion, the finality clause is no answer when it is offered to be proved, either that the works are not authorised by the statute, or, which is the case here, that the party upon whom it is sought to lay the expense of them is not legally liable—(See Lord Advocate v. Perth Police Commissioners, 7th December 1869, 8 M. 244, and Miller's Trustees v. Leith Police Commissioners, 19th July 1873, 11 M. 932). It is said, however, that, esto these allegations would form a relevant subject of inquiry in a suspension (which would necessarily be in the supreme Court) of a charge for payment, they cannot relevantly be inquired into in an action like the present, in which it is argued the Sheriff's duties are merely ministerial. In the absence of any decision of the Court of Session to that effect I must refuse to give any assent to such a proposition, or to take such a limited view of my functions. The action is in form an action for debt, and I can find nothing in the statutes which precludes me from considering any objections to the claim which the Court of Session could consider in a suspension. I am not asked to undo anything that the commissioners have done, or to find that the work was unlawful. All that I am called upon to determine is on whom the expense is to fall, or rather,

On appeal the Sheriff (Heriot) recalled this interlocutor, and pronounced these findings:—"Finds in fact—(1) That the Police Act 13 and 14 Vict., c. 33, was, except the clause as to the supply of water, adopted in the burgh of Dundee in the year 1851, and is in force within the said burgh; (2) that in the year 1871 the Police Commissioners for the said burgh served statutory notices under the 64th section of the 'Nuisance Removal, &c. statutory notice, which had not been made the subject of appeal to the Sheriff, and as authorised by the 286th section of said Police Act, to have the work executed under contract, and they have had the same completed at an expense of £469, 8s. 4d.; (7) that the share of the said expense incurred by the said Police Commissioners in paving the portion of the carriage-way of the said street on which the defender's property abuts, amounts to the sum of £30, 5s. 2d.: Finds in law that the defender cannot now object in this Court to repay to the said Police Commissioners the said sum expended by them in paving the portion of the carriage-way of said street on which his property abuts, paved in terms of said notice and intimation: Therefore decerns against the defender for the said sum of £30, 5s. 2d., with interest on the same at five per cent from citation till payment," &c.*

* "NOTE.—The defender objects to reimburse the Police Commissioners in the sum expended by them in paving the carriage-way of Ann Street opposite his property. The ground of his objections is that the said street had before the adoption of the Police Act been 'made good,' as expressed by section 64 of the Nuisances Removal, &c. (Scotland) Act, 1856. Now, this may be a very good objection, if brought forward in proper time, but the Sheriff considers that he is now too late in bringing it forward.

"The defender, along with others, got a statutory notice on 16th June 1871, requiring him to do a certain work, and intimating that if he did not do so within a month the commissioners would have it done at his expense. On getting this notice (and he admittedly got it) it seems to the Sheriff that, if the defender had any objection thereto, or to the execution at his expense of the work contemplated, he had two courses open to him, he might either have availed himself of the statutory machinery provided by the Act, and made the notice the subject of appeal to the Sheriff, or he might have taken proceedings in the supreme Court for having the notice set aside or suspended, if he considered that the proceedings contemplated were outwith the statute. This last was the course followed in the case of Campbell v. The Leith Police Commissioners, 29th June 1862, 37 Scot. Jur. 446, and of Lord Advocate v. Perth Police Commissioners, 7th December 1869, 8 Macph. 244. But it is important to observe that in these cases legal proceedings were adopted before the execution of the proposed work, and before any expense had been incurred. The defender, however, took neither course. He did nothing, but looked on and allowed the Police Commissioners to proceed to have the work executed in terms of the notice. By the 286th section of the Police Act the Police Commissioners are authorised to proceed with the work, 'if such matter or thing shall not be made the subject of appeal to the Sheriff.' The defender did not make the notice the subject of any such appeal, nor did he bring a suspension of the same, nor did he do anything to make the Police Commissioners aware that he objected to the same. In such circumstances it seems to the Sheriff that the Police Commissioners were entitled to proceed with the work, on the faith that the defender had no objection to its execution in terms of the subsisting notice. Accordingly, it seems to the Sheriff to be too late in this mere secondary action to object for the first time that the commissioners are outwith the statute, and had no right either to serve or act on the said notice.

"If such a course be open to the defender at this stage the Sheriff fails to discover what is the use of the statutory machinery of appeal provided by the Act. The Sheriff could have tried the question raised by the defender as well under the appeal case as under this. The advantage of having had the question tried under the statutory appeal would have been that it would have been determined before the execution of the work, and before the expense had been incurred.

"The latter part of the 286th section of the Police Act seems to the Sheriff to have been passed for the protection of police commissioners. If the notice

The defender appealed to the Court of Session.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The interlocutor under appeal is based chiefly on the findings in point of fact. The finding in point of law following on them is "that the defender cannot now object in this Court to repay to the said Police Commissioners the said sum expended by them in paving the portion of the carriage-way of said street on which his property abuts, paved in terms of said notice and intimation: Therefore decerns against the defender for the said sum of £30, 5s. 2d., with interest on the same at five per cent from citation till payment." Now, it appears to me that there is no sufficient foundation for that judgment, unless the Sheriff is right in holding that an appeal was competent to the appellant under the 285th and 286th sections of the Police Act. I shall say a word as to the fact, also founded on by the Sheriff, that the appellant did not take any other step to set aside the notice or prevent the commissioners from carrying out the proposed work; but the other is the important point.

The Dean of Faculty conceded that the 285th section was not applicable to this case. But he relied upon the 286th section, which affirms the right of a party as soon as notice is served on him to appeal to the Sheriff against the notice.

The procedure of the commissioners is based on the 64th section of the Nuisance Removal Act, 1856. But the kind of procedure authorised by that section was also previously authorised by the Police Act of 1850. The corresponding section of that Act, the 213th, was repealed, and other regulations substituted, and it is not immaterial to compare the two clauses. But before doing so I must premise that no appeal is competent under section 286 unless in regard to matters, "the cost attending which is by this Act directed to be provided for by way of private or district assessment." Now, the 213th section, which originally authorised procedure of the kind in question, is in these terms,—"That if any street have not before the adoption of this Act been well and sufficiently paved and flagged, or otherwise made good, the commissioners may cause such street, or the parts thereof not so paved and flagged or otherwise made good, to be paved and flagged, or otherwise made good, in such manner as they think fit, and the expenses incurred by the commissioners in respect thereof shall be repaid to them by the occupiers of the lands abutting on such street, or was left unappealed against, and was allowed to remain as a subsisting statutory notice, they were to be safe in proceeding to act upon it, and to incur expense. They were entitled to assume that no objection existed thereto, and that the parties interested acquiesced therein. Were it not for such statutory protection they might find themselves suddenly and unexpectedly made liable for large sums of money, expended by them in good faith on behalf of others. It seems to the Sheriff that the defender having received the notice, and having left the same unappealed against and unsuspended, and having stood aside and acquiesced in the Police Commissioners expending considerable sums of money on the faith of the same, is now too late in raising an objection to the right of the commissioners to act as they did.

"As to the merits the Sheriff may add, that supposing the question raised by the defender could be competently raised at this stage, there would have been considerable difficulty in holding that the street in question had been 'made good' previous to 1851 . . ."

such parts thereof as have not been theretofore well and sufficiently paved and flagged, or otherwise made good, and such expenses shall be recoverable from such occupiers respectively, as herein provided with respect to private improvement expenses, and thereafter such street shall be repaired by the commissioners out of the assessment levied under this Act." Under that section I quite concede that money spent on such improvements might have been recovered from occupiers of property abutting on the street by means of private assessment, because that is the express provision of this section. And if the commissioners had proceeded to levy money by means of private improvement assessment they must have done it under section 73, for I can find no other means of levying private assessment or private improvement assessment, between which terms I can see no distinction.

Section 73 is introduced with these words,—"And with respect to private and district assessments under this Act for sewers, drains, and private improvements, be it enacted as follows,—That where by this Act the occupiers of any premises are made liable to the payment of any expenses, which are directed to be recoverable as private improvement expenses, the commissioners may charge the occupiers of such premises respectively with special rates over and above any other rates to which such persons may be liable under this Act after the yearly rate of £6, 10s. in the £100 on the cost of such private improvements respectively, such special rates to be payable during thirty years next after such expenses have been incurred."

Now, so stood the matter under the statute of 1850. The parties to be charged were occupiers, and the improvement assessment was to be levied on them at 6½ per cent. But here comes in the 64th section of the Act of 1856. It repeals the 213th section, and in lieu thereof re-enacts most of its provisions in nearly the same words,—and then it provides that "the provisions and enactments of the said Act (viz., the said 13th and 14th Vict., cap. 33), with respect to ensuring the execution of the works thereby required to be done by owners or occupiers, shall apply to the execution of all works required to be done, and the recovery of all expenses incurred by the commissioners with respect to the paving, flagging, or otherwise making good such street under the provisions of this Act, and such street shall thereafter be repaired by the commissioners out of the assessment levied under the said Act."

It is no longer said that private improvement expenses are to be recovered by private improvement assessment. The clause directs the commissioners to proceed under the sections of the Police Act dealing with the execution of the works thereby required to be done by owners or occupiers, and incorporates the set of clauses applicable to that subject. We find these quite distinctly laid down as a class by themselves dealing with this particular subject. They begin with the 307th, and are introduced by the following words, words verbatim the same as those used by way of reference in section 64 of the later Act,—"And with respect to ensuring the execution of the works by this Act required to be done by owners and occupiers be it enacted as follows." The first provision in the 307th section relates to the service of notice on occupiers. The 308th provides that in default of the owners or occupiers the commissioners may do the work, and the expense shall be repaid to them by the persons by whom such work ought to have been executed. The 309th provides that the occupiers may execute the works in default of the owner. Then the 310th is in these terms,—

No. 123.
Dundee Police Commissioners v. Mitchell.

"That if the owner of any premises made liable by this Act for the repayment to the commissioners of any expenses incurred by them do not, as soon as the same become due and payable from him, repay all such expenses to the commissioners the commissioners may recover the same from such owner in the same manner as damages may be recovered under this Act, or as any debt may be recovered by the law and practice of Scotland."

It seems therefore that expenses incurred by the commissioners in doing work like the present form simply a debt against the party or parties who ought to have done the work, to be recovered in the same way as any other debt. Is it possible to say, then, that this case falls within the meaning of section 286, which is expressly limited to matters the cost of which is directed to be provided for by private or district assessment? On the contrary, it is the obvious intention of section 64, on which the action is laid, that no assessment is to be imposed for expenses of this kind, but that they are to be recovered by way of action.

I am therefore of opinion that no appeal was competent to Mr Mitchell. He could not have appealed under the 286th section, and it is conceded that he could not have done so under the 285th.

But the Sheriff seems to think he might have taken some other course in order to shew that he objected. But under the circumstances it would be unreasonable that he should be barred from stating his defence. He and other proprietors had presented a petition to the commissioners calling on them to do this work at the public expense. They refused, and served a notice on the proprietors requiring them to execute the work themselves. It is in vain to say that after this interchange of compliments the parties did not know what they were about. The question was not whether the work was to be done, but who was to pay for it.

I do not say it would have been incompetent for the present appellant to come here with a suspension. But I cannot think that he is now precluded from defending himself in this action for debt. If by omitting to take such procedure he had led the commissioners into unnecessary expense, the question would have been different. But it is admitted that the work had to be done, and the question of liability appears to me to be fairly raised by this action before the Sheriff.

It is impossible to read this record without seeing that the commissioners were themselves aware that they must recover the expenses under sections 307–310, and not by laying on a private assessment. The form of their own action plainly excludes the notion that the matter could have been dealt with in the way that they now contend for. But, without founding on that, I am of opinion that this is not a case in which an appeal lay under the 286th section. That being so, the ground of the Sheriff's judgment is gone.

LORD DEAS and LORD ARDMILLAN concurred.

LORD MURE.—I have come to the same conclusion, and on the same grounds. But I wish to add that, in my opinion, the somewhat different ground upon which the Sheriff-substitute proceeded rests upon a sound construction of the 64th section. Under that section the commissioners are only entitled to give notice and take proceedings in one event, viz. if the street was not well and sufficiently paved, "or otherwise made good," before the adoption of the Police and Improvement Act. If the street was made good before that date the machinery of the 64th section, and relative powers as to notice, do not apply; and the commissioners were not entitled to give notice, or make improvements at the owner's expense; because they were then not within the Act, and it is only to proceedings within the Act that the appeal and finality clauses apply. The commissioners, however, served a notice on the defender in 1871, to which no attention was paid, and no appeal was taken. In these circumstances the work was completed, and the present action brought to recover the expense. Now, in the condescendence the commissioners allege that "the street was not well and sufficiently paved and flagged, or otherwise made good, previous to the adoption" of the Act, and so made their action relevant. But that is met by a distinct denial, and by the counter allegation in defence that "the road or street had been made good before 1851." Now, that allegation, if true, is, I apprehend, sufficient to found a relevant defence; and the fact that the defender did not appeal against the notice cannot, in my opinion, be held to prevent him from defending himself in the Sheriff Court on the above ground, because the pursuers, when they gave the notice, were not acting within the statute, and unless they were within the statute I think the finality clauses have no application.

Counsel for the pursuers were then heard on the proof, and

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Sustain the competency of the appeal: Recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff, dated 8th December 1875: Find in point of fact that in 1871 the Police Commissioners for the burgh of Dundee served notices, under section 64 of the Nuisances Removal, &c. (Scotland) Act, 1856, upon the owners of property abutting upon the eastern portion of Ann Street, Dundee, including the defender (appellant), requiring them to pave the carriage-way of said street opposite their respective properties in manner therein specified, and, on the owners failing to comply with the said requisition, had the work executed under a contract: Find, however, also in point of fact, that the said Commissioners of Police have failed to prove that the carriage-way of said street was not made good prior to the adoption in the said burgh of Dundee of the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1850: Find in point of law that the owners of property abutting on said street are not liable for the expenses of the foresaid works, but that the same must be defrayed out of the general police rates: Therefore of new assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the action, and decern: Find the pursuers (respondents) liable in expenses both in this Court and the inferior Court," &c.

2D DIVISION. Lord Young.

IN 1869 Dr William Traill of Woodwick had occasion to borrow money to pay for a house which he had bought in St Andrews. He accordingly instructed his factor, Mr Robert Scarth, Kirkwall, to negotiate a loan of £1000 over the house in St Andrews, and heritable property belonging to him in Kirkwall. Mr Robert Scarth applied to Scarth and Scott, W.S., Leith, to ascertain if they could furnish the money, which they undertook to do.

Scarth and Scott then laid Dr Traill's proposal for a loan before certain clients of theirs, Ballantyne's trustees, who had money to invest. At a meeting of Ballantyne's trustees in March 1870 they agreed to this and other loans, and at Whitsunday 1870 they put Scarth and Scott in possession of the funds required. In settling with their correspondent, Mr Robert Scarth, at the same term, Scarth and Scott credited him with the £1000, he having made a temporary advance to Dr Traill of the amount.

Dr Traill's titles were sent to Scarth and Scott to prepare the security in favour of the lenders, but no bond was executed. Scarth and Scott did not at first disclose to Dr Traill or his factor the source from which the loan had come, but at Martinmas 1870, when the first half year's interest was paid, they granted a receipt as agents for Ballantyne's trustees, and continued to grant similar receipts for the half-yearly payments of interest down to Martinmas 1872 inclusive. All these payments of interest passed between Mr Robert Scarth and Scarth and Scott, Dr Traill having no personal knowledge of the matter.

In January 1867 Scarth and Scott had been instructed by another set of clients, Smith's trustees, to look out for an investment for a sum of £1200 belonging to them, which was to be paid up at Whitsunday following. The money was paid up at that term, but Scarth and Scott did not re-invest it. In the accounts which they rendered to Smith's trustees they regularly credited the trust with interest.

In April 1873 Smith's trustees asked Scarth and Scott to send a statement of how the money of the trust was invested. Scarth and Scott rendered a statement which contained the following item:—"Dr Traill, over property in St Andrews and Kirkwall, £1000." At a subsequent meeting of Smith's trustees, held on 16th April in Scarth and Scott's chambers, the securities held by the trust were laid upon the table. It was then observed that there was no bond by Dr Traill corresponding to the entry in the state rendered by Scarth and Scott. On this being pointed out, one of the partners replied that by an oversight the draft of the bond, which had been prepared at the time the money was lent, had never been extended. Smith's trustees expressed surprise, and requested Scarth and Scott to have the bond executed without delay. Scarth and Scott then sent the following letter to Dr Traill:—"7th May 1873.—Dear Sir,—With reference to the loan of £1000 which we negotiated for you through Mr Robert Scarth over your property in Kirkwall and St Andrews, we find that from the matter being overlooked at the time the bond was never executed. It now falls to be taken in favour of the trustees of the late Mr Smith, and we send it herewith for execution. We will feel obliged by your signing it according to the printed directions prefixed, and returning it to us at your convenience."

The bond which was sent with this letter expressed in common form Dr Traill's acknowledgment of the sum of £1000 as having been instantly borrowed and received from Smith's trustees, and his conveyance to them of his property at Kirkwall and St Andrews in security.

Dr Traill, without noticing the terms of the bond, and believing it to be for the £1000 which he had borrowed in 1870, signed the bond on 9th May 1873, and returned it to Scarth and Scott, who, in July following, recorded it, on behalf of Smith's trustees, in the Register of Sasines for the county of Fife. In the beginning of 1875 Smith's trustees caused it to be recorded also in the Registers of Sasines for the burghs of St Andrews and Kirkwall.

The half year's interests due by Dr Traill at Whitsunday and Martinmas 1873 were paid as before by Robert Scarth to Scarth and Scott, but the receipts bore to be granted as for interests due to Smith's trustees.

In January 1874 Smith's trustees took their affairs out of the hands of Scarth and Scott, and appointed Scott Moncrieff and Thomson, C.A., factors on the trust-estate. The bond by Dr Traill was among the papers handed over by Scarth and Scott to the factors, who granted receipts on behalf of Smith's trustees for Dr Traill's yearly payments of interest at Whitsunday and Martinmas 1874.

In February 1875 the estates of Scarth and Scott were sequestrated. After their bankruptcy Dr Traill was called upon by the surviving trustee on Ballantyne's trust to pay the sum of £1000 with interest since Martinmas 1872 as having been advanced to him from that trust. He was also called upon by Smith's trustees to pay the sum of £1000 as due to them under the bond in their favour.

In the circumstances Dr Traill raised the present action in May 1875, in which he called as defenders both Smith's trustees and Ballantyne's trustee. The first conclusion of the summons was directed against Smith's trustees, and was for reduction of the bond and disposition in security granted by him in their favour on 9th May 1873, and also for repetition of the interest thereon paid in 1873-4. The summons also contained a conclusion directed against Ballantyne's trustee, viz., that in the event of decree of reduction of the bond not being obtained, it should be found and declared that the pursuer was not indebted to Ballantyne's trustee in the sum of £1000, or any other sum, and in particular that he was not bound to pay to Ballantyne's trustee "the sum of £1000 sterling, with accruing interest thereon, alleged to have been advanced by the trustees of the said John Ballantyne at or about Whitsunday 1870, through their agents, Scarth and Scott, writers to the signet, Leith, to the pursuer in loan, upon the security of his properties in Kirkwall and St Andrews above described, nor to grant to the said defender any bond and disposition in security or other heritable security over the said subjects."

The pursuer's averments are sufficiently indicated by his pleas in law, which were as follows:—1. The bond in question having been obtained from the pursuer by the fraud of Scarth and Scott, agents for the defenders, Smith's trustees, the said defenders can take no benefit by such fraud, and the bond should be reduced. 2. The pursuer having received no consideration for the said bond from the defenders, Smith's trustees, and having granted the said bond in essential error, induced by the fraud of these defenders' agents, the said bond should be reduced. 3. The said defenders' agents having claimed and obtained the bond in the said defenders' favour on the representation that the said defenders were then the creditors in the loan of Whitsunday 1870, and the said representation being false, the said bond should be reduced. 4. There never having been any contract of loan between the pursuer and the said defenders to which the said bond can be referred, the pursuer is entitled to decree of reduction. 5. On the same grounds the pursuer is entitled to repetition of the interest paid to the said defenders from the term of Whitsunday 1873 inclusive. 6. Separatim, the pursuer is not liable to the defender Ballantyne's trustee, in respect (1) that Scarth and Scott, as agents for Ballantyne's trustees, were acting apparently within the scope of their ordinary authority in ultimately taking the bond to the other defenders; and (2) that Ballantyne's trustees, by their acquiescence in all Scarth and Scott's proceedings relative to the loan and the bond, led the pursuer to believe that Scarth and Scott had such authority. 7. The defenders having enabled Scarth and Scott to commit the fraud libelled, the pursuer is liable in only once and single payment of £1000 and interest, and he is entitled to decree in terms of either of the alternative conclusions of the summons, with his expenses of process.

Smith's trustees stated, as was not disputed, that in 1861 they had made a previous loan to Dr Traill through Scarth and Scott. In regard to what occurred in 1867 they stated;—"At Whitsunday 1867 two bonds for £800 and £400, due by a Mr Kirkpatrick and a Mr Overstone to Smith's trust were paid up; and in order to provide for the re-investment of that money, the trustees, at a meeting held on 16th January 1867, requested Messrs Scarth and Scott 'to look out for an investment for the funds at the disposal of the trust,' and they subsequently informed the trustees that they had lent the money to their client Dr Traill. Scarth and Scott acted for both borrower and lenders in this transaction, just as they had done in the previous one. . . . Smith's trustees took for granted that, in the ordinary course of business, Scarth and Scott would obtain from the borrower of the trust-funds the necessary bond. In the account between Smith's trustees and Scarth and Scott the following entry occurs on the debit side at Whitsunday 1867:—'1867, May 15. To loan to Dr Traill of Woodwick over subjects in St Andrews and Kirkwall, £1000;' and on the other side the half-yearly interests on that loan are regularly credited."

They admitted that the bond under reduction was granted at the date it bore, but added;—"If Dr Traill had not granted the said bond and paid the interest thereon the trustees would have immediately compelled Scarth and Scott to pay up the sum, which they would then have been in a position to do."

They pleaded;—(2) The pursuer's signature to the said bond having been obtained by Messrs Scarth and Scott in the capacity of agents for him, and not as agents for the present defenders, there are no grounds stated for reducing the same. (3) The said bond having been treated by the present defenders as a valid bond by the pursuer, with his knowledge and consent, and he having regularly paid interest to them under the same, he is now barred from disputing his liability under the same.

Ballantyne's trustee pleaded;—(2) The pursuer is not entitled to have decree in terms of the said conclusions, in respect that the pursuer borrowed and received the said sum of £1000 from Ballantyne's trustees at Whitsunday 1870, and that the said sum has never been repaid, but is, on the contrary, due by the pursuer to the defender, with interest from Martinmas 1872.

After a proof, the result of which has been shortly given in the preceding narrative, and is more fully stated in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk,[1] the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds, 1st, that at Whitsunday 1870 Messrs Scarth and Scott, as agents for Ballantyne's trustees, and in pursuance of the authority and instructions of the said trustees, lent to the pursuer £1000 of the trust-funds, the pursuer agreeing to grant therefor a bond and disposition in security over his property specified in the bond and disposition in security challenged in this action; 2d, that on 9th May 1873 the pursuer was, by the false and fraudulent representation of Messrs Scarth and Scott, to the effect that the said loan had been made on account of Smith's trustees, or that they had acquired right as creditors therein, and that the bond and disposition in security therefor consequently fell to be granted in their favour, induced to execute and deliver in favour of Smith's trustees the bond and disposition in security challenged in this action; and 3d, that the pursuer received no loan from Smith's trustees, and was not, at the date of the said bond and disposition in security, and is not now, indebted to them, and that the said bond and disposition in security ought to have been granted in favour of Ballantyne's trustees, from whom, through Scarth and Scott as their agents, the pursuer obtained the loan at Whitsunday 1870, and for the whole amount of which the pursuer was, and still is, indebted to them: Therefore reduces, decerns, and declares in terms of the reductive conclusions of the summons: Sustains the defences for the defender, Ballantyne's trustee, and assoilzies him from the conclusions of the summons directed against him: And decerns and ordains the defenders, Smith's trustees, to repay to the pursuer the sums set forth in the petitory conclusions of the summons, together with interest on the several sums at the rate of four per cent per annum during the non-payment: Finds Smith's trustees liable in expenses to the other parties in the cause subsequent to the date of closing the record," &c.*

* "OPINION.—When I allowed a proof in this case I expressed a hope that the real competitors in the case (as I thought), namely, Ballantyne's trustees and Smith's trustees, would so arrange that the pursuer, Dr Traill, should have no occasion to appear in the litigation, but that they would conduct the case between themselves upon the question which of them was entitled to his bond. I am not surprised that the parties did not see their way to do this, and that Dr Traill has accordingly been under the necessity of attending to his interest in the case down to the present time.

"My opinion is that the pursuer is only liable in single payment of the £1000 which he got, with any interest that may be due thereon, and that the question in the cause is truly between Ballantyne's trustees and Smith's trustees. The question is, which of the trusts is entitled to hold Dr Traill's bond for £1000? Now, the bond which was actually granted upon the 9th of May 1873 is in name of Smith's trustees as creditors; and it is incumbent, in the first instance, upon Ballantyne's trustees, who seek to displace Smith's trustees from their position as creditors in the bond, to shew and establish cause why they should be so displaced. Smith's trustees aver—and this may be taken as their case—that in the year 1867 Messrs Scarth and Scott held funds belonging to that trust-estate to the amount of about £1200, and that they informed their constituents, the trustees, that they had lent the money to their client, Dr Traill, the present pursuer. The trustees do not distinctly aver when Scarth and Scott gave them this information, the averment being in article 3 that Scarth and Scott having in their possession at Whitsunday 1867 the amount of money which I have mentioned belonging to the trust, and being instructed to look out for an investment for the funds, they subsequently informed the trustees that they had lent the money to Dr Traill; and in the same article they aver that in the account of Scarth and Scott to the trust this entry occurs—'1867, May 15. To loan to Dr Traill of Woodwick, over subjects in St Andrews and Kirkwall, £1000.' With proper caution Mr Beveridge, one of the trustees, desired to see the trust securities in the hands of Scarth and Scott, the agents for the trust; and he accordingly had a meeting with Scarth and Scott in their chambers in the month of April 1873, at which meeting all the securities which ought to have been in their hands were exhibited, with the exception of that which they ought to have had corresponding to the entry I have just read in

Traill v. Smith's Trustees, &c.

Smith's trustees reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The £1000 which Dr Traill received was not identified as belonging to Ballantyne's trust. There was no contract between Dr Traill and Ballantyne's trustees. Dr Traill's only contract was with Scarth and Scott, who acted as cashiers for both trusts. There was nothing which legally disabled Scarth and Scott from ultimately crediting the loan to Smith's trustees, as they had done by getting the bond executed in their favour. (2) The Lord Ordinary was in error in assuming that Dr Traill was necessarily only liable in single their account under date 15th May 1867—'To loan to Dr Traill of Woodwick over subjects in St Andrews and Kirkwall, £1000.' They had not that bond to exhibit, and accordingly none such was exhibited; they could have none corresponding to such a loan, for in point of fact no such loan was ever made; but they informed Mr Beveridge that there had been an accidental omission to take the bond from Dr Traill, which would be immediately supplied. They accordingly, in pursuance of this assurance, proceeded to apply to Dr Traill to give them a bond. They could not ask him to give a bond for a loan made to him out of Smith's estate in May 1867, for no such loan had ever been made, but they represented to him falsely, in their letter of 7th May 1873, that a loan which had been in fact made to him through them at Whitsunday 1870, was made for Smith's trustees, or at least that Smith's trustees had acquired right to that loan, and were entitled to the security. I regard this as a false and fraudulent statement on the part of Scarth and Scott to Dr Traill for the purpose of inducing him—as it had the effect of inducing him—to grant his bond for the loan which he had obtained at Whitsunday 1870 in name of Smith's trustees as creditors, that they might be able to represent to Smith's trustees that this was the bond and security for the loan which they falsely represented they had made out of these funds at Whitsunday 1867. Smith's trustees are now quite innocently in possession of the fruits of this fraud; but the bond is the fruits of the fraud, and however innocent—and I hold they are quite innocent—they are in possession of the fruits of a fraud committed by their agent in order to satisfy them, the fraud consisting, as I have stated, in representing to Dr Traill that Smith's trustees had a right to the loan which they had made to him at Whitsunday 1870, in order that obtaining his bond upon that footing, but without any mention of the date of the loan, they might represent it to Smith's trustees as the bond which they had got for the pretended loan of 1867. If that fraud had not been committed, Smith's trustees would not have been in possession of the bond; being in possession of that bond, they are in possession of the fruits of the fraud; and whatever hardship there may be—and there is great hardship—in having been swindled, and in discovering now that the bond is the fruits of a fraud, I must nevertheless apply the law, and deprive them of the fruits of that fraud.

"Then, with regard to the rights of Ballantyne's trustees, I am of opinion that the loan which was certainly made by Scarth and Scott to Dr Traill at Whitsunday 1870, was a loan on account of the funds, and under the authority of the trustees having the management of that trust-estate. An application was made to these trustees to lend the money to Dr Traill in the month of March 1870. The proposal was considered and agreed to, and Messrs Scarth and Scott were instructed accordingly, and trust money to the amount of £1300 was put into their hands to enable them, with funds which they then represented to be in their hands of sufficient amount for the purpose, to make that loan and other two which were authorised at the same meeting; and the loan was made. I hold that the funds of that trust, in pursuance of the authority and directions of the trust, were so given and so dealt with by all the parties, until Scarth and Scott being pressed to do something to cover the gross swindle that they had committed six years before, deceived Dr Traill into granting this bond in 1873. Having this opinion, I must determine, whatever the proper form of it may be, that Dr Traill is liable only to pay once, and that Ballantyne's trustees, and not Smith's trustees, are entitled to hold the bond for £1000."

payment. Whatever Dr Traill's liability to Ballantyne's trust might be, he was liable to Smith's trustees under the bond. Assuming that there was fraud on the part of Scarth and Scott in obtaining the bond, they were acting in the capacity of Dr Traill's agents, and therefore Dr Traill must bear any loss arising from their misconduct. Further, in any view, Dr Traill could not reduce the bond unless he was in a position to replace Smith's trustees in the position in which they stood before the bond was granted. If he had refused to sign the bond, Smith's trustees would at once have demanded payment of the sum from Scarth and Scott, who, it must be assumed in the absence of any averment or evidence to the contrary, were then solvent. By his negligence in signing the bond and in paying interest on it for two years he had led them to believe that everything was correct. Now that Scarth and Scott were bankrupt, and recourse against them was of little or no value, Dr Traill was not entitled to repudiate the bond.

Argued for Ballantyne's trustee;—The proof shewed that £1000 of the funds of Ballantyne's trust had been lent to Dr Traill under an obligation to grant heritable security therefor. Whatever became of the claim of Smith's trustees that debt remained due.

Argued for the pursuer;—He had only got one sum of £1000, and could not be made to pay twice. Smith's trustees had given no value for the bond, which was obtained by the fraud of Scarth and Scott, acting as their agents and on their behalf. It was absurd to contend that in getting the bond signed by the pursuer they were acting as his agents. It was the interest of the creditors, not of the debtor, to see that the bond was signed. Alternatively, as against Ballantyne's trustee, if Smith's trustees were right in their contention that Scarth and Scott were entitled to ascribe the loan to them (Smith's trustees), then it followed that Ballantyne's trustees had not advanced the money, and the pursuer was entitled to decree of declarator against the latter as concluded for.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—In this case, undoubtedly, as presented at the bar, and as it appears upon record, there is a good deal of perplexity and complication. What, between the fraud of one of the four parties involved in the matter, and the extraordinary carelessness of the others, an apparent coil of cross-purposes has been established which it requires some care to unravel. The form of Dr Traill's action also contributes to the general confusion and difficulty. The summons is divided into two parts—(1) a conclusion for reduction of the bond, and (2) a conclusion for declarator that the pursuer is not under obligation to one set of defenders. The conclusions are called alternative, but the first is truly destructive of the second. Dr Traill would have been better advised if he had tried separately the validity of the bond against Smith's trustees. But he seems to have been under the impression that although he has granted the same rights to different persons, he is only liable in once and single payment, because he only received payment once himself, which certainly does not follow.

I shall first consider the question of the reduction of the bond as if that were the only question in issue. Dr Traill says, in effect, that in 1870 he borrowed through Messrs Scarth and Scott, W.S., Leith, the sum of £1000 upon the security of certain heritable property he held in Orkney and St Andrews, that he paid interest on £1000 for two-and-half years, and received receipts therefor from Scarth and Scott as agents for and in the name of Ballantyne's trustees. He says that in 1873 Scarth and Scott fraudulently obtained from him a bond and disposition in security over this property, in the name of Smith's trustees, on the false representation that they had acquired right to the debt. He states that Smith's trustees never paid £1000 to him, or any part of it, but that the sum was truly advanced solely by Ballantyne's trustees. He now seeks to reduce the bond so obtained. That is the case as set forth by the pursuer. On the other hand, the defence for Smith's trustees is that the above statement is untrue in point of fact: That it is not true that Ballantyne's trustees advanced £1000 to Dr Traill, and that these trustees never were creditors in the transaction: That Scarth and Scott were the real lenders, advancing the £1000 out of their own funds, and they were therefore entitled to take the bond from the debtor in any name they chose.

There are thus three questions to be solved: 1. Did Ballantyne's trustees, at the Whitsunday term 1870, lend Dr Traill £1000 on the security of his heritable property at Kirkwall and St Andrews, and were they at the date of this bond creditors in the debt and in the heritable security in question? 2. If Ballantyne's trustees did lend the money, and were the creditors in this debt and security at the date of the bond, was the bond taken in the name of Smith's trustees and put on record through the fraud of Scarth and Scott as agents of Smith's trustees? 3. If these two questions are answered in the affirmative, the third seems to be,—Can Smith's trustees retain a benefit procured by the fraud of their own agents, and for which they gave Dr Traill no consideration?

Now, on these propositions, as far as they depend on fact, I am unable to find any room for doubt.

As to the first of them, I can hardly think that it can be maintained that Ballantyne's trustees did not lend this money to Traill, or that Scarth and Scott were the true creditors. All the evidence points in the first direction, and none of it in the second. But as the whole case turns on this matter, and it has been very earnestly argued, I shall inquire into the facts with an amount of care which I should not otherwise have thought it deserved.

In 1869 Dr Traill bought a house in St Andrews, and required £1000 to pay for it. His factor, Robert Scarth, applied to his relative's firm of Scarth and Scott in Leith to ascertain if they could find the money, explaining for whom and why it was wanted. Scarth and Scott undertook to find the money; but in the meantime Robert Scarth made a temporary advance of the amount to Dr Traill, it being arranged that he should be repaid when the loan was received. Some delay occurred in completing Dr Traill's title to the property in St Andrews, in regard to which Scarth and Scott acted as Traill's agents, and on the 19th of March 1870 a meeting of Ballantyne's trustees was held in the chambers of Scarth and Scott, at which Mr Scott was present, and at which the following loans were agreed to, viz., "To Dr Traill of Woodwick the sum of £1000 over subjects belonging to him in St Andrews and Kirkwall," in addition to two other loans to other parties of £500 and £600 each. On the 6th of May it appears that two deposit-receipts, amounting to £535 and £539 each with £261 of interest are credited in the cash ledger of Scarth and Scott to Ballantyne's trustees. On the 9th of May Scarth and Scott sent Robert Scarth a note of the payments on his account falling due at the term of Whitsunday 1870, amounting to £640, 12s. 10d. This letter is acknowledged by Robert Scarth on the 11th by a letter in which he says,—"Please on 16th credit me with the £1000 loan obtained for Dr Traill of Woodwick, less the expense, of which send me an account discharged. . . . Please pay in the balance of the £1000 to my credit with the Union Bank in Edinburgh." Under date 16th of May the account of Ballantyne's trustees in Scarth and Scott's cash ledger is debited with £1000 by this entry,—"To paid Dr Traill amount of loan, £1000;" and the same entry appears in the cash book of the same date,—"Ballantyne's trust.—To paid Dr Traill amount of loan £1000;" with this notandum—"£341, 7s. 2d. paid to Mr S. S." (it should be R. S.) "credit with Union Bank." The meaning of this note is that on the same day, in compliance with Robert Scarth's desire, Scarth and Scott applied £659 to extinguish the sum of £640 owing to them by Robert Scarth, and to meet the expense of the bond to Ballantyne's trustees, and paid the balance into Robert Scarth's account with the Union Bank, as appears from a letter and state sent by them to Mr Robert Scarth on 8th June. And so the transaction was closed, as far as the advance and receipt of the money were concerned. Under date 15th May 1870, Robert Scarth, in his account rendered afterwards to Dr Traill, enters "on bond over house property in Kirkwall and St Andrews, now remitted for Dr Traill's credit, £1000." As to the security, it appears from Robert Scarth's letter of 8th July 1870 that Scarth and Scott were then in possession of Dr Traill's titles for the purpose of preparing the bond.

Up to this time the case has no mystery about it. It is an ordinary Whitsunday transaction, in which a Leith firm act as agents both for a client who wishes to lend and a client who wishes to borrow. Ballantyne's trustees, having £1000 to lend, put Scarth and Scott in funds to enable them to pay that amount to Dr Traill. Scarth and Scott credit them in their books with the amount when received, and debit them with the amount as having been paid to Dr Traill, and the very mode in which the settlement with Robert Scarth is made shews beyond all question how and in what capacity the payment to Dr Traill was made. There is not an element of any kind to indicate that Scarth and Scott acted as principals in the matter. On the contrary, they had power to bind, and did bind, Dr Traill to Ballantyne's trustees to grant the stipulated security, and could have done nothing to liberate him from that obligation after the money was paid.

It appears, no doubt, that up to this time Dr Traill did not know who the lender was. But this is immaterial, for Dr Traill knew that whoever the persons were who advanced the money he had authorised Scarth and Scott to undertake for him to the lender that he would execute a conveyance in security in their favour. Scarth and Scott did so undertake to Ballantyne's trustees, and received their money on that footing, and paid it to Dr Traill; and Dr Traill is as much bound to fulfil his agents' undertaking as if he had made it personally. Scarth and Scott held Dr Traill's title-deeds on Ballantyne's trustees' account for the purpose of preparing a bond in their favour, and for no other; and that duty they were bound to perform whether Dr Traill knew the name of the lenders or not.

I attach no weight whatever to the argument, so sedulously pressed, about there being no specific appropriation or separation of the money as that of Ballantyne's trustees. There is no case of specific appropriation raised here; nor can I see how there could be. If it be certain that Scarth and Scott were indebted to Ballantyne's trustees in £1000, and that Ballantyne's trustees instructed Scarth and Scott to pay £1000 on their account to Dr Traill, and they do so, Scarth and Scott are discharged of the £1000, and the relation of debtor and creditor between Dr Traill and Ballantyne's trustees is as clearly established as if the money had been paid in bags of sovereigns with unbroken seals.

So stood the transaction in July 1870. The security had not been granted, but Scarth and Scott held the titles of Dr Traill's property for the purpose of preparing it on the part of the lenders. But for three years the contract was expressly acted on by Dr Traill paying the interest on the loan to Scarth and Scott, and receiving receipts granted by them in the name and for the account of Ballantyne's trustees. It is hopeless to contend that after this Scarth and Scott were principals in the transaction, or that either they or Dr Traill could have pretended that Ballantyne's trustees were not the only creditors entitled to the security.

Therefore, at the date of the bond, Ballantyne's trustees were the creditors in this loan. The transaction was entirely honest throughout, and whatever other frauds Scarth and Scott were guilty of, they had not embezzled this £1000 belonging to Ballantyne's trustees.

The second proposition is that the bond was obtained by the fraud of Scarth and Scott as agents of Smith's trustees. It was of course a fraud on the part of Scarth and Scott to take any bond from Dr Traill but one in favour of Ballantyne's trustees, from whom they had obtained the loan on the undertaking that Traill should grant it. But the fraud went deeper.

Up to this time, Dr Traill had no more concern with Smith's trustees than with any other client of Scarth and Scott. They had given him no money on this security, and he had no communication with them, or with any one on their behalf, directly or indirectly. But six years before, Scarth and Scott had £1000 belonging to Smith's trustees in their hands, which they were directed to invest, but which they embezzled.

In May 1873, Scarth and Scott suddenly wrote to Dr Traill the letter which was so strongly founded on, although they had not been for some time in correspondence with Dr Traill. That letter is in these terms—"With reference to the loan of £1000 which we negotiated for you through Mr Robert Scarth over your property in Kirkwall and St Andrews, we find that from the matter being overlooked at the time, the bond was never executed; it now falls to be taken in favour of the trustees of the late Mr Smith, and we send it herewith for execution. We will feel obliged by your signing it according to the printed directions prefixed, and returning it to us at your convenience." The plain meaning of this letter was that Smith's trustees were then in right of Ballantyne's debt, which was false. Dr Traill accordingly executed the bond and returned it, and it was put upon record. The question then is, whether the obtaining of this bond, taking delivery of it, and putting it on record, were fraudulent acts on the part of Scarth and Scott. I cannot doubt that they were. The proposal to make out the bond in favour of Smith's trustees was simply to cheat Ballantyne's trustees. Scarth and Scott never thought that they had a right to do as they liked with the bond; what they did was caused simply by a demand which had been made recently before, by Smith's trustees, for £1000 they had been entrusted with to invest six years before; and Scarth and Scott thought they would get out of their difficulty by inducing Dr Traill to execute this bond in their favour. It is clear that the £1000 which Dr Traill got was not the money of Smith's trustees, not only because it was the money of Ballantyne's trustees, but because the money of Smith's trustees had been embezzled three years before by Scarth and Scott. But whenever Smith's trustees demanded a voucher for their £1000 this fraud was perpetrated. It does appear that, in order to cover their own dishonesty, interest was paid by Scarth and

No. 124. June 3, 1876. Traill v. Smith's Trustees, &c.

Scott to Smith's trustees upon a supposed investment in 1867, but there is no trace of such interest or of any such investment in Scarth and Scott's books.

It is thus clear (1) that Ballantyne's trustees are the real creditors in this debt and security; and (2) the obtaining of this bond was a fraud both on them and on Dr Traill.

The third question is, can Smith's trustees take benefit by this fraud? They never gave value for this bond. There might be a question for whom Scarth and Scott were acting when they sent the bond to Dr Traill for execution, but there can be no doubt that in taking delivery of it, and in recording it, they acted for Smith's trustees.

None of the parties appear to have been very vigilant, but I apprehend that if a party gets benefit by a fraud, even though it were not that of his own agent, he cannot retain the benefit if he gave no consideration for it. But here Scarth and Scott committed the fraud as their agent, and for their behoof, although of course without their knowledge. If they had given the money to Dr Traill the case would then be that Dr Traill had received the money twice, and the creditor who obtained the security might prevail. But there is no such case here.

This bond cannot stand (1) because it was obtained by fraud, and (2) because Smith's trustees cannot reap benefit from the fraud of their agents, and gave no consideration for it.

Upon the alternative conclusion of the summons directed against Ballantyne's trustee, which is based on the supposition that the bond in favour of Smith's trustees is perfectly good, it is enough to say that the statements of the pursuer in support of this part of his case are inconsistent with fact.

I propose that we should adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD NEAVES, LORD ORMIDALE, and LORD GIFFORD concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Having heard counsel on the reclaiming note for Smith's trustees against Lord Young's interlocutor of 19th November 1875, refuse said note, and adhere to the interlocutor complained of: Find the expenses incurred since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor payable as follows:—The expenses incurred by Dr Traill to be paid by Smith's trustees, and the expenses incurred by Ballantyne's trustee to be paid by Dr Traill," &c.

1ST DIVISION. Ld. Craighill. M.

IN an action by John Clark, writer in Glasgow, against Alexander M'Allister, fishmonger there, and J. D. Kirkwood, the trustee on his sequestrated estate, for payment of business accounts, the Lord Ordinary, on 15th March 1876, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Allows to the pursuer a proof of his averments relative to the accounts sued for, and to the balance alleged to be due thereon, for which decree is now sought; in the second place, allows to the defender, Mr Kirkwood, a proof of his averments—(1) as to the sums said to have been received from or on account of the other defender, other than those credited by the pursuer, for which, as alleged, the defender is entitled to credit; and (2) as to the account for furnishings supplied by the other defender to the pursuer, and for which, in whole or in part, credit is claimed; and, in the third place, allows to each party a conjunct probation: Further, appoints the cause to be enrolled, that a diet of proof may be fixed."

Clark v. M'Allister.

On 18th March his Lordship pronounced this interlocutor:—"Upon the motion of the defender, remits to the Auditor to tax the accounts sued for, and to report, and this of consent of the pursuer."

A note of objections to the Auditor's report was lodged by the pursuer.

On 30th May the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard parties' procurators on the objections to the Auditor's taxation of the account sued for, finds that the necessity for a proof is not obviated by said taxation, there being a dispute between the parties as to the facts with reference to which, in the case of many of the items, the right of the pursuer to make the charges struck off by the Auditor must be determined: Therefore renews the order for proof in so far as disputed items in said accounts are concerned; and appoints the proof to proceed," &c.

The defender, Kirkwood, moved for leave to reclaim, which was refused. He presented a reclaiming note on 3d June.

The pursuer objected to the competency, on the ground that the interlocutor of 15th March ordering proof was final, not having been reclaimed against. The present interlocutor was only an interlocutory judgment carrying out the previous interlocutor, and could not be reclaimed against without leave.

The defender maintained that the interlocutor of 15th March was superseded by the interlocutor pronounced of consent three days afterwards, remitting the disputed accounts to the Auditor. The defender was then entitled to believe that there would be no proof, and that was the intention of the remit. The last interlocutor was therefore an independent order.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor on 15th March 1876 allowing a proof. That interlocutor was not reclaimed against. If the interlocutor of 30th May had merely appointed the proof to proceed it would clearly not have been what is called a six days' interlocutor, reviewable under the 28th section of the statute and the Act of Sederunt. But what his Lordship has done is this: He renews the order for proof, in so far as disputed items in the account are concerned, and then appoints the proof to proceed. It appears to the Court that the renewal of the order is an allowance of proof, and so within the meaning of the statute and the Act of Sederunt, and therefore that this interlocutor may be reclaimed against.

deeds and articles of roup." An intending purchaser, without applying to the agent named, addressed to the seller a written offer for the villa "as advertised," which was accepted. The titles shewed that the payment of £9 formed part of cumulo prestations amounting to £46, 19s., which affected a larger area of which the subjects formed part, and which had never been allocated. The seller offered to cancel the contract of sale, but the purchaser refused to agree to this, and insisted that the seller should either procure an allocation of the burdens or should insert in the disposition to be granted a clause warranting the purchaser against liability for a larger sum than £9 a year. In an action at the instance of the seller, held (rev. judgment of Lord Curriehill) that the purchaser was wrong in the position which he had taken, and was bound to accept a disposition in ordinary form, (1) because by the terms of the advertisement and relative offer and acceptance the titles were imported into the contract of sale, and the purchaser must be held to have acquired the subjects under all the conditions which the titles alone could accurately disclose; (2) because the advertisement only held out that the seller in point of fact paid £9 of feu-duty, which was true.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Curriehill. I.

IN March 1875 a villa near Glasgow, belonging to Mr John Nisbet, salt and whiting merchant, was advertised for sale,—"To be sold by public roup, in the Faculty Hall, St George's Place, Glasgow, on Wednesday, 31st March 1875, that villa known as Jane Villa, Kinnishead, near Glasgow." (The house and ground, consisting of one acre, were here described in popular language.) "Everything in the best order. Feu-duty £9. For further particulars apply to W. R. Buchan, writer, 112 West Regent Street, Glasgow, in whose hands are the title-deeds and articles of roup."*

Shortly after the advertisement appeared Mr Alexander Smith, commission agent, Glasgow, communicated directly with Mr Nisbet, and, after some verbal communing, addressed to him this offer:—"Glasgow, 24th March 1875.—Mr John Nisbet, Turner's Court.—Dear Sir,—I hereby make you the offer of £1200 for 'Jane Villa,' at Kinnishead, as advertised —possession at Whitsunday 1875.—I am, yours truly. ALEX. SMITH."

Nisbet returned this answer:—"Glasgow, 24th March 1875.—Mr Alex. Smith, 20 Dixon Street.—Dear Sir,—Your offer of £1200 for 'Jane Villa,' &c., as advertised by me, I hereby accept.—I am, yours truly. JOHN NISBET."

The titles of the property were then sent, at Smith's request, to his agents, for the purpose of satisfying themselves as to the title, and preparing the disposition in his favour.

When the titles came to be examined they disclosed the following state of matters:—The villa and ground in question, which extended to about an acre, formed part of an area of somewhat over 6½ acres feued out in 1853 by Sir John Maxwell of Pollok to one James Connell, for a feu-duty of £32, 19s. (being at the rate of £5 per acre), with a duplicand of the feu-duty every nineteenth year. Connell subsequently disponed 3½ acres of the 6½ acres to Peter Thomson, under a ground-annual of £14 (or £4 per acre) with a duplicand every nineteenth year. The disponee and his successors were also taken bound in payment of a proportion of the cumulo feu-duty corresponding to the extent of the subjects disponed. Thomson disponed an acre of his ground, under similar conditions, to William

* A discrepancy existed between the terms of the copy of the advertisement produced by the pursuer in the present action, which is given in the text, and the terms of the advertisement as stated by the pursuer in his condescendence, according to which the last clause ran thus:—"For further particulars apply to John Nisbet, Turner's Court, Dunlop Street, Glasgow, or to W. R. Buchan, 112 West Regent Street, there, who is in possession of the title-deeds." As no proof was taken it, did not appear whether there were two versions of the advertisement, and if there were, which was the one referred to in the missives of sale.

Menzies, which ultimately in 1866 came into the hands of Nisbet, and formed the subject of the present transaction.

No allocation of the feu-duty or ground-annual had been made by the persons in right of these prestations.

Smith refused to pay the price unless Nisbet obtained an allocation of the cumulo feu-duty and ground-annual, or inserted in the disposition a clause limiting the annual sum ultimately affecting the property to £9.

To this Nisbet would not consent, but he offered to relieve Smith of the contract of sale. Smith declined this proposal, and was allowed to enter into possession of the subjects at Whitsunday 1875.

Upon 9th July 1875 Nisbet raised the present action against Smith concluding that the defender should be ordained to implement the contract of sale, by paying the price, with interest from 15th May 1875, and taking a disposition containing all usual and necessary clauses so as to vest the defender therein, and in the whole right thereto held by the pursuer, and that within fourteen days after decree, and in the event of the defender failing so to implement the contract, for declarator that the contract was at an end in so far as regarded any right on the part of the defender to enforce it, but reserving the pursuer's claim of damages for the defender's non-implement thereof.

The parties were agreed as to the facts above narrated.

The pursuer averred, that since he had been in possession he had paid annually £5 in name of feu-duty, and £4 in name of ground-annual, amounting together to £9. The defender's answer was "Not known, and not admitted," but the correctness of the pursuer's statement on this point was assumed.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defender having entered into a contract for the purchase of the subjects above mentioned, he is bound to implement and fulfil the same by making payment of the price, and accepting of a disposition from the pursuer. (2) The defender having, on the faith of his implementing the said contract, been allowed to enter into possession of said subjects, he is bound to pay the price with interest and accept the disposition. (3) In the event of the defender failing so to do within such time as the Court shall direct, the pursuer will be entitled to decree of declarator that the contract is no longer operative or binding on the pursuer, and otherwise, as concluded for.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The pursuer is bound in the circumstances stated to obtain an allocation of the gross feu-duty and ground-annual, or to insert a clause in the disposition in such terms as to limit the annual sum ultimately affecting the property in question to £9, and to get the deed referred to sufficiently stamped. (3) The defender having always been ready to fulfil his part of the contract on the pursuer's implementing the obligations incumbent on him, the defender ought to be assoilzied.

The Lord Ordinary, on 5th January 1876, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having heard the counsel for the parties, and considered the closed record and whole proceedings, Primo, finds that it is admitted (1) that the plot or area of ground libelled, which belongs to the pursuer, is part of subjects of greater extent which are burdened with a cumulo feu-duty of £32, 19s. per annum, and a duplicand thereof every nineteenth year, payable to the superior, and with a ground-annual of £14 per annum, with a duplication of the like amount every nineteenth year; (2) that there has been no allocation by the superior or the party in right of said ground-annual of any proportion of said feu-duty and ground-annual upon the plot or area of ground libelled; (3) that the pursuer in March 1875 advertised for sale the said plot or area of ground which is now known as 'Jane Villa,' and in his advertisement stated the feu-duty to be £9; (4) that by missive offer and acceptance, both dated 24th March 1875, the defender offered to purchase, and the pursuer agreed to sell to the defender, the said subjects as advertised by the pursuer at the price of £1200 sterling, with entry at Whitsunday 1875: Secundo, Finds that the said offer and acceptance imply that the defender as purchaser should for the said price to be paid by him acquire and hold the said plot or area of ground subject to no feu-duty or ground-annual payable to any person, greater than the said annual sum of £9, and, therefore, that the pursuer is bound to convey the same to the defender freed from the burden of all feu-duties and ground-annuals in excess of said annual sum of £9, or secured against the effect of liability for such feu-duties and ground-annuals: Tertio, Finds that the defender is willing to implement his part of the transaction, provided the said cumulo feu-duty and ground-annual are to the extent of £9 allocated upon said area or plot of ground by the superior and party in right of the ground-annual, or provided the pursuer shall in the disposition to be granted by him warrant the defender against the ultimate payment of a larger sum than £9 per annum; and before further answer appoints the cause to be enrolled that the pursuer may state in what manner he proposes to implement his obligation in reference to said feu-duty and ground-annual; meantime reserves all questions of expenses." *

* "NOTE.—The circumstances in which this action has been raised are fully explained by the findings in the first branch of the foregoing interlocutor. The defender in purchasing the subjects plainly relied on the pursuer's statement in the advertisement that the feu-duty was £9; and he is not said to have known that this was an unallocated part of a cumulo feu-duty and ground-annual of £46, 19s. which affected the entire subjects of which the plot or area purchased forms a part. Indeed, the pursuer himself avers that the defender made his offer without either seeing the titles or applying for information to the pursuer's agents, to whom reference was made in the advertisement. The pursuer, however, maintains that the defender is bound to accept a disposition of the lands without any allocation of the feu-duty and ground-annual being made, or without any obligation being granted by the pursuer to relieve him of the surplus feu-duty and ground-annual, and that if the defender refuses to accept such a disposition the bargain must be cancelled. I am of opinion that none of the pursuer's contentions can be sustained. The statement in the advertisement was, in my opinion, a warranty by the pursuer either that the subjects were free from all annual prestation, such as feu-duty or ground-annual, except to the extent of £9 per annum, or that he (the pursuer) would free them of all such liability beyond that sum. And I am farther of opinion that the pursuer is not entitled to have the contract cancelled. He has not stated any relevant case to support such a demand, and his own statement of the transaction between him and the defender implies that by the offer and acceptance he became bound to hand over to the defender 'Jane Villa' free from all feu-duty, &c., beyond £9. And the pursuer is bound to implement that obligation either by obtaining a proper allocation of the feu-duty and ground-annual before the defender pays the price, or by inserting in the disposition a proper clause of relief. The defender is willing to settle the transaction on either footing, and if an allocation cannot be procured he will be content with the insertion in the disposition of a clause binding the pursuer and his representatives in warrandice against the ultimate payment of a larger sum than £9 per annum. This I think a most reasonable proposal—and the case is ordered to be enrolled that the pursuer may state which alternative he proposes to adopt. The present case is in all material points ruled by the decision in Paton v. Steuart, 11th March 1825, 3 Sh. 457. No question has been raised by the parties, or can, in my opinion, properly arise between them, in reference to the duplication of the cumulo feu-duty and ground-annual. The defender must be held to have purchased the subjects on the footing that they were liable to the casualty of composition either taxed or untaxed, and it

Nisbet v. Smith.

The pursuer obtained leave to reclaim.

Argued for him;—The advertisement was merely descriptive; there was no warrandice that the purchaser should in no case be called on to pay more than £9. Although not technically correct, the statement in the advertisement was substantially true. All that the seller undertook to do was to place the purchaser in the same position as himself. In point of fact the seller did pay £9 of what, in popular language, was known as feu-duty, and he had never paid more. The advertisement expressly referred intending offerers to the title-deeds in the hands of the seller's agent. A glance at the titles would have shewn the precise state of matters. The titles must be held to be imported into the offer and acceptance. If the purchaser did not choose to examine the titles he must take the consequences. Even if there was misrepresentation on the part of the seller it was unquestionably innocent misrepresentation, and the purchaser's remedy was restitutio in integrum. The seller had done all that could be required of him in any view by offering to relieve the purchaser of his bargain. The Court could not re-form the contract for the parties.[1]

Argued for the defender;—There was an implied warranty that the purchaser was not to be subjected to liability beyond £9 a-year, whereas the property was primarily liable in a yearly burden of £46, 19s. The case could not be dealt with as one of mutual error, as the pursuer must be held to have been acquainted with his own titles. The case was ruled by Paton v. Steuart.[2]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case has been ably argued, and my opinion varied during the course of the discussion, but I have now come to the conclusion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is wrong, and ought to be recalled.

It has been assumed by the purchaser here, too confidently, that the offer, acceptance, and advertisement not only made a concluded contract, but contained all the conditions of it. I think differently. The advertisement contains a description of the house and offices in popular language, and then it adds these words:—"For further particulars apply to Mr Buchan," the seller's agent, "in whose hands are the title-deeds and articles of roup." I cannot take it off the purchaser's hands that he never looked at the titles. He must be held to have accepted the property under all the conditions which the titles alone could accurately disclose. Now, here, if the titles had been consulted a single glance would have shewn either the purchaser or his agent the true state of matters as to the feudal burdens. They would have seen that the feu-duty could not be in any sense £9—the feu-duty was £32, 19s., and there was also a ground-annual of £14 per annum. The state of the titles was this,—Sir John Maxwell of Pollok feued out a piece of ground to James Connell for a cumulo feu-duty of £32, 19s. Connell entered into a contract of ground-annual with Peter Thomson, whereby he disponed to Thomson 3 acres 2 roods of his feu for a ground-annual of £14 per annum, Thomson and his heirs and successors being taken bound to pay also a proportion of the feu-duty exigible from the whole subject corresponding to the extent of the subjects disponed. Thomson disponed an acre of his ground to Menzies under similar obligations, and Menzies disponed it to Robertson, who in his turn disponed it to Nisbet, and that is the piece of ground which, along will remain for himself to arrange, after the disposition is finally completed and delivered, for the allocation of the said duplications, if he can prevail upon the superior and party in right of the ground-annual to make the same."

with the house, &c., thereon, forms the subject of the present dispute. On the face of the title, then, it appears that the subjects may be held primarily liable for a cumulo feu-duty of £32, 19s. and a ground-annual of £14, which are exigible proportionally from the whole piece of ground originally conveyed. The question comes to be, was there any intention to make this sale take place under any other conditions? When the party advertising his property says in his advertisement that the titles are in the hands of his agent, and gives that agent's address, the purchaser is bound either to look at these titles or to accept the feudal conditions which they express. An advertisement is usually popularly expressed, and must not be strictly construed as if it were a legal document.

But even if the titles did not enter the contract, the construction attempted to be put upon the contract by the defender is far from being clear. When, in the advertisement, we find the words "Feu-duty £9," that may mean nothing more than that "the seller pays £9," and so he did—£5 of feu-duty and £4 of ground-annual. The seller says that he never meant to put the purchaser into a better position than himself, and the words may not imply more. It is usual for a superior, when he feus out a piece of ground which is to be again separated into different stances, to retain a right to hold any one of the stances liable for the whole, with proportional relief. The seller here actually did pay £9 of feu-duty in the ordinary and popular sense. If he had paid more the case would have been quite different.

The seller alleges that in putting £9 into the advertisement he meant to say that he paid only £9. The purchaser says he understood him to mean that no more could be exacted. But the advertisement does not say so. There seems to me to be an innocent mistake on each side, which might entitle parties to rescind the contract, but the purchaser will not do this.

On the whole matter, I think, (1) that the titles were imported into the bargain, and (2) that the advertisement held out only that the proportion effeiring to the lands was £9, which was true.

Lord Neaves.—The Lord Ordinary's views in this case appear to me to be a great deal too strict, and not in accordance with the natural construction of the transaction. The advertisement, as far as I can see, is bona fide; it gives a short-hand description of various things. Thus, among others, we have "feu-duty £9." That is not a complete sentence; it is a mere indication of what is meant. And when the titles are referred to in the same advertisement as to be found in the agent's office, I think a party appealing to the advertisement and building a claim on it is straining the law too far when he construes it as the buyer here proposes. No doubt ground-annual is not feu-duty, but is it to be held that the purchaser, who perhaps does not like ground-annuals, could insist on its being converted into feu-duty? That seems out of the question.

A reference in an advertisement like this to title-deeds in the hands of an agent residing in the same town with the parties seems quite sufficient to discharge the seller from being more minute in his description than he was here, and puts it on the purchaser to go and see the titles for himself.

But what does the defender here say was his understanding of the statement in the advertisement? He says he took it for a statement of the existing condition of the property as burdened with £9, and no more. If it turned out that that statement was not true I can understand the buyer might refuse to go on, and in certain circumstances there might be a good deal to say for him. But he does not do that; he says the advertisement brings the seller under an obligation to make the land liable for only £9 in all time coming. We cannot compel a seller to enter into such an arrangement, which is not within his individual power, but depends on the will of the superior. Such a change indeed would have the effect of making this a new property altogether, because the seller would need to purchase an exemption for it from the superior, otherwise we are to insert in the disposition a personal obligation on the seller and his heirs for ever to relieve this purchaser and his heirs. Where the seller is at least equally innocent with the purchaser I am not prepared to subject the seller to such serious consequences. I would rather consent to set aside the contract altogether if that were desired, but I cannot approve of ordering anything so serious and complicated as is here demanded, and which, in its proper form, is not simply or naturally within the seller's power.

LORD ORMIDALE concurred.

LORD GIFFORD.—I have felt some difficulty in this case, and although I concur in the result reached by your Lordships I do not do so without some difficulty, and I prefer to rest my judgment, not on the general ground relied on in argument, but on the special circumstances of this case.

My difficulty is increased or confirmed by the case of Paton v. Steuart, because if it turned out that the £9 stated by the seller as the feu-duty of the subject sold were less (and it might be greatly less) than the purchaser would have to pay if these burdens, both of feu-duty and ground-annual were allocated, then the decision of Paton v. Steuart would apply, and the purchaser would be entitled to insist that the seller shall relieve him of all ultimate feu-duty and ground-annual in excess of the declared sum of £9. But I do not think that this specialty arises here. The case is not a complicated one. It is quite common in the case of suburban feus that the whole ground on which many villas or many tenements are erected is liable or subject to a cumulo feu-duty as regards the superior, which cumulo feu-duty is secured over the whole ground and leviable from any part of it, but the proprietor who pays is entitled to rateable and proportional relief against the other parts of the cumulo subject. Sometimes there may be an allocation inter se among the feuars which is not binding on the superior, who cannot be compelled, without some special contract, to give up any part of his cumulo security. This catholic liability for a cumulo feu-duty is a very common incident of villa or suburban property. I do not think the purchaser is entitled to be relieved from this incident; all he can ask is, that ultimately, and after all relief is had, he shall not pay more than £9. Now, the whole subjects here are as nearly as possible liable for £5 per acre of feu-duty. £14 of ground-annual was laid on about 3 acres odds, which is about £4 per acre. The ground in dispute is one acre in size, so the whole burden on it, both of feu-duty and ground-annual, is £9, which is what has been actually paid hitherto by the seller, and so if there was an allocation by the superior and holder of the ground-annual the share falling on this villa would be just £9, being the exact sum mentioned in the advertisement and missive of sale. Now, I think the purchaser can ask no personal guarantee from the seller. He must just take the seller's position, and have the relief which the seller had. If the purchaser could say, as happened in Paton v. Steuart, that after all claims of relief are exhausted he will remain finally and ultimately liable for far more than £9, the case would be different, and I am not prepared to say that the purchaser would have no relief except giving up his purchase.

But no question of this kind arises here. The statement in the advertisement that the feu-duty is £9 is true, for if an allocation were entered into and sanctioned by the superior and ground-annual renter £9 sterling and no more would be all the proprietor would have to pay.

All that the seller here can be asked to do is to put the purchaser in his place. I cannot hold that in every sale of a house where the feu-duty is part of a cumulo feu-duty affecting the ground on which many houses are built, and where the cumulo feu-duty on the whole subjects has not been allocated or apportioned, that a personal guarantee on the part of the seller should be necessary which may endure for ever.

I put the case, then, on this ground, that the advertisement here only represented that the ultimate burden on the subjects will be £9 after all other subjects have paid their share, and after claims of relief are made good; and this representation being strictly true, the agreement cannot be set aside, and the purchaser can only claim a disposition in the usual terms without any special and permanent guarantee.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the said interlocutor: Repel the defences, and decern in terms of the first conclusion of the summons: Find the defender liable in expenses."

WILLIAM BROWN, Petitioner and Appellant.—Kinnear—A. J. Young.
ADAM M'CONNELL, Respondent.—Asher—Goudy.

Proof—Custom—Proof of what generally happens is not necessarily proof of custom.—On 19th February 1875 William Brown, an innkeeper at Dalmellington, presented a petition to the Sheriff of Ayrshire against Adam M'Connell, a neighbouring farmer, for the delivery of a horse, alleging that in December previous M'Connell had got the horse from him on the footing of M'Connell having the benefit of the animal's services for his keep, and restoring the horse when required, and that M'Connell refused to deliver up the horse although requested to do so.

M'Connell stated in defence that there was an express contract between him and the petitioner that the horse should not be taken back till the end of April, and he further alleged that it was a recognised custom in the district for hotel keepers and coach proprietors to send out horses to farmers about the beginning of winter, to be kept during the winter and spring, and to be used only for farm purposes, the farmer feeding and keeping them in consideration of the work got out of them; that the respondent had got scarcely any work out of the horse in question; and that he would not have taken the horse except on the footing of getting his work in spring in return for his keep in winter. He offered to return the horse on payment of his keep for the period which had elapsed.

The Sheriff-substitute (Orr Paterson) sustained the defence, and the Sheriff (N. C. Campbell) adhered.

Brown having appealed to the Court of Session, the Second Division were of opinion that M'Connell had failed to prove either the express agreement or the custom alleged by him, and that the contract was terminable at the pleasure of either party, and recalled the Sheriff's interlocutor, Lord Gifford observing,—"A proof of what generally happens is not necessarily a proof of usage. It may be that a horse sent in November or December is often not taken back till the end of April, but what I desiderate is some proof to the effect that horses have been demanded back at an earlier period and refused, or that parties giving out horses have been obliged to hire instead of sending to the farmers for their own horses, and so to fix a custom that the owner of the horse in such a case has no right to re-demand it sooner than April."

Leith Heritages Co. v. Edinburgh and Leith Glass Co.

Property—Disposition—Warrandice.—A having sold to B in 1874 certain subjects under a minute of agreement, granted a disposition in which he disponed "all and sundry those parts of the property" of the seller, "situated on the north side of S. Street, . . . with the whole privileges and immunities, parts, pendicles, and pertinents thereof, as the said subjects and others are described in the title-deeds thereof as follows, viz.—First, All and whole, &c. Seventh, All and whole that piece of ground, . . . with all right, title, and interest I . . . have therein, in virtue of an Act of Council of the Lord Provost and Magistrates of Edinburgh, bearing date the 3d day of September 1788, or otherwise, but that under the burden and conditions therein mentioned, my said disponees being to stand in my place; together with all right, title, and interest which I . . . had, have, or could anyways claim or pretend to the said whole subjects." The deed contained a clause of absolute warrandice. B's title to the seventh subject having been disputed, and the magistrates having refused to grant a charter, he raised an action against A for payment of £10,000 as the estimated value of this seventh subject to him. It appeared that the dispositive clause used by A was the same as that in two previous conveyances of the subjects,—that in the one case the clause of warrandice had been restricted as regarded the subject in dispute, and in the other it had been expressly excluded from the obligation to infeft. B's agent admitted that when preparing the disposition he had become aware that A had no feudal title to the subject. Held that A had only undertaken to put B in his place, and had neither disponed nor warranted the subject to B.

Warrandice—Reparation.—Opinions, That, in considering a claim of damages for breach of warrandice, the Court is entitled to look beyond the technicalities of conveyancing language, and to refuse the claim if it shall appear that the bargain, as the parties understood and intended it, was fulfilled.

tion, the Leith Heritages Company (Limited) purchased from the Edinburgh and Leith Glass Company certain subjects in Salamander Street, Leith, for the price of £52,000. The missives were, in October 1874, embodied in a minute of agreement, of which the following were the most important provisions:—"First, The first parties agreed to sell and the second parties agreed to purchase, at the price of £52,000 sterling, the whole ground and buildings thereon belonging to the first parties, situated on the north side of Salamander Street, Leith, being the whole subjects disponed in a disposition dated 24th December 1852, granted by James Hill, merchant in Edinburgh, as trustee for the society or company established under the firm of the Edinburgh and Leith Glass Company, in favour of . . . as trustees of the said society or company, with the exception of the subjects lying to the south of the said Salamander Street. . . Third, Upon payment of the price, the first parties shall deliver to the second parties a formal and valid disposition of the subjects, subject to the conditions contained in the titles and in any current leases, and which disposition shall contain all the usual clauses, including a clause of absolute warrandice, and the first parties shall also deliver to the second parties a search. . . . Fourth, . . . And it is agreed that the second parties shall accept the title as it now stands, and shall not be entitled to require the first parties to enter with the superiors of the said subjects, nor to make up any further titles to the same, without prejudice to the second parties, at their own expense, having right to make up further or other titles in the person of the first parties, if the second parties think proper to do so."

On 10th November 1875 Dr Combe, the sole surviving trustee of the Glass Company under the disposition of 1852 referred to in the minute of agreement, on the narrative of that minute of agreement, conveyed the subjects as follows:—"I, as sole surviving trustee foresaid, and as authorised as aforesaid, do hereby sell and dispone to the said The Leith Heritages Company (Limited) and their assignees, heritably and irredeemably, All and Sundry those parts of the property of the said Edinburgh and Leith Glass Company situated on the north side of Salamander Street, Leith, with the buildings and others thereon, and with the whole privileges and immunities, parts, pendicles, and pertinents thereof, as the said subjects and others are described in the title-deeds thereof as follows, viz.," (here follows descriptions of six subjects). . . . . "Seventh, All and Whole that piece of ground lying betwixt David Stewart's feu on the east and the road on the east side of the property in the fourth and fifth places hereinbefore disponed, with power to alter said road so as to be immediately to the west of David Stewart's feu, with all right, title, and interest I, as sole surviving trustee foresaid, have therein, in virtue of an Act of Council of the Lord Provost and Magistrates of Edinburgh, bearing date the 3d day of September 1788, or otherwise, but that under the burdens and conditions therein mentioned, my said disponees being to stand in my place; together with all right, title, and interest which I, as trustee foresaid, or the said Edinburgh and Leith Glass Company, had, have, or could anyways claim or pretend to the said whole subjects hereinbefore disponed."

The warrandice clause was as follows:—"And I, as trustee foresaid, grant warrandice from my own facts and deeds only; and I, as trustee foresaid, and as authorised as aforesaid, bind the said Edinburgh and Leith Glass Company in absolute warrandice."

This disposition was prepared by the purchasers' agents.

The Heritages Company, on looking into the title to the seventh lot, discovered that the Glass Company had no other claim or title to it than was contained in a minute of the town-council of Edinburgh,* dated 3d September 1788, but upon which no steps had followed, nor had any charter been granted.

The Heritages Company then applied to the town-council of Edinburgh to grant them a charter in terms of the minute of 1788, but this the town-council refused to do. The company proceeded to enclose the subjects in dispute, but were interrupted by the local authority of Leith, who claimed the subject as their property for behoof of the public. The extent of the ground in dispute was 118 feet frontage to Salamander Street, and about 166 feet of depth; a causewayed road 16 feet wide ran through the space giving access to the shore of Leith, but otherwise the ground was waste. The Heritages Company intimated to the Glass Company that they had not been allowed to take possession of the ground, and the Heritages Company raised this action against them, concluding for "£10,000."

In their condescendence the pursuers stated;—The whole of the subjects sold to the pursuers extend to about 5 acres, so that the value of the said portion, taken rateably, would be £4203. But as the western portion of the ground is much more valuable than the eastern portion, in consequence of its position being immediately contiguous to the new docks, its value cannot be stated at a lower sum than £10,000.

The pursuers pleaded;—The pursuers having purchased the said piece of ground from the defenders under a disposition containing absolute warrandice, and having been evicted therefrom, they are entitled to decree for the sum concluded for as the value thereof.

The Glass Company defended the action, and maintained that they had conveyed all that they possessed, and that they had warranted nothing more. They averred;—(1) During the last century two glass-works were established. The works were separated by an open piece of ground, which formed an access from the Leith and Musselburgh Road (now called

"REPORT.—Edinburgh, 3d September 1788.—The shore-dues committee report that they, having considered the petition, and visited the ground, are of opinion that upon the petitioners relieving the council of any claim of the present possessors, or any others deriving right from Mrs Waddel, that the council should feu to them all the ground lying betwixt Mr Stewart's feu on the east and the road on the east side of the petitioners' property, to commence from and after the term of Martinmas next, they paying therefor in proportion as David Stewart, Esq., paid for the ground feued to him, and in that event that the said road should be altered so as to be immediately to the west of Mr Stewart's feu, to lay the whole of the petitioners' ground together.

"And authorised a charter to be made out in favour of the Edinburgh Glass-house Company upon the conditions mentioned in the said report."

Salamander Street) to the sands. The ground on which the said works were built, as well as the ground between them, prior to the granting of the feu-rights applicable to the said ground, belonged to the magistrates of Edinburgh. (2 and 3) On 29th February 1788 the said Edinburgh Glass-house Company presented a petition to the city, setting forth—(The petition and Act of Council here narrated are quoted supra, p. 791). (4) The Edinburgh Glass-house Company never obtained any charter applicable to the said piece of ground, nor was any feu-duty ever paid in respect thereof, nor any exclusive possession obtained of it, the whole vacant space between the two glass-works having remained open as before, while the glass-works were both enclosed on all sides with walls, by gates in which (or at all events by a gate in the wall at the east of the Edinburgh Glass-house Company's property) access was obtained to the said open space of ground. (9) As this description (in the pursuers' offer) comprehended the vacant space between the said glass-works, to which the defenders' company had no feudal title, and of which they were not in possession, the directors instructed their agents, in accepting the said offer, to intimate to the pursuers' agents that the said ground was not included in the sale; and the defenders' agents, Messrs Gillespie and Paterson, W.S., in their acceptance, dated 16th February 1874, of the said offer, wrote as follows:—"We ought to mention that as regards the boundaries of the property given by you it is to be kept in view that there is a public road or street between the east and west works of the company, which is not their property, and of course is not included in the sale." The whole of the said vacant space was at the said date open and subjected to the uses of a public road or street, and was the ground referred to in the said letter. (10) Before the transaction was closed the pursuers were thus distinctly made aware that the defenders did not profess to sell to them the said piece of vacant ground, and after this knowledge had been distinctly conveyed to them (if they had it not before), the pursuers, by their agents, of this date (Feb. 17, 1874), by indorsation upon the defenders' agents' letter of the previous day, agreed to the terms therein expressed, as follows:—"On behalf of the offerers we accept the conditions within mentioned."

The Glass Company produced conveyances of 1826 and 1852 of the same subjects, in which words identical with those in the disposition of 1875 under consideration were used with regard to the disponing of the subjects in dispute, the clause of warrandice in the conveyance of 1826 being as follows:—"We, the said John Geddes, John Arthur Borron, and John Hyslop and Charles Ferrier, bind and oblige ourselves, as trustees foresaid, to warrant from our own proper facts and deeds allenarly, and we, the said John Geddes, John Arthur Borron, and John Hyslop, as trustees foresaid, bind and oblige the heirs and representatives of the said William Geddes to warrant the same at all hands and against all mortals as law will, with the exception of the area of ground last above disponed contained in the said Act of Council, 3d September 1788, which is hereby warranted from the facts and deeds of us and our predecessors only." In the disposition of 1852 the obligation to infeft was in the following terms:—"And I oblige myself to infeft the said William Henry Brown, James Scarth Combe, and John Mackie, and their foresaids, as trustees foresaid, in the several subjects hereinbefore disponed, excepting the piece of ground last hereinbefore described, in which I am not myself infeft,"—the piece of ground there referred to being the subjects in dispute. The warrandice clause bore—"And I grant warrandice from fact and deed."

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The action cannot be maintained, in respect that upon a sound construction of the disposition in favour of the pursuers no absolute right to the ground in question is disponed, but only any right which the defenders' company had, and the clause of warrandice does not warrant an absolute title to the said ground. (3) Separatim, the action cannot be maintained, in respect that prior to the completion of the contract of sale the pursuers were made distinctly aware that the defenders did not profess to sell the said ground, and that the pursuers concluded the contract of purchase and sale in this knowledge.

The Lord Ordinary allowed a proof, in the course of which the defenders adduced some evidence to the effect that the whole piece of ground in dispute had been for a long period used as an access from Salamander Street to the shore. The pursuers' agent (Mr Neilson, W.S.) admitted that before the execution of the disposition he was aware that the defenders had no feudal title to the subjects in question.

On 24th November 1875 the Lord Ordinary assoilzied the defenders.*

The Heritages Company reclaimed, and argued;—The true question in dispute was the legal effect of the dispositive words, and of the clause of warrandice. Under the words in the deed the defenders gave a disposition to the land itself, and not merely to any right they might have to it. The clause of warrandice was quite general, and came into operation as soon as it was found out that there was no title to any part of the subjects warranted. It was incompetent to look at the missives, now that they had been embodied in a final deed, such as this disposition,[1] and if that were so, parole evidence as to the knowledge and intention of the parties was still more incompetent.[2] But even if it was competent,

* "NOTE.—The question is, whether the piece of ground referred to in condescendence 4, and marked on the plan as No. 7, was sold to the pursuers by the defenders under a warrandice of title, and I am of opinion that it was not. The ground, which is situated between the east and west works of the defenders, has always been open ground—part being used as a road and part left waste. The defenders had no right to it, other than the minute of council of 3d September 1788, quoted in statement 3, and never professed to have any other. This was of course no title; but such precarious right (and it was literally a precarious right) as this minute gave they passed to the pursuers exactly as it had been passed to them. I do not assent to the argument by which the conveyance under the 7th head of the disposition is otherwise construed, and am of opinion that to construe it as an ordinary absolute conveyance of the ground, subject to the warrandice, would be unjust and contrary to the meaning and intention of the parties. Taking the contract of sale as it stood on the offer and acceptance prior to the disposition, I am of opinion that there was no contract for a sale of this ground with warranty of title, and the purchasers' agent admits that when he prepared the disposition he knew that the sellers had no title to it, or other right than the minute of council. Whether at this stage (prior to the disposition), the buyers might have resiled from the bargain because of no title to this piece of ground I have not to consider; but to take the disposition (so peculiarly expressed) in the knowledge that there was none, and with an undisclosed view to an action of damages founded on the terms of the disposition as warranting a title, is a proceeding I am unable to approve of. The pursuers knew (their agent certainly did) that the disposition was not executed in that view of its meaning and effect. The striking peculiarity in the terms of the deed as regards this piece of ground relieves me of any difficulty which I might otherwise have felt in rejecting the pursuers' claim, but I desire to say that, in considering a claim of damages, the Court is, in my opinion, entitled and bound to look beyond the technicalities of conveyancing language, and to refuse the claim if it shall appear that the bargain, as the parties understood and intended it, was fulfilled."

the defenders took no benefit from the reservation of the road in the acceptance, because there was a road to which the pursuers did not lay claim, and also the titles could not disclose that there had been no prescriptive possession on the Act of Council of 1788. With regard to the Lord Ordinary's observations as to the peculiarity of the words used being such as should have put the purchasers on their inquiry, these expressions had been used in every conveyance of the subjects, and were thus, so far from peculiar, the ordinary words with regard to these subjects.

Argued for the defenders;—The whole dispositive words were qualified by the words "my disponees being to stand in my place." All that the sellers undertook to do was to put the purchasers in their place, and this they had done. All that was conveyed and warranted was the foundation of a claim. It was competent to look behind a final deed in such an action as this, not to make a different bargain, but to ascertain facts.[1] The ground in dispute was clearly proved to have been waste ground, and used as an access to the shore. It had been intended to be excluded from the conveyance, except in so far as the purchaser might care to attempt to acquire it by getting a title.

LORD GIFFORD.—I have felt this case to be attended with very great nicety and difficulty, but ultimately, and with some hesitation, I have come to concur in the opinion expressed by the Lord Ordinary in his note to the interlocutor under review.

It appears to me that neither by the minute or agreement of sale of October 1874, nor by the disposition granted in implement thereof on 10th November 1875, did the defenders warrant and guarantee to the pursuers that the subject specially described as "seventh" in the dispositive clause, and marked upon the plan No. 10 of process as No. 7, should be the absolute property of the defenders, so as to give the defenders a claim of damage if, from any cause not imputable to the pursuers, the defenders should be unable to vindicate a title to that special subject or piece of ground.

The minute of agreement of sale is referred to and embodied in the final disposition, and must be read along with it. It is not superseded, as frequently happens, by the final deed, as preliminary correspondence is superseded by a written agreement ultimately executed. On the contrary, the agreement forms the narrative of the disposition, and the disposition bears to be implement of the agreement, and nothing more; and in order fairly to understand the true meaning and import of the disposition it must be read along with the agreement which it bears to carry out.

Now, by the agreement the defenders sell to the pursuers, not the seven specific subjects shewn upon the plan, putting each separate piece of ground upon the same footing, and warranting each and all alike to the purchasers. The property sold by the minute of agreement is quite differently specified. It is thus described:—"The whole grounds and buildings thereon belonging to the first parties" (that is, the Glass Company) "situated on the north side of Salamander Street, Leith," being the whole subjects disponed in a certain disposition of 1852, "with the exception of the subjects lying to the south of the said Salamander Street." In short, the defenders agree to sell to the pursuers all their ground and property on the north of Salamander Street, but not their property to the south of Salamander Street, and reference is made to the disposition of 1852 as the last title under which the sellers hold the subjects.

[1] Forlong v. Taylor's Executors, April 3, 1838, 3 S. & M'L. 177, Lord Chan. 210.

The final disposition in favour of the pursuers, in exact accordance with the minute of sale, dispones, not seven specific subjects specially described, but only "those parts" of the pursuers' property lying on the north side of Salamander Street, as "the same are described in the title-deeds thereof as follows," and then follow the descriptions of seven lots, virtually quoted from the old titles.

Now, on turning to the old titles, to the disposition of 1852 and to the previous disposition of 1826, and to the previous titles to the property, all of which were before the pursuers' agents when the final disposition was prepared, it is at once apparent that the defenders' title to the different lots or pieces of ground stood in different positions. In particular, it became apparent that the sellers, the Glass Company, had no feudal or heritable title at all to the open or waste piece of ground marked No. 7. That piece of ground had never been conveyed to the sellers, the Glass Company. It was not their property, in the strict sense of the word. The only right to or in that waste piece of ground, including the roadway, which was part thereof, was a minute of the town-council of Edinburgh, dated 3d September 1788, by which minute it appears that the town-council of that date agreed to feu to the Glass Company's predecessors that piece of ground upon certain conditions. No feu-charter, however, and no conveyance of any kind, had ever been granted by the town-council.

In these circumstances this piece of waste ground and roadway was in the defenders' titles, and in particular in the disposition of 1852, referred to in the agreement, dealt with quite differently from the other plots of land marked upon the plan. It was not conveyed simply as the property of the Glass Company, but was described by its boundaries, with this descriptive addition,—"With all right, title, and interest I, as sole surviving trustee foresaid, have therein, in virtue of an Act of Council of the Lord Provost and Magistrates of Edinburgh, bearing date the 3d day of September 1788, or otherwise, but that under the burdens and conditions therein mentioned, my said disponees being to stand in my place." I cannot read this very special clause as a mere conveyance of the granter's right, title, and interest in a subject absolutely conveyed. There is a general clause of right, title, and interest following the description of the whole subjects, and applicable to all of them, and this special clause must be something different. It seems to me to give the purchasers special warning that this minute of council of 1788 is the only title which the sellers hold to, or in virtue of which they have any claim upon the piece of waste ground in question, and it contains an express declaration that as to this piece of waste ground the purchasers are to stand in the seller's place, and to use their rights, but that nothing more is given. The sellers virtually say,—Our right to No. 7 is a mere minute of council, not a disposition—not an infeftment—and you, the purchasers, are simply to stand in our place. In short, I think, reading minute and disposition together, the thing given under the seventh head of description is not property, warranted at all hands, but a mere claim or right of action against the town-council of Edinburgh to implement their minute of 1788; and if, on any grounds not imputable to the sellers, it should turn out that, either on the ground of the long prescription, or on the ground of Sir William Rae's Act,[1] or on any other ground, the town-council are not now bound to grant a feu-charter of this piece of waste land, the purchasers must take their chance of this, for I do not think that the absolute warrandice, either in the minute of sale or in the disposition, warrants or guarantees to the purchaser that the claim for a charter shall be successful.

In an action of damages for breach of warrandice, or for breach of contract (and breach of warrandice is just breach of contract), I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the Court is not bound by any technical words in the final deed of conveyance, but are entitled to look to the whole contract, and to the circumstances in which it was entered into, in order to reach the real meaning and understanding of the parties, and to determine what the true bargain was, for breach of which damages are now claimed; and I concur in the result which the Lord Ordinary has reached.

LORD NEAVES.—I am of the same opinion. This case is a very peculiar one as to lot No. 7. The pursuers' case is founded upon the fact that absolute warrandice appears to be given in a certain part of the deed, and therefore they say it is in the same situation as if they got a conveyance to the subjects in the ordinary way, and that they must come against the sellers and warranters of the right in an action of damages. But I think we must look behind that, and I agree with the opinion which has just been delivered by Lord Gifford. The pursuers are taking no steps, such as their authors must have taken, in order to secure the title. There have been no proceedings against the town-council. A demand has been made, and a refusal or declinature has come, the town-council apparently deciding very much on the principle that Lord Mansfield advised the colonial Judge to act on—give your judgment, but never give any reasons. But it is quite plain that it was the duty of the pursuers to bring the town-council to the point on that subject, and if it then turned out that they were not getting this subject in consequence of some fault in the conduct of their authors,—the parties with whom they dealt,—they might have some claim. I say nothing about that just now. But it is quite plain that the proceedings must originate with that, because it is expressly declared that they are to stand in the place of these parties; and that means, that they must take the steps which they would have taken. But it has not been shewn to us that there has been any breach of contract, which is the foundation of the action, and consequently it does not appear that there can be any claim of damage.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I have come to the same conclusion, but I have felt even greater difficulty than Lord Gifford in arriving at that conclusion, more especially in consequence of the very absolute terms of the clause of warrandice. But before coming to that part of the case, I should like to say a word or two upon a point that was mooted in the course of the discussion,—I mean the matter of eviction. To say that there was eviction here, is, I think, altogether untenable. It is impossible to say so looking at the authorities on the subject, and at the understanding of lawyers. One cannot read the passage in Mr Erskine, ii. 3, 30, and in Bell's Principles, sec. 121, without seeing that. But I am satisfied that it is not necessary that there should be eviction, and, at all events, the question has not been raised, and it is not necessary for us to determine it. The defenders did not raise the question, and I can quite understand that this was for a very good reason, because they deny that they ever granted a disposition of lot 7. They say they never gave any absolute warrandice at all, because they never disponed the subject. In that view I think they were right not to raise the question of eviction, and I have only referred to it because I think there was a good deal of loose statement and argument on the subject. It is important to keep in view that this is an action of damages, and the first question is, what was the nature of the conveyance of lot 7, because when we have seen that, I think the difficulty in regard to the clause of warrandice may be overcome. Looking to the manner in which the dispositive clause applicable to lot 7 is expressed, I think it is in vain to say that there is not doubt and ambiguity as to its true meaning; and if so, we are entitled, on the authority of the Lord Chancellor in the case of Forlong v. Taylor's Executors, 3 Shaw and M'Lean, 210, to look beyond the dispositive clause, not for the purpose of controlling or altering it, but in order to ascertain its true meaning, it being in itself ambiguous. There are two things which we are entitled to look at for that purpose. We are entitled, in the first place, to look at the minute of agreement which preceded the disposition, the disposition having been granted in pursuance of that agreement. There is a very important clause in that minute of agreement which makes it quite clear that the subjects in lot 7 were not intended to be disponed as all the other subjects were disponed, and the title to that lot is expressly stated to consist of the minute of council, and nothing more was to be done in regard to that lot so far as the sellers were concerned. It is expressly stated that it was to be left to the pursuers to make up their title in any way they pleased. Mr Neilson gave explanations as to the word "title" which were to my mind quite satisfactory; and it might be very fairly said that all that was meant by Mr Neilson was, as he explains it, a feudal title, and nothing more. But he alludes to it in the second paragraph of his evidence as being a mere claim which he understood was to be conveyed so far as lot 7 was concerned. Now, that is exactly the conclusion to which Lord Gifford has come, and I concur with him, looking at the very peculiar way in which it is expressed, that there never was anything else but a mere claim, and that what was described by the sellers was the claim which was intended to be conveyed so far as that lot was concerned, and not the subject absolutely. I come next to deal with the clause of warrandice, and it is here that I feel the greatest difficulty, because, beyond doubt, the clause of warrandice is absolute. Nothing can be more complete or unqualified. And what creates the difficulty in regard to that clause all the more is that it necessarily must be absolute, because it covers and was intended to cover not only lot 7, but the other six lots about which there is no dispute, and in regard to which it must be conceded that absolute warrandice was given. But I can quite understand that in a construction of the disposition we must try to give a meaning to the clause; and I get over the difficulty chiefly by the consideration that the clause of warrandice never can of itself be looked at as giving anything that the clauses of disposition have not given. We do not find a conveyance in the clause of warrandice here in terms, nor could we expect to find a conveyance of anything in the clause of warrandice. It has reference to the other preceding clauses. Therefore, by the clause of warrandice, nothing more has been given than has been previously disponed. If I am right in my view of the dispositive clause as applicable to lot 7, we must necessarily give a qualified meaning to the warrandice clause so far as that lot is concerned. In that way, with very great difficulty, I have come to the conclusion that, in consistency with the whole tenor of the deed, we must hold that the warrandice was not intended to be greater than has been explained by my brother Judges. I had a doubt, but I do not know that there was much in it, whether the sellers here had not undertaken by the warrandice to guarantee the purchasers that they had at least taken action of some kind upon the minute of council of 1788 to prevent its falling by prescription,—to keep it alive in short. But that point was not stated in argument, and therefore we need not deal with it. On the whole case, I am disposed to concur with your Lordships in thinking that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is well founded in the circumstances, this being an action of damages, and that he has rightly assoilzied the defenders.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have found this case one of great difficulty, and have not arrived at a conclusion without hesitation. But, on the whole, I concur in the result, and for the most part in the reasoning also, of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and opinion.

Had this been an action on the part of the purchasers to rescind the whole transaction on the ground of mutual error, they would have stood in a more favourable position. But they decline, as they are entitled to do, to surrender their bargain, for very obvious reasons, and this action is simply one for damages for breach of contract—for the loss suffered by reason of a sufficient title to one part of the property purchased not being delivered to the purchasers, in terms of the obligation of absolute warrandice contained in the disposition by the sellers. The questions are,—First, Have the sellers broken their contract? and, Secondly, if they have, what damage have the pursuers thereby sustained? In this, as in every action of damages, we are entitled, as a jury would be entitled, to look all round the circumstances in which the demand is made, and ascertain the truth and substance of the pursuers' complaint.

The property, the want of which the pursuers complain of, is a plot of ground about 100 feet in breadth, partially occupied by a public road of uncertain width and position, and for the rest entirely waste. It lies between two larger blocks of ground on the north side of Salamander Street, in the town of Leith, to both of which the defenders have a feudal title, and on which their glass-works are built. This intermediate space belonged to the city of Edinburgh, and now belongs to the corporation of Leith as feudal proprietors; no one else ever had a feudal title to it; it never was occupied or possessed by the defenders, or any one else, as private property; and the only right which the defenders had to it was an Act or minute of the town-council of Edinburgh, dated in 1788, which at the date of the sale was 86 years old, and never had been acted on. All this was matter of notoriety, and was specially known to the purchasers when they accepted the title.

The agreement, which was the foundation of and warrant for the formal disposition, makes no mention of this ground. The property, which is the subject of it, is simply described as the whole ground and buildings belonging to the Glass Company, situated on the north side of Salamander Street, and this is what they agreed to sell with absolute warrandice. But the agreement does not specify of what this property consists; and if the ground in dispute was not the property of the defenders, there is nothing in the agreement which binds them to convey it.

Now, if the disposition ultimately executed, which was prepared as usual by the purchasers' agent, had simply contained a transcript of the title by which the defenders held this stripe of ground, as appearing from the conveyance to them, of which the purchasers' agent admits that he was fully aware, this question could not have arisen. There had been two transmissions of the right under the Act of Council since 1788,—one in 1826, and the other in 1852. The first, and by much the most important, was a conveyance by a trustee for a former Glass Company to trustees for the present defenders; and the terms of the conveyance are very material. It contains (first) a specific disposition of the other parts of the property under one dispositive clause; and then (secondly) under a separate clause of conveyance, it dispones and assigns the plot in dispute with all right, title, and interest, which the granter had under the minute of council of 1788, the purchaser being taken expressly bound to stand in the sellers' place. That this conveyance was only intended to give, and only gave, such right as the granter had, is made quite certain by the fact that this portion of the property is specially excepted from the obligation of warrandice in this deed of 1826, and no conveyancer could have read it without knowing that the right was imperfect. The second transmission in 1852 is immaterial. It merely hands on the right from one trustee for the defenders to another.

Thus, the sellers in the present transmission had no title but what the conveyance of 1826 gave them; and that conveyance gave them only such right as the granter of it had, and gave them no warrandice at all. In preparing the disposition on which the pursuers now found, the agent for the purchaser inserts verbatim the clause contained in the conveyance of 1826, but neglects to except this plot from the warrandice, and the pursuers now contend that the effect of this manifest blunder is to compel the sellers to give them an absolute title, which they knew the defenders could not give, and to pay them damages for the want of it.

I am of opinion that the demand is inconsistent alike with the true construction of the conveyance and with the good faith of the transaction.

As to the first, I am of opinion that, technically read, the clause of warrandice in the disposition only extends to such right as the disponers had under the 7th head of the description. It will be observed that the dispositive words of the conveyance do not apply directly to the property described under that 7th head. This description is only said narrativé in the deed to be the description in the older titles; and this statement is quite correct. But then the description in the old titles only described, as I have shewn, an imperfect, or, at least, incomplete right under an informal grant, the effect of which was known to be doubtful; and I imagine it imports no more in the present disposition. The sellers, therefore, only warranted that the purchasers should stand in their place, and to this they were bound absolutely, and to no more.

But, in the second place, on the good faith of the contract, which may, I think, rightly enter into our estimate of this demand for damages, the conclusive element to my mind is that the purchasers knew that the sellers held the incomplete right which they transferred without any warrandice of any kind from their own author, and on a title which shewed its nature on the face of it, and it would require very explicit words indeed to satisfy me that, with these title-deeds before them, and the manifest indications contained therein of the doubts to which this Act of Council was exposed, the sellers ever intended to give, or the purchasers ever supposed they were to receive, an absolute and warranted right to this ground. I am quite satisfied that the truth is the reverse, and must on both grounds repel this claim.

THE COURT adhered.

Pearson v. Ferguson, Davidson, and Co.

GEORGE PEARSON (M'All's Trustee), Pursuer.—Balfour—Keir.
FERGUSON, DAVIDSON, AND COMPANY, Defenders.—Trayner—MacLean.

Bankrupt—Bill—Security—Bankruptcy Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 79), sec. 111.—The 111th section of the Bankruptcy Act enacts that "all payments . . . by the bankrupt after the date of the sequestration . . . shall . . . be null and void; and the trustees shall be entitled to . . . any money so paid; . . . but if . . . the possessor of any bill or promissory-note which is payable by the bankrupt shall have received payment of his debt from the bankrupt in ignorance of the sequestration, and given up such bill, promissory-note, or security to the bankrupt, such person shall not be liable to repay to the trustee the amount so received unless the trustee shall replace him in the situation in which he stood, or reimburse him for any loss or damage."

The holder of a bill accepted by the bankrupt along with six other co-acceptors, and of a letter of guarantee of the debt granted by another person, received payment from the bankrupt after his sequestration on delivery of these documents. In an action for repayment by the trustee some months afterwards, held (rev. judgment of Lord Craighill) that an offer by the trustee to return the documents did not necessarily replace the defender in the situation in which he formerly stood so as to entitle the trustee to decree, but that inquiry must be made into the solvency of the co-acceptors and the guarantor at the date of the payment, and at the date of the offer, in order to discover whether the documents were of the same value at the latter date as at the former.

1st DIVISION. Ld. Craighill. M.

THIS was an action by George Pearson, trustee on the sequestrated estate of J. R. M'All, Edinburgh, against Ferguson, Davidson, and Company, timber merchants, Leith, for payment of £294, 1s. 2d.

The pursuer averred that M'All's estate was sequestrated on 5th February 1875. He further averred;—"On 8th February the bankrupt called, along with Mr William Ross Garson, S.S.C., on Mr P S Beveridge, S.S.C., Leith, and paid to Mr Beveridge, as agent for Messrs Ferguson, Davidson, and Company, timber merchants, Leith, the defenders, the sum of £294, 1s. 2d., being the sum of £289 contained in a bill drawn by William Brodie, accepted by the bankrupt and others, and endorsed to the defenders, with expenses. The said bill fell due on 3d November 1874. A receipt herewith produced* was granted by Mr Beveridge for the said sum. The money was paid to Mr Beveridge through the hands of Mr Garson, to whom the money was handed at the time by the bankrupt for that purpose. The said sum was part of the bankrupt's estate, and was illegally paid by him to the defenders."

He pleaded;—The sum libelled having been paid by the bankrupt to the defenders after the date of sequestration the pursuer is entitled to decree.

The defenders averred that the debt was guaranteed by a letter of guarantee by Brydon, a law-agent, and that, when "proceedings were about to be taken against Brydon on his letter of guarantee the defenders' agent was waited on at his chambers by M'All and William Ross Garson, S.S.C., who was then Brydon's partner in business. Mr Garson stated that he had come to retire said bill, and he paid the amount thereof to the defenders' agent, as also the amount of interest and expenses, all as set forth in said receipt. It is not the case, as stated by the pursuer, that on this occasion the money so paid was handed by M'All to Garson. Mr Garson took the money from his own pocket, and no money passed from M'All to Garson in presence of the defenders' agent. The defenders' agent understood at the time that the money was being paid as much in the interest of Mr Brydon as of M'All, but he knew nothing of the source from which the money had come, or who had provided it. The receipt for said sum was granted in the terms in which it is expressed at the request of Mr Garson, who stated that he wished the receipt to bear that the money was paid by a client of his, a Mr Mill." (Stat. 4) "The defenders have since ascertained that the estates of M'All were sequestrated on his own petition on 5th February 1875. The defenders knew nothing of this when said money was paid. No notice of said petition for sequestration or of the deliverance thereon had appeared in the 'Edinburgh Gazette' or any public print; and no notice of said sequestration did appear until the month of March, when such notices appeared under the authority of an interlocutor pronounced by the Second Division of the Court upon a petition, a copy of which is herewith produced and referred to." (Stat. 5) "The defenders, on said payment being made, delivered up said bill and extract registered protest thereon to Mr Garson, along with Mr Brydon's letter of guarantee for the same, and also subsequently, at the request of Mr Garson, revised an assignation of said debt, bill, and diligence, in favour of the said Mr Mill."

* The receipt was in these terms:—"Leith, 8th February 1875.—Received from George Mill, residing in Leven, Fife, the sum of £289, being amount contained in bill drawn by William Brodie upon Joseph R. M'All and others, dated 31st July last, at three months' date, with the further sum of £3, 12s. 3d. sterling of interest, and £1, 8s. 11d. of expenses of the diligence on said bill; and my clients, Messrs Ferguson, Davidson, and Co., shall be bound to grant an assignation of said debt to the said George Mill, or any one on his behalf, at his expense, and without recourse upon the said Ferguson, Davidson, and Co.,—the said payment having been made by Mr W. R. Garson, S.S.C.

They pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant. (2) The defenders having acted in perfect bona fides in the transaction in question, and having delivered up their said documents of debt in return for said payment, cannot now be called upon to make restitution of said sum. (3) The pursuer's statements so far as material being unfounded, the defenders are entitled to be assoilzied.

A proof was led. Besides the points more specially noticed in the Judges' opinions, there was evidence that Brydon was solvent at the time of the settlement, and had left the country since, and that two or three of the co-acceptors of the bill (six in number) had become bankrupt since the settlement, but no proof was led as to the solvency of any of the six at that time.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"In the first place, finds as matters of fact (1) that the estates of Joseph Robertson M'All, upon which the pursuer is trustee for the creditors, were sequestrated on 5th February 1875; (2) that the sum of £294, 1s. 2d., being the £289 contained in the bill referred to in the record and the relative expenses, was paid to the defenders through Mr J. B. Sutherland, of the firm of P. S. Beveridge, S.S.C., Leith, the law-agents of the defenders, on 8th February 1875; (3) that the said sum of £294, 1s. 2d. was so paid by the hands of Mr W. R. Garson, S.S.C., the agent of the bankrupt, in the presence of the bankrupt, and with the money of the bankrupt; (4) that at the time when the said payment was received as aforesaid the sequestration of the estates of the said Joseph M'All had not been gazetted, and both the defenders and their said agents were ignorant that it had been awarded; (5) that in exchange for the said payment there were delivered up by the said J. B. Sutherland the said bill, as well as the relative letter of guarantee and the receipt, both likewise referred to on the record; (6) that the said bill, letter of guarantee, and receipt, have been produced in the present process, and should the said sum of £294, 1s. 2d. be repaid to the pursuer, these documents, simul ac semel, will, according to the offer made by the pursuer at the debate, be returned by the pursuer to the defenders, that the defenders may be replaced in the situation in which they stood when the said sum, of which repetition is sued for, was received; and (7) that it has not been proved that any loss or damage which the defenders would have escaped had the said payment not been received, and the said documents not been delivered as aforesaid, has been, or, in case decree as concluded for be pronounced, will be sustained by the defenders: In the second place, finds as matter of law that the facts being as above set forth, the pursuer is entitled to recover the sum sued for, on condition that the said bill, the said letter of guarantee, and the said receipt shall, simul ac semel, be returned: Therefore repels the defences, and decerns the defenders to make payment to the pursuer of the said sum of £294, 1s. 2d., with interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from the date of citation, being the 3d day of July 1875, until payment, the pursuer upon receiving payment returning the said bill, relative letter of guarantee, and receipt to the defenders as their own proper documents: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "NOTE.—The present action is raised by the pursuer, as trustee in the sequestration of Joseph Robertson M'All, for repetition of the sum of £294, 1s. 2d., the contents of a bill and relative expenses due by the bankrupt, paid after his sequestration. The record has not been satisfactorily framed on the part either of the pursuer or of the defenders. The action really is rested on the 111th section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856;* but on the one hand the pursuer, in stating his case, overlooked the provision that a person in the position said to be occupied by the defenders 'shall not be liable to repay to the trustee the amount so received, unless the trustee shall replace him in the situation in which he stood;' and on the other hand, the defenders, in stating their case, omitted to refer to the condition that, even should they be so replaced, they are not liable in repayment, unless they shall be reimbursed 'for any loss or damage.' Things, however, were so far put right at the proof, and the cause must consequently be decided on the assumption that all the provisions of this section of the Act were in the view of the parties, and are to be taken into account in the decision. Three questions were raised at the debate. The first is, whether the sum received by the defenders was the money of the bankrupt? the second, Whether the defenders when they received the payment were ignorant of the sequestration? and the third, Whether the conditions on which alone the defenders can be held liable in repetition have been or can be fulfilled.

"As to the first of these questions, the Lord Ordinary entertains no doubt.

* 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, sec. 111,—"All payments and preferences or securities obtained by or granted to prior creditors, and all acts done or deeds granted by the bankrupt after the date of the sequestration and before his discharge out of or in relation to the estate (unless with the consent of the trustee) shall in the event of sequestration being awarded be null and void; and the trustee shall be entitled to such preference or security, and to any money so paid, deducting any expense bona fide incurred; but . . . if the possessor of any bill or promissory-note, which is payable by the bankrupt with recourse on other parties, or of a security for a debt due by the bankrupt, shall have received payment of his debt from the bankrupt in ignorance of the sequestration, and given up such bill, promissory-note, or security to the bankrupt, such person shall not be liable to repay to the trustee the amount so received, unless the trustee shall replace him in the situation in which he stood, or to reimburse him for any loss or damage."

The defenders reclaimed, and argued (1) on the proof, That the money paid was not proved to have come from the funds of the bankrupt. (2)

No. 129.

Pearson v. Ferguson, Davidson, and Co.

He thinks it proved that the money received by the defenders was the money of the bankrupt. All which was suggested in opposition to this view was a conjecture that the money might have come from Brydon, by whom payment of the bill had been guaranteed to Brodie, the drawer. But none of the facts which have been proved is corroborative of this supposition; and the way in which the settlement was effected is, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, real evidence that the sum received by the defenders did not come from Brydon. There is, as the Lord Ordinary thinks, only one conclusion for which there is warrant in the evidence, and this conclusion is, that the money was the money of the bankrupt.

"On the second question there was no controversy at the debate. The evidence indeed rendered controversy on this point almost impossible, and the consequence was that the counsel for the pursuer conceded that the cause must be decided on the footing that the defenders, as well as their agents, when they received payment of the sum of which repetition is sued for, were in ignorance of the sequestration of the estates of the bankrupt.

"The third question presents two points for consideration. The first is, whether by restoration of the documents to be returned, the defenders will be replaced in the situation in which they stood? and the second is, whether loss or damage of which they must be reimbursed has been proved? With reference to the former, the fact is, that the documents delivered up when the money was received by the defenders are to be returned, and this the Lord Ordinary thinks is all which, in this case, is necessary to replace the defenders 'in the situation in which they stood,'—taking these words in what the Lord Ordinary thinks their true acceptation. The counsel for the defenders indeed argued that inasmuch as Brydon, the granter of the letter of guarantee, had left this country in the interval, the defenders could not and would not be replaced in their former situation. But what was thus urged is, as the Lord Ordinary thinks, an argument misapplied. The facts relied on may or may not afford evidence that there is loss or damage which must be reimbursed, but they have no bearing on the question whether the defenders will, when repossessed of the documents which are to be returned, be replaced in the situation in which they stood. The defenders were creditors before; they are by virtue of the restitution of the documents which were the vouchers of their debt to become creditors again; and this the Lord Ordinary considers is all which is required to replace them in the situation to which, before they can be held liable in repetition, they must be restored.

"As to the condition relative to reimbursement of loss or damage, the Lord Ordinary thinks that loss or damage has not been proved, and consequently that the relative provision of the statute is not in this case brought into operation. The view upon this subject presented for the defenders was that recourse upon Brydon, which in February 1875 was open, is now cut off, and a consequence that the debt in question, which but for the payment received by the defenders might have been, cannot now be recovered from Brydon. The error which is here committed, as the Lord Ordinary thinks, lies in assuming that the adoption of proceedings against Brydon in February 1875 would have resulted in his payment of the debt. The facts of the case do not lead to this conclusion. His circumstances were, and for a time had been, embarrassed. Many of his obligations, events have shewn, were of a peculiarly embarrassing character. Day by day his creditors were becoming more urgent, and to escape from demands which he could not meet, and from proceedings which in consequence were about to be taken against him, he, about the middle of March, secretly left this country for America. The counsel for the defenders argued as if the defenders' diligence against him was at the beginning of February already ripe for execution. But this is a misapprehension. In the first place, the guarantee from Brydon had not at the time in question been assigned, though the letter containing the guarantee had been delivered to the defenders. And in the second place, the

On the 111th section of the Bankruptcy Act, That as they received the money in ignorance of the sequestration they were not bound to refund it unless they were replaced in the same situation in which they stood, or reimbursed for their loss and damage. There was no offer to reimburse them, and the re-delivery of the documents would not replace them in the same situation.

The pursuer argued that the re-delivery of the documents did, within the meaning of the Act, "replace" the defenders. Clearly it did so prima facie, and the defenders had led no evidence to shew that their position would be any worse.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It is no doubt a general rule that if a bankrupt pays a debt to a creditor after his sequestration the payment is invalid, and the trustee is entitled to recover it. But some exceptions are introduced by the 111th section of the Bankruptcy Act. The last of these is expressed in the following terms:—"If the possessor of any bill or promissory-note, which is payable by the bankrupt, with recourse on other parties, or of a security for a debt due by the bankrupt, shall have received payment of his debt from the bankrupt in ignorance of the sequestration, and given up such bill, promissory-note, or security to the bankrupt, such person shall not be held liable to repay to the trustee the amount so received, unless the trustee shall replace him in the situation in which he stood, or reimburse him for any loss or damage."

In the present case the pursuer has brought his action for repayment of this money simply on the footing that it was paid by the bankrupt in extinction of a debt after his sequestration. He was quite entitled to do so, if the case does not fall within the exceptions of the 111th section. But the allegations of the defenders introduce a new element. They explain the circumstances in which the payment was made. They point out that the discharge bears to be not to the bankrupt but to another person, and that the money was paid not by the bankrupt but by his agent, who, as they say, seemed to represent that it was another person who paid the money. They also aver that they did not know of guarantee did not render Brydon liable to summary diligence. An ordinary action was indispensable; and it seems to the Lord Ordinary to be certain that, in the natural course of events, decree would not have been obtained by the defenders in time for his incarceration upon it before the time at which he absconded. Things, therefore, so far as the defenders are concerned, appear to be in the same situation now as that in which they were at the time when the sum of which repetition is claimed was received by the defenders. In other words, this payment has not been shewn to be the cause of loss or damage which must be reimbursed.

"Brodie, the drawer of the bill, it may be added, and several of the acceptors, have become bankrupt since the beginning of February, but upon this circumstance little or no stress was laid by the counsel for the defenders. The fact is, that the persons referred to were as unable to pay their debts at the period in question as they were when their insolvency was avowed; and whatever may now be recoverable from their estates is as much as could have been recovered, if the defenders had continued in possession of the bill, upon which they were debtors.

"These are the views upon which the Lord Ordinary has come to the conclusion that there is no loss or damage of which the defenders must be reimbursed under the concluding words of the 111th section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, before being forced to repay the sum sued for in the present action."

the sequestration when the money was paid, no notice of it having appeared in the "Gazette" or any newspaper.

Now, payment having been made in return for the delivery of a bill on which not only the bankrupt but several other persons were liable, and also of a letter of guarantee, these allegations seem to bring the case within the operation of the 111th section, because the defenders were in possession of a bill payable by the bankrupt, with recourse on other parties, and also of a security, and they allege that they received payment in ignorance of the sequestration. They have also denied that the money came out of the bankrupt's funds. Though there are probable grounds for that denial, I think we may take it as proved that it did. But if the defenders' allegation that they received the payment in ignorance is proved, that is a good defence, unless the trustee should offer to replace them in the same situation as before, or reimburse them. He has made no such offer on record, and the clause of the Act does not appear to have been noticed till the case was debated on the proof. The defenders have averred that they were in ignorance of the sequestration, and I think that averment is sufficiently sustained by the evidence. There is no reason to doubt that they acted in perfect good faith.

In these circumstances we might, in strict justice, hold the defence to be established, and find that the pursuer cannot recover. But I am unwilling to take that course, and would rather desire that we should adjudicate between these parties according to their real rights. But unfortunately we are not in possession of the materials for the ultimate disposal of the case. I cannot agree with the Lord Ordinary that the trustee sufficiently complies with the condition of the statute when he offers to return the documents. It is too obvious for argument that documents which, at the date of the payment, were of considerable value, may be worthless now. There could be no better illustration of this than the letter of guarantee. The granter of it was a solvent party open to the diligence of the defenders. But when they had received payment the debt was extinguished, their hands were tied, and they could take no recourse against anybody. The granter of the letter is said to have subsequently absconded. But it is not said that he was insolvent. This seems conclusively to shew that returning the documents does not place the defenders in the same position, still less reimburse them; and besides, there were several co-acceptors who were not discussed, and whose solvency, either now or at the time of payment, is not cleared up.

It rather appears to me that the defenders having had these parties bound, are entitled to take their stand on the privilege conferred by section 111, and to say,—"You cannot replace me in the situation I was in by giving me the documents; you must do something more." It lies on the trustee to shew that the defenders were then in no better position, and could make no more of the documents than they can now. That would be a difficult matter to prove. I am not inclined to lay down any very absolute rule as to the onus probandi, but that there must be some inquiry is perfectly clear.

I shall be glad, if your Lordships agree with me, to hear what the parties propose as to the mode of inquiry, or whether they can ascertain the facts by arrangement without formal proof.

LORD DEAS and LORD ARDMILLAN concurred.

LORD MURE.—I concur in the exposition which has been given by your Lordship in the chair of the meaning of the 111th section of the Bankrupt Act. It would therefore, I think, be premature now to give decree in this action for repayment of money which was received from the bankrupt in payment of the bill by creditors, who are admitted to have been in entire ignorance of the sequestration when the money was paid to them, because the trustee, in respect of the express words of the statute, is only entitled to recover in such a case if it is shewn that the creditor has been restored to the same position with a view to the recovery of his debt as he was in at the time when the payment was made. At present this has not, I think, been done, and in the circumstances, as disclosed in evidence, the presumptions seem to be rather the other way. I agree, therefore, in thinking that there should be some inquiry.

Harbour—Usage—Notice—Bye-laws.—A practice had existed for four years at a harbour by which steamships coming to load coals had a preference over sailing vessels in getting the use of the cranes. The owners of the harbour altered this practice (which was not fixed by the bye-laws of the harbour) without notice, putting all vessels on an equality according to their arrival. In an action of damages by the owner of a steamship for detention, held that the owners of the harbour were entitled, as a matter of management, to alter the practice, and that without notice.

1st Division. Ld. Craighill. M.

This action was raised by George Moon and others, owners of the steamship "Nellie," of West Hartlepool, against the Caledonian Railway Company, as owners of Grangemouth Harbour, for damage caused by the detention of the vessel at the harbour in the following circumstances:—

For some years prior to October 1874 it had been the practice at Grangemouth Harbour to allow steam vessels a preference over sailing vessels at the cranes at which coals were shipped. On 12th October 1874 the defenders resolved that this practice should be discontinued, and on and after 13th October steam vessels were put on an equality with sailing vessels in the use of cranes.

The pursuers' vessel arrived at Grangemouth on 17th October 1874, and in consequence of the number of other vessels in the harbour, and of the change of practice, was detained till 28th October.

The pursuers averred (Cond. 3) that the "Caledonian Railway and Forth and Clyde Navigation Companies Act, 1867," had transferred the Forth and Clyde Canal with, inter alia, Grangemouth Harbour, to the defenders, they being bound to keep the same open to the public subject to the conditions of the Act 4th and 5th Vict. c. 55, an Act to consolidate the Acts relating to the Forth and Clyde Navigation. (Cond. 5) "By section 229 of the said Act 4th and 5th Vict. cap. 55, it is enacted,—'That it shall and may be lawful to and for the company, from time to time, to make such bye-laws as they shall think fit, for all or any of the following purposes (that is to say):—For governing or regulating the use of the said navigation, and of the harbours, basins, and other works belonging thereto or connected therewith; . . . for regulating the exercise of the several powers hereby vested in the harbour-masters, shore-masters, wharfingers, and other persons employed by the said company; for regulating the admission of vessels into the said navigation and harbour or basins thereto belonging, and their removal out of the same,' and for other purposes."

Moon v. Caledonian Railway Co.

(Cond. 6) " By the 231st and following sections of the said Act it was provided that no such bye-laws should be valid and binding unless confirmed by the Sheriff of Lanark; that they should not be confirmed unless notice of the intended application to him were first given in the newspapers a month before application; that during the said month, at least, a copy of the proposed bye-laws should be kept at the principal office of the company, open to the inspection of all persons; that such bye-laws, when confirmed, should be printed and hung up, inter alia, on some conspicuous part of the works of the harbour or basin at Grangemouth, when such bye-laws related to the said harbour or basin; and that such bye-laws, when so confirmed, should be binding upon and be observed by all parties, and should be sufficient to justify all parties acting under the same." (Cond. 7) " The defenders, in respect of the authority given by the said Act, have printed and published bye-laws (a printed copy of which was produced), bearing to be confirmed by the Sheriff of Lanarkshire, of date 21st January 1873. Inter alia, the said bye-laws provide,—' 15. Parties desirous of using the steam cranes must give notice at docks office two hours beforehand. 16. Vessels to be put on turn for steam cranes, when ready to use them, and load as ordered. 17. Application shall be made for a berth by the master of each vessel on arrival to the harbour-master (who shall assign to the different descriptions of vessels such berths as may appear to him proper in the circumstances), and from which berth the vessel is not to be moved without his permission. 21. No vessel shall be allowed to keep her berth in consequence of having taken in or discharged a portion of her cargo, but must give place to the next in turn, or to the vessel ordered by harbour-master.' " (Cond. 8) " For many years before the publication and confirmation of said bye-laws it was the rule and custom of the harbour of Grangemouth, acted upon and held forth as such by the defenders and their officers, that in arranging the turn at the steam cranes of vessels arriving in order to load a distinction should be made between steam vessels and sailing vessels. According to said rule and custom every steam vessel had a priority at the steam cranes over sailing vessels, even though these sailing vessels should have arrived and applied for their turn before it (unless they had actually commenced loading). When the said bye-laws were published and confirmed this rule and custom was understood by all parties concerned to be continued under them, and in particular to be implied and intended under the said 16th bye-law. Accordingly, the said custom and rule continued unbroken after the said bye-laws were published, as before, down to the day when the steamship ' Nellie ' entered the harbour as aforesaid. On or about that day the said rule and custom was, in the case of the ' Nellie,' innovated upon, violated, and set aside by the defenders, as aftermentioned, illegally, and without any previous advertisement or notice, or judicial authority or confirmation whatever."

The pursuers pleaded;—The pursuers having suffered loss and damage to the extent concluded for, in consequence of the unfair and illegal detention of their vessel by the defenders, or those for whom they are responsible, are entitled to decree, with expenses.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) Under the Acts of Parliament and bye-laws foresaid, the harbour-master was entitled to regulate the traffic of the harbour and to assign berths to the vessels arriving thereat, and the vessels so arriving were bound to enter the docks and to " load as ordered,"—at least so long as the harbour-master's orders were in conformity with said Acts of Parliament and bye-laws. (3) No undue preference having been given to any vessel over the " Nellie," the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

June 9, 1876. Moon v. Caledonian Railway Co.

The Lord Ordinary, after proof, pronounced this interlocutor, which fully brings out the facts and nature of the case:—"In the first place, finds as matter of fact (1) that the defenders are now, and since 1867 have been, the owners of the harbour of Grangemouth; . . . . (2) that for four years or thereby prior to October 1874 steamers were allowed a preference over sailing vessels at the cranes at which coals are shipped in the said harbour, but, irrespective of this preference, steam vessels arriving at the dock gates had not 'a preference in entering them over vessels already arrived;' (3) that on 12th October 1874 the defenders resolved that the preference over sailing vessels at the cranes, which, as aforesaid, had previously been allowed, should not be continued, and on and after the 13th October 1874 all steamers not already 'upon turn,' or not regular traders, were in consequence put on an equality with sailing vessels requiring the use of the cranes; (4) that the intention of the defenders to change the existing usage was not communicated, nor was there any publication of the order by which this change was effected before it was brought into operation; (5) that this change of usage was not an act of capricious administration, but, on the contrary, was resolved on and ordered in good faith, and in the belief that it would operate beneficially upon the trade of the port; (6) that the screw steamer 'Nellie,' of which the pursuers are the owners, was, on the 9th of the said month of October 1874, chartered to Messrs Hugh MacLean and Company, of Glasgow, by the charter-party, No. 6 of process, whereby it is, inter alia, provided that she should, 'with all convenient speed, sail and proceed to a loading berth at steam crane at Grangemouth, or as near thereunto as she may safely get,' and there take in a cargo of steam coal; (7) that, in terms of this charter-party, the 'Nellie' was subsequently taken to Grangemouth, where she arrived after five o'clock, and after custom-hours, on 17th October 1874; (8) that, on arrival, the master desired to take his vessel into the wet-dock, on the quays of which the coal cranes are placed, but his request to be allowed to enter at that time was refused by the harbour-master, on the ground that, as alleged, the space available for vessels in which coals were to be loaded was already filled with vessels, which, under the new regulations, were entitled to a preference over the 'Nellie' at the cranes; (9) that the reason thus assigned was true in point of fact; (10) that the 'Nellie' lay at the entrance to the dock till the morning of the Monday, 19th October 1874, when she was taken to and moored at the ballast quay, where, though put on turn for a crane berth on said 19th October, she was kept till the afternoon of the 28th of October, when her turn for the crane arrived, and when accordingly she was taken into dock and berthed at the crane No. 2, which is the larger of the two steam cranes in the harbour of Grangemouth, and that at which vessels of the size of the 'Nellie' are in use to be loaded; (11) that the 'Nellie' was, by the operation of the new regulations, detained at Grangemouth, and outside the dock, for eight days longer than she would have been so detained had her turn at the crane been regulated by the usage which was thereby changed; and (12) that this detention was the cause of loss or damage to the pursuers: In the second place, finds as matter of law that the defenders were entitled to fix the conditions on which the cranes in question were to be used, and the change made as aforesaid on the order or turn in which vessels were to be served having been resolved on and carried out in good faith, and, as the defenders believed, for the benefit of the trade of the port of Grangemouth, the loss and damage for which reparation is now sued for is not loss or damage resulting from fault on the part of the defenders, and consequently is not loss or damage for reparation of which the defenders are liable: Therefore sustains the defences, assoilzies the defenders, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses," &c.*

No. 130.

Moon v. Caledonian Railway Co.

* "NOTE.— . . . . The real question, as the Lord Ordinary thinks, is whether the change of usage, which had the effect both of keeping the 'Nellie' out of the dock and from the crane for eight days longer than what, but for this alteration, would have been the period of her detention for her cargo, affords to the pursuers, in the circumstances of the case, a good ground of action.

"The affirmative of this question is maintained by the pursuers, in the first place, because, as they say, the usage which existed prior to 12th October 1874 was the subject of a bye-law sanctioned by the Sheriff of Lanarkshire, and which, therefore, according to the 231st section of the 4th and 5th Vict. c. 55, being 'an Act to consolidate, amend, and enlarge the powers and provisions of the several Acts relating to the Forth and Clyde Navigation,' could not be altered without his authority. Undoubtedly, if the usage was the subject of a bye-law, it could not be altered without the authority of the Sheriff; but the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the usage relied on was not sanctioned by the bye-law to which the pursuers refer or by any bye-laws relative to the use of the harbour of Grangemouth. The bye-law on which the pursuers rely is No. 16 of the bye-laws, No. 31 of process, 'to be obeyed and observed by the masters of vessels and other persons resorting to and using the harbour of Grangemouth,' which were sanctioned by the Sheriff of Lanarkshire on 21st January 1873. The title shews that these bye-laws were intended not to bind the defenders to any existing usage, but to ensure, by the penalties, the recovery of which was authorised, the observance by the masters of vessels and others resorting to and using the harbour of the regulations sanctioned by the Sheriff. Apart from this, the words of the 16th bye-law are not reasonably susceptible of the pursuers' interpretation. It provides that vessels shall 'be put on turn for steam cranes when ready to use them, and load as ordered.' What vessels? Steamers or sailing vessels, or both? This question cannot be answered by a reference to the bye-laws. Something else must be referred to; and the pursuers argue that what is to be referred to is the usage which was in operation at the time when the bye-laws were sanctioned. The Lord Ordinary cannot, however, adopt this view of the matter. He thinks that the thing to be referred to is the rule which is in force at the time when vessels as alleged ought to have been put on turn for steam cranes. The power of the defenders to regulate the business of the harbour, and, in particular, to issue orders relative to the use of the cranes, is left unimpaired, and, as well after as before the passing of these bye-laws, such orders as were necessary for the good order of the harbour, or to increase the trade of the port, might, for anything in the bye-laws to the contrary, be from time to time given by the defenders. The Lord Ordinary therefore considers that the alterations in the usage which, for some time prior to October 1874, had been observed, was within their powers.

"The pursuers contend, in the second place, that even if the alteration was within the powers of the defenders, they were not entitled to bring the new rule into operation without reasonable notice. What is involved in this proposition cannot easily be defined or even conjectured. Reasonable notice to whom? To merchants or shipowners in Grangemouth, or to traders in Leith, Glasgow, London, or in Continental, or even in transatlantic ports? What would suffice for these in one place might not, and, indeed, probably would not, be 'reasonable notice' to others elsewhere. Nor is this all; vessels are chartered not for a voyage merely, but for a series of voyages, or for a specified period. Must all such cases be provided for before a change in the rule under which vessels shall be taken to the crane could be uniformly enforced? These questions are suggested merely to point out the difficulty, if not the impossibility, of fixing what would be reasonable notice. But, as the Lord Ordinary thinks, it is unnecessary to deal with, or at any rate to decide, this point. The statutes under which the administration of the harbour of Grangemouth is conducted create no duty, and impose no obligation, as to the giving of notice before new orders relative to the use of the harbour or its appurtenances may be put into operation. The discre-

LORD PRESIDENT.—There can be no dispute as to the right of the defenders to alter the practice, and there is no reason to doubt that they acted in the interests of the harbour, and those who frequented it. The suggestion that there ought to have been notice is at first sight plausible. But, when examined, it is found to be most unreasonable. Notice to whom? It would be quite impracticable to give notice to all the world, unless the defenders were to wait for years before bringing the change into operation. In my opinion this was a mere matter of management, quite within the powers of the owners, and, I should say, even of the harbour-master, unless he was precluded by the terms of his appointment.

tion of the defenders is left untrammelled, and if their conduct is neither partial nor capricious, but, on the contrary, was dictated by a desire for the benefit of the harbour, want of previous notice will not invalidate their orders. Nor is this a hardship to any one concerned. Shipowners presumably know the rights and the duties of the defenders in the premises, and consequently must be held to provide in their calculations for changes in the rules regulating the use of the harbour which may from time to time be adopted.

"The Lord Ordinary has observed that previous notice has not been rendered necessary by any of the statutes under which the harbour of Grangemouth was formed, or its administration is conducted. He thinks it right now to add, that some of the enactments seem to him to be inconsistent with the idea that such notice as that for which the pursuers insist was or could be contemplated. Take, for instance, the enactment in section 135 of the 4 and 5 Vict. c. 55, we find 'that it shall be lawful for the said company, when, and as often as they shall think proper, to run off the water from the said navigation for the purpose of repairing the same, or any part thereof.' Thus the canal or the harbour might be closed, traders possibly, if not probably, be put to inconvenience, or even subjected to loss, and yet there is no provision that any previous notice should be published. The only provision, it may be added, relative to notice rendered necessary before acts of ordinary administration by the owners of the harbour can be accomplished to be found in any of the statutes with which the Lord Ordinary is familiar is what is contained in the 64th section of 'The Harbours, Piers, and Docks Clauses Act, 1847.' It is there enacted, that 'whenever the undertakers shall deem it necessary, for the purpose of repairing, scouring, or cleansing the harbour, docks, or piers, that any vessel therein or thereat shall be removed therefrom, the master of such vessel shall, within three days after such notice in writing, signed by the harbour-master, given to him, remove such vessel according to such notice.' Notice to those interested in vessels outside the harbour is not required, and even to those in harbour the notice to be given is a premonition of only three days. From all which the inference, as the Lord Ordinary thinks, necessarily is, that the order issued by the defenders, of which the pursuers complain, was one which might lawfully be enforced when the pursuers' vessel arrived at Grangemouth on the evening of the 17th October 1874."

Lord Young. B.

THIS was an action by Nelson, Donkin, and Company, shipowners, Newcastle-on-Tyne, against Robert Bennet Browne and forty-nine others, all designed as underwriters in Glasgow. The conclusions of the summons were:—"The whole defenders above named and designed ought and should be decerned and ordained, by decree of the Lords of our Council and Session, to make payment of £60, 13s. 1d. sterling, being the sum due on a policy of insurance on the steamer 'Menzaleh,' executed at Glasgow the 14th day of February 1874, and that according to the several proportions for which the said policy was underwritten by them, viz. the sum of £1, 4s. 3½d. sterling each, together with the interest due thereon from 8th May 1875 till payment."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuers have no title to sue. (2) The present action is incompetent before the Court of Session, in respect the defenders have no joint liability in the premises, and the sum concluded for against each defender is less than £25 sterling.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the first and second pleas in law for the defenders: Allows the parties a proof of their respective averments, so far as not admitted: Appoints the proof," &c.

The defenders, having obtained leave of the Lord Ordinary, reclaimed, and argued;—There was no community of interest between the different defenders. They were each liable for £1, 4s. 3½d. if the pursuers succeeded in establishing their claim. Community of interest might enable parties to sue in the same action, but it would not make the action competent in the Court of Session.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a question not without some difficulty. I have had some doubt in the course of the discussion, but I have now come to be of opinion that this action is competent, and that the plea of the defenders is not well founded. It was undoubtedly competent for the pursuer to convene all the defenders in one action irrespective of the value of the cause. If each defender were liable for a sum exceeding the amount of £25 it would not admit of dispute that the action was competent against the whole of the defenders, because they are all convened as being obligants in one contract, and as all defenders in one single issue of fact.

That first point goes a long way to solve the question whether the circumstance of the liability of each individual defender being under £25 renders the action incompetent on the ground that it is for the recovery of a sum which is under the value of £25 as regards each defender separately. To make the action incompetent under the statute the sum involved in the cause must not exceed £25, and the question is, whether this case, inasmuch as it involves a sum which amounts only to £1, 4s. 3½d. to each of the defenders, is a case which is so excluded from this Court.

I am of opinion that this is not a case to which the statute applies. I think the value of the sum involved in the action is £60, 13s. 1d., because that is the amount of money which the pursuers will be entitled to recover if they are successful.

Nelson, Donkin, & Co. v. Browne, &c.

This is a question which has already been decided in the other Division of the Court in the case of Dykes v. Merry and Cuninghame, and if I had entertained any doubt as to the soundness of that decision I should have thought it proper to consult our brethren; but I have come to think that case well decided, and that we ought to hold in conformity with it that this action is competently brought in this Court.

LORD DEAS.—I am clearly of the same opinion. The conclusions of the summons are consistent with the pursuers' contention, and they must be looked at in the first instance. They are not conclusive of the question, but taken along with the fact which your Lordship has pointed out, that the defenders have a common interest, I think there is enough to leave no doubt upon the point.

As regards the position of pursuers suing together in one libel, the rubric in the old case of Gray (M. 11,986) is as follows:—"Found that different parties could not accumulate their actions in one libel unless they had connection with one another in the matters pursued for, or had been aggrieved by the same act." It has always, in my experience, been recognised as a rule, that if there is a community of interest or connection between several parties, they can sue together for a sum due to them all in their common capacity. In the same way, it is sufficient that a number of parties called as defenders shall all be connected together in reference to the defence. The present is the clearest possible case of that kind. The whole subject-matter of the action involves one single question of fact affecting the whole of the defenders. Nor are the consequences of our giving effect to the contention of the defenders, and the amount of litigation which would ensue, to be left out of view in this question of procedure. The action could not be laid in the Small Debt Court in one summons against the whole of the defenders, and the only alternative would be to bring an action against each, as a decision against one of the defenders would not be res judicata as against any of the others.

The decision in the case of Dykes v. Merry and Cuninghame, which was quoted to us, laid down the law quite accurately, and its soundness has not been doubted in the subsequent practice of the Court.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—There is no presumption against the jurisdiction of this Court, which must be sustained unless it be excluded by statutory law. The statute excludes from our jurisdiction certain cases in which the amount at stake is under a certain value. The question how that is to be ascertained is matter for adjudication by this Court, and the decision of this Court on the question of the ascertainment of value is no encroachment on the statute.

Here the value to the pursuers is something above £60. The next important consideration is that the parties called are all united as obligants in one contract, which, ex concessu, is binding on all if on any. There is nothing here to raise a doubt that the pursuer can recover the whole sum of £60, 13s. 1d. if he recover anything at all. Apart altogether from the case of Dykes v. Merry and Cuninghame, to which we have been referred, I should be of opinion that, looking to the contract and the sum concluded for, the pursuer had rightly brought this action in the Court of Session; but looking to the case of Dykes, I think it is an authority applicable to the matter in dispute.

Title to Sue—Proving of the Tenor—Process—Proof.—Where a pursuer was unable to recover deeds constituting his title to sue, held that it was necessary for him to bring an action of proving of the tenor before the action could proceed.

1ST DIVISIO

B.

THIS was an action of accounting brought by John Shaw against the testamentary trustees of his father, the late Thomas Shaw. The conclusions of the summons were for an accounting of the intromissions of the late Thomas Shaw and his wife in the business of Thomas Shaw and Company, confectioners, Glasgow, of which firm the pursuer alleged that he was a partner.

The pursuer averred that a contract of copartnery was executed on 25th June 1847 between Mrs Susan Shaw, sometime widow of James Scott, confectioner, Glasgow, and her second husband, Thomas Shaw, on the one part, and Margaret, Janet, Susan, and Hannah Scott, children of the said James Scott, on the other part, to carry on Scott's business under the name of Thomas Shaw and Company. That by this contract the four Scotts were to have one-half of the profits in equal shares. That by the contract books were to be kept and balanced in January in each year, crediting each partner with a due share of profits. That by marrying Susan Scott the pursuer acquired her share, and by an assignation dated in February 1856, Janet Scott and Hannah Scott assigned, with consent of the other partners, their shares to the pursuer and the said Thomas Shaw. That by an assignation dated in December 1858, Margaret Scott assigned her share to the pursuer, and to Thomas Shaw and his wife equally.

The defenders, the testamentary trustees of Thomas Shaw, in their answers, referred to the deeds founded on by the pursuer for their terms, and stated,—(Stat. 4) "The defenders believe and aver that the pursuer was not a partner, at all events, ultimately, with the said deceased Thomas Shaw. If he ever was a partner the partnership must have ceased many years ago." (Stat. 5) "The defenders have not found in the repositories of Mr Shaw any books or documents, or indeed any materials from which they can make up an account of the profits of the business of Thomas Shaw and Company. So far as known to the defenders the profits of the said business, if any, were regularly distributed to those interested therein. The defenders also believe and aver that even if the pursuer was at any time a partner he duly received, at least, his share of the profits, and that upon an accounting they are not due him any sum whatever. His father, as already explained, for a great number of years, the precise time being to the defenders unknown, had to support the pursuer, and frequently to pay debts of his. This was owing to the pursuer's habits and mode of life. The defenders are not able to say beyond the terms of the writings produced whether the pursuer ever was a partner, but they believe and aver that if he ever was he ceased to be a partner many years ago, and that on a footing which disentitles him to have any claim against his father's trust-estate. The defenders would have recognised his claims if they could find evidence of them." (Stat. 6) "The defenders are merely trustees without personal knowledge in the premises, and have not since the action was raised been able to ascertain more precisely than is set forth in these defences the relation in which the pursuer stood to his father as to the alleged partnership."

The defenders, inter alia, pleaded;—(3) The pursuer's whole statements, so far as material, being unfounded in fact, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

The Lord Ordinary granted a diligence to recover the writings mentioned on record. No originals of these were recovered, but drafts of the assignations were produced. The original contract of copartnery had been produced and printed in an action Shaw's Trustees v. Shaw, Jan. 19, 1870, 8 Macph. 419, 42 Scot. Jur. 195, and was then admitted to be correct by the late Thomas Shaw. The receipt of the late Thomas Shaw was produced for this contract, and also for the two assignations.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Remits to Mr William Brown, chartered accountant in Glasgow, to inquire into the facts set forth in the record, and to report; and in particular to report a state of the profits of the copartnery business for the period referred to in the record, in so far as he may obtain materials enabling him to do so, and also the particulars of any sums paid to the pursuer or his wife by his late father, with power to the accountant to recover all books and documents bearing on the subject of the remit, and for that purpose grants diligence at the instance of the parties against havers, said report to be made quam primum.*

* "NOTE.—The record in this case, particularly the defenders' record, is in a very unsatisfactory state, and the defenders say they cannot make their statements more precise. In the circumstances, it appears to me that a remit to an accountant, with power to recover books and documents, which is the course appropriate to actions of this class, is the best means that can be adopted for ascertainment of the facts, or for putting the case in shape for a proof to be taken on certain specified points, if that shall be found necessary.

"The defenders maintain that the case should be sisted till the pursuer, in a formal action of proving the tenor, shall set up the deeds founded on; but, in the circumstances, I think this is unnecessary, and would impose a hardship and injustice on the pursuer. In a former litigation in this Court the contract of copartnery was produced, and printed for the use of the Court, and admitted by the late Mr Shaw. Mr Shaw's receipt for the two assignations founded on by the pursuer is produced, and no account is given as to what has become of these deeds; and in the circumstances, and having regard to the terms of the defenders' record, which does not deny either the existence or the alleged terms of the deeds, I think the action should be allowed to proceed, at least to the extent of

Shaw v. Shaw's Trustees.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The partnership was not admitted, and it was necessary for the pursuer to instruct his title to sue by an action of proving the tenor of the deeds on which his title rested.

The pursuer answered;—A proving of the tenor was not necessary, as the documents had been traced to the hands of the defenders' author, Thomas Shaw, the truster. If the truster had been alive he would have been required to produce the document which had been traced to him. His trustees could be in no better position. Therefore, secondary evidence was competent.[1]

LORD PRESIDENT.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary in saying that this is a very unsatisfactory record. But one thing is clear that the contract of copartnery is a fundamental part of the pursuer's title to sue. It does not constitute his whole title, but it is just as essential a part of his case as the two assignations. None of these documents having been produced, the question comes to be whether the case can be allowed to proceed without a proving of the tenor of these documents which are assumed to have been lost. I think that a proving of the tenor is indispensable. None of the authorities which have been quoted have the least application. Many documents may be proven in the course of a trial by secondary evidence, but never when they are the documents which constitute the title of the pursuer. I am, therefore, of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary must be recalled, and the case sisted until a proving of the tenor is brought.

LORD DEAS.—The documents on which the action is founded are a contract of copartnery and several assignations. It is not doubted that these documents once existed, and there is ample means of proving their tenor. If the pursuer's counsel had shewn us that the documents were never in existence, that might have been a very good reason for not requiring a proving of the tenor. We might have been landed in this position, that there were no means of finding out what was the state of this copartnery. It is no matter who was to blame for the loss. I am clearly of opinion that the pursuer must bring a proving of the tenor. I would only add, that he ought to prove the whole documents, as the expense will not thereby be much increased.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I concur. It will not do for a pursuer to say that because a case involves an accounting it must necessarily be sent to an accountant. This is indeed an action of accounting, but it is on the basis of there being a contract of copartnery. None of the deeds founded on have been produced, and there is no means of finding out what they are, or what is their nature and import. The only way of finding out what they are is by an action of proving the tenor, and apparently there are some adminicles which will be of use in the proof. The record is very unsatisfactory, but I concur in the opinion that the action cannot proceed without a proving of the tenor.

LORD MURE concurred.

DAVID SCOTT was tenant of the farms of Spittalrigg and Ugstonrigg on lease from Sir Thomas Buchan Hepburn, of Smeaton-Hepburn and Letham, for nineteen years from 1866. The lease contained an assignation to Scott of an obligation by the previous tenant to leave buildings and fences in good order and repair, in respect whereof Scott accepted them as in good order and repair, and bound himself to keep and leave them in like order. Scott died in November 1871. His heir was his brother John, a lunatic. A curator bonis was appointed to him, who renounced the lease. The executors were willing to carry on the lease, but the landlord refused to accept them as tenants. He then raised an action against them in the Sheriff Court of Haddington, concluding for £202 as the expense of putting the buildings, fences, &c. in a proper state of repair. The action was defended, but the defenders did not appear at the proof, and the Sheriff-substitute (Shirreff), after hearing evidence for the pursuer, gave decree as concluded for.

Scott's executors brought a suspension. They averred (in conds. 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 21) that the buildings and fences were in bad repair at Scott's entry, and that the previous tenant's obligation to keep them up had never been delivered to him; that the landlord had not discussed the heir-at-law; that decree was pronounced against the complainers without proper inquiry into the facts; that during the most important stages of the cause they had no law-agent, and that all the witnesses who knew the facts were not adduced, and those who were adduced were not skilfully examined.

They pleaded;—(2) The whole material averments of the respondent, in the action in which he procured the decree sought to be suspended, being false and unfounded in fact, the prayer of the note ought to be granted. (4) The respondent having obtained a renunciation of the said lease without consideration, in the knowledge that the same was of a value far in excess of any rights competent to him under the lease against the late tenant or his representatives, is not now entitled to insist in his present claims.

The Lord Ordinary on 5th June 1875 passed the note, and on 30th June pronounced this interlocutor:—"On the motion of the respondent to have the record in the inferior Court and the proof therein printed and boxed to the Judges of the Inner-House, refuses the motion; and in respect the note of suspension, with articulate reasons annexed thereto, has been passed after answers have been lodged thereto by an interlocutor now final, finds that the record must be closed, and thereafter proceeded with in the Outer-House: Therefore appoints the cause to be put to the roll for the 6th day of July next for the adjustment of the record."*

* "NOTE.—This is a suspension of a decree in foro for £202, 3s. 8d., with £56, 5s. 6½d. of expenses, pronounced against the present complainers by the Sheriff of the sheriffdom of Haddington and Berwick, in a petition presented against them at the instance of the present respondent, Sir Thomas Buchan Hepburn, Baronet. A record was closed and a proof was led in the Sheriff Court.

"The time within which the judgment might have been appealed elapsed, and the decree was extracted. The complainers, in order to have the judgment reviewed, both on its merits and in respect of certain alleged irregularities in the procedure, brought the present process of suspension. The note was originally presented on caution with an articulate statement of facts and note of pleas in law annexed, and answers were ordered. Before answers were lodged, the complainers lodged a minute offering consignation in place of caution, and, of this date (8th May 1875), the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Lord Gifford) allowed the complainers to make consignation of the sums charged for, together with the sum of £50 sterling to meet the expenses of process, amounting in all to £334 sterling.

"Consignation having been accordingly made, answers were lodged for Sir Thomas Buchan Hepburn, and after a full hearing the competency of the suspension was sustained, and the note was passed on 3d June 1875 by an interlocutor which is now final, and the cause has now been enrolled in the ordinary motion-roll for further procedure. The note having been passed with articulate reasons annexed and answers thereto, the record would apparently fall to be closed, and the cause proceeded with in the Outer-House in terms of section 9 of the Act 13 and 14 Vict. c. 36, which provides that where answers are lodged by any respondent in a process of advocation or suspension the record shall thereafter be made up in the same way as in ordinary actions in which defences have been lodged. But the respondent maintains that as in the inferior Court a record had been ordered and a proof led he is entitled, under section 32 of

Scott's Executors v. Hepburn.

After the record in the suspension was closed, Scott's executors raised an action in the Court of Session against Sir T. Hepburn, concluding for the same Act, to have that record and proof at once printed and boxed for the Judges of the Inner-House, and reported to the Inner-House, and to have the cause disposed of as if it had been reported by the Lord Ordinary upon a closed record prepared in the Court of Session.

"The question now to be decided is whether section 32 overrides section 9, or whether it does not rather apply to advocations and suspensions other than those with which section 9 deals?

"The question is not free from difficulty, but as the complainers resist the respondent's motion it is necessary to decide the point.

"To understand the question aright, reference must be made to the practice of the Bill-Chamber and of the Court as regulated by the various statutes and Acts of Sederunt which preceded the Act of 13 and 14 Vict. c. 36.

"The earliest to which it is necessary to refer is the 50 Geo. III. c. 112.

"By the 38th section of that statute bills of advocation and suspension of final judgments of inferior Judges are to be passed on caution without answers, unless it shall appear on the face of the bill that it ought to be refused, in which case it is to be refused; and by section 40 it is enacted that bills of advocation and suspension when so passed are to be enrolled in the roll of advocations and suspensions in the Outer-House, and proceeded with before the Lord Ordinary.

"The next statute is the Judicature Act, by the 41st section of which it is enacted that bills of advocation of final judgments are to contain a copy of the summons or petition and defences or answers with the interlocutors and without any other narrative and without argument, and such bills are to be at once passed by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills on caution for expenses both in the inferior Courts and in the Court of Session, or on juratory caution.

"By the Act of Sederunt following on that statute it is ordered that, in advocations of interlocutory judgments and in every suspension at the lodging of the letters for calling, articulate reasons of suspension or advocation shall be lodged, and the answers are to be in corresponding form.

"The next statute to be noticed is the Advocations and Suspensions Act of 1838, which enacts that advocations of interlocutory judgments are to be by note in the Bill-Chamber prefixing the interlocutor, and praying for relief or remedy, with articulate statements of reasons of advocation and note of pleas in law; answers may be ordered, and the note, if passed, is to be called, and the record closed on note and reasons, or on revised reasons and answers, or on condescendence and answers, and the cause is thereafter to proceed before the Lord Ordinary and the Court of Session in common form; and by the next section it is enacted that in suspensions of inferior Court decrees in foro, except removings, the procedure is to be by note reciting the import and effect of the decree, and praying for relief, and on caution for implement of the decree and expenses in the Court of Session the note is to be passed, but 'where a party is desirous to have such decree of any inferior Court pronounced in forn suspended without caution, or on juratory caution, and also in suspensions of decrees of removing, there shall be annexed to such note of suspension an articulate statement of the facts on which the suspension is founded, and a note of pleas in law, and such note shall be laid before the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, who may pronounce such order as shall be just; and where answers shall be ordered, such answers shall be in a similar form to the reasons of suspension; and in case the Lord Ordinary shall pass the note, the same procedure shall take place as is hereinbefore provided in the case of advocations of interlocutory judgments,'—that is to say, the record is to be made up by the Lord Ordinary, and the cause proceeded with as an ordinary action in the Outer-House.

"By the Act of Sederunt following on that statute it is provided that suspensions shall still be competent on consignation, and that the same procedure is to be observed in such suspensions as in suspensions without caution, or on juratory caution,—in other words, as in advocations of interlocutory judgments.

"The next statute is the Act 11 and 12 Vict. c. 36, the 9th and 33d sections of which have been already recited.

payment of £400. They averred that Scott had laid out large sums in draining, trenching, and otherwise making improvements on the farms, of which he did not live to reap the benefit, and that the value of the improvements to the proprietor or his incoming tenant was at least £400.

They pleaded;—(3) The said deceased David Scott having expended large sums on the improvement of said farms, of which he did not live to reap the benefit, and the defender being, through his death before the expiry of the lease and the inability of the heir to take it up, lucratus as condescended on, the pursuers, as representing the said David Scott, are entitled to decree for the sum sued for.

The defenders denied the averments, and pleaded, inter alia, that they were irrelevant.

On 13th December 1875 the Lord Ordinary pronounced interlocutors in both processes.

In the suspension, after findings in fact, the substance of which is embodied in the foregoing narrative, the interlocutor proceeded,—"Finds that the complainers, as general disponees and executors of David Scott, are bound to implement the obligations incumbent on their author under the lease, to maintain and leave the buildings, fences, ditches, &c., in proper repair, as aforesaid; but finds that they are entitled to set off against the respondent's claim for such repairs pro tanto the value, if any, of such improvements or meliorations as may have been executed by the said David Scott, whereby the respondent shall be proved to have been lucratus, and for the ascertainment of which an action has been raised by the complainers against the respondent, and is now depending before the present Lord Ordinary: Finds that the complainers allege that the sum for which the respondent obtained decree against them in the Sheriff Court in name of repairs is excessive, and that the same was pronounced without proper inquiry or investigation into the facts, and that they were not represented at the proof: Finds in these circumstances that the complainers ought, in the present suspension, to be allowed a farther proof of their averments,

"By the Act of Sederunt 5th February 1861 it is provided that where by the existing practice notes of advocation or suspension require to be lodged in the Bill-Chamber containing an articulate statement of facts and pleas in law, and are followed by answers prepared in a similar form, and such notes are passed by the Lord Ordinary, the complainer shall lodge revised reasons of advocation or revised reasons of suspension, as the case may be, when the cause is called, either in time of session or on any box-day in vacation or recess, and on the other hand the respondent or charger shall lodge revised answers when he returns the process as aforesaid; and by sec. 7 it is provided that every record which is closed in the Outer-House shall, unless the Lord Ordinary otherwise appoint, be printed, and the interlocutor closing the record or holding the same to be closed, shall in all cases be held to be an appointment to print the same, unless the contrary be expressed in the interlocutor.

"By the Court of Session Act, 1868, it is enacted that in all proceedings in the Bill-Chamber, as soon as an interlocutor passing the note has become final, and caution has been found or consignation has been made when ordered, the cause shall become for all purposes an action depending in the Court of Session, and may immediately be enrolled by either party in the motion-roll of the Lord Ordinary to whom it is marked.

"It appears to me that by the minute lodged by the complainers before the answers were lodged the present process became a note of suspension on consignation, which requires an articulate statement of reasons of suspension and note of pleas in law, and as it contained these when presented, and as answers were ordered and lodged, and as the note has been passed by interlocutor now final, the record must be closed, and the case proceeded with in the Outer-House. I have therefore refused the motion of the respondent to report the cause to the Inner-House."

so far as relevant, but only on condition of paying to the respondent the expenses incurred by him in the inferior Court from and after 6th August 1874, which amount, as taxed, to the sum of £25, 11s. 11d.: Therefore finds that, on payment of the said sum, the complainers are entitled to be allowed a proof of the averments contained in articles 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, and 21 of their statement of facts in the present process, the respondent being entitled in that event to a proof of his averments; but finds that, before any proof is formally allowed or led, it is expedient that this process of suspension, and the other action already referred to at the instance of the complainers against the respondent, should be conjoined: Therefore appoints this cause to be put to the roll along with said other process for conjunction; meanwhile reserves all questions of expenses not already disposed of by this interlocutor."

In the petitory action, after the same findings in fact, the interlocutor proceeded,—"Finds that, in respect that the defender is thus enforcing against the pursuers, as the executors of the said David Scott, the obligations as to repairs incumbent on him as tenant under the foresaid lease, the pursuers are entitled to set off pro tanto against their liability for said repairs the amount, if any, which they shall establish to have been expended by the said David Scott in improvements and meliorations upon said farm by draining and trenching the land, and applying foreign manures in excess of his obligations under said lease in so far as these were unexhausted at the time of his death, and in so far as by them the defender has been lucratus: . . . Finds that the pursuers ought to be allowed, before farther answer, a proof of their averments that the defender has been lucratus by the said David Scott's expenditure in draining, trenching, and manuring the said farms, as above set forth, and that the defender ought to be allowed a proof of his averments, and the pursuers a conjunct probation: But finds that it is expedient that, before a proof is formally allowed, this action should be conjoined with the foresaid process of suspension: Therefore appoints this cause, and the said process of suspension, to be enrolled, in order that the actions may be conjoined, and thereafter proceeded with, and reserves all questions of expenses."*

* "NOTE.—In this action a question of novelty and importance is raised as to the right of executors of a deceased tenant, when sued by the landlord for implement of the tenant's obligation to repair buildings, fences, and the like, to meet that claim by a counter action for meliorations made by the tenant upon the farm, by which the landlord is said to have been lucratus, and the benefit of which the tenant has not reaped in consequence of his death soon after the commencement of the lease, and of his heir declining to take up the lease, and of the landlord having enforced the clause of the lease excluding assignees, and having refused to accept the tenant's general disponees and executors as tenants in his room. The circumstances under which the question arises are so fully set forth in the findings of the preceding interlocutor that it is unnecessary to recapitulate them.

"It is quite settled that in the general case a tenant is not entitled to recompense for meliorations made by him upon his farm. The rule of law is nowhere better stated than by Baron Hume in his report of the case of Officer v. Nicolson, 13th February 1807, p. 827, where he says,—'It is a settled point that a tenant has no claim de jure on his landlord for reimbursement of money expended in adding to or improving the houses on his farm. He is understood to have done so for his own convenience during his term, and to have had his recompense accordingly, nor is he entitled to pull down or dismantle the buildings at his removal.' Professor Bell, however (see Com. I. p. 82, and Prin. sec. 1255, founding on the case of Morton v. Lady Montgomerie, 22d Feb. 1822, 1 Sh. N. E. 322), seems to be of opinion that the rule is not applicable in cases where the lease has come to a premature termination by the death or bankruptcy of the tenant, and where a claim for meliorations by which the landlord is lucratus is made by the creditors or representatives of the tenant. And although the circumstances of the case of Morton were special, and the claim of the creditors of the tenant was not there sustained, it seems to have been assumed that where a landlord is truly lucratus by a tenant's outlay under a lease which is prematurely terminated, his creditors would be entitled to claim reimbursement from the landlord. And if so, it appears to me that on principle a tenant's general representatives ought in like manner to be so recompensed where a lease secluding assignees is terminated by the tenant's premature death. In the general case such questions do not often arise when the tenant dies, either because the heir takes up the lease and enters upon the farm in the state in which his predecessor has left it, or because the heir, if he renounces the lease, does so by arrangement with the landlord, in which the value of the meliorations is taken into account in fixing the amount, if any, which may be paid for the renunciation. It is thus only where the heir declines to take up the lease from which assignees and subtenants are excluded, and leaves the farm in the hands of the landlord without asking or receiving any consideration, that any claim for meliorations could be made by the tenant's executors or general disponees, and in an ordinary case of that kind I should have great difficulty in giving effect to any such claims. The claim for meliorations, if competent at all, would rather seem to be an accessory to the right of the heir than a claim competent to the tenant himself, and transmissible to his general representatives. And the heir, in abandoning the lease, abandons also the claim for recompense. The case, however, would appear to be different where, as here, the following circumstances exist:—(1) The heir has renounced the lease, or, which is the same thing, has declined to take it up, and the landlord has taken up the farm, and is alleged to be lucratus by the deceased tenant's extraordinary outlay; (2) the general disponees and executors of the tenant are desirous to carry on the farm as tenants under the lease, but the landlord has refused to accept them, and has removed them, and has himself taken possession of the farm; and (3) the landlord having thus taken benefit by the tenant's outlay, seeks, without allowance for that benefit, to enforce against the tenant's executors and general disponees an obligation in the lease which they are certainly not primarily liable to implement, viz., the obligation to keep and leave the buildings, fences, &c., in proper repair. I do not think it would be equitable to allow such a claim on the part of the landlord without allowing the executors to plead the meliorations as a counter claim, to the effect at least of liberating them pro tanto from their liability to implement the obligation as to repair.

"In the case of Bethune v. Morgan, 16th Dec. 1874, 2 Rettie, 186, and in a previous action between the same parties not reported, but referred to in the Lord President's opinion, p. 190, the question of the extent of the liability of executors, where the heir of the deceased tenant declines to take up the lease, was considered. There the landlord was willing that the executors should take up the lease, but they declined, and Lord Shand, in the first of the two actions, held the executors liable for the fulfilment of the obligations contained in the lease, and, inter alia, for the rents during the remainder of its currency, or for damages for breach thereof. In the second action, which depended before Lord Gifford, and in which the landlord sued for these damages, the liability of the tenant was, after a hearing in the Inner-House before seven Judges, held to be res judicata, no decision being pronounced upon the general question. Lord Gifford, however, in the note to his interlocutor dealing with the merits of the case, expressed his opinion that in justice and on principle the executor in that case was liable, but that 'probably, if the heir renounced the lease, and the landlord insisted against the executor, equity would require him, as a condition of so insisting, to receive the executor as tenant. But no question of this kind arises here; the landlord has all along been perfectly willing to receive the defender as tenant.' Now, while it is not necessary in the present case to hold had accepted the buildings and fences as in good repair, and bound himself to leave them so. It was not said that he had left them in good repair, or that the sum decerned for was excessive. As to the doctrine of compensation laid down by the Lord Ordinary, it would be a strange result that the claim for unexhausted improvements would have been bad if the tenant had kept up his fences and buildings, but could be made good because he had failed to do so.

2. In the action by Scott's executors for the value of improvements—It was true that the doctrine that the tenant has a claim for the value of such improvements when the lease comes to a premature termination was laid down by Professor Bell, as quoted by the Lord Ordinary, and by one or two other writers.[1] But the authority they rely on is the case of Morton v. Montgomerie,[2] and that was simply a case in which the tenant having implemented certain stipulations in the lease as to making improvements, it was unsuccessfully contended that when the lease came to a premature termination the landlord was bound to fulfil certain counter stipulations as to repayment. The principle contended for was unknown to the law.[3] In Pendreigh's Trustee v. Dewar[4] the rescission of the contract was the act of the landlord; there was an express stipulation in the lease that he should pay the tenant for the improvements. Death, and the refusal of an heir to that the defender is bound to accept the pursuers as his tenants, if he enforces against them the obligation for repairs, I think that if the defender really is lucratus by the operations of his deceased tenant he is bound in equity to allow the pursuers, as the tenant's general disponees and executors, to plead the amount of these meliorations in extinction pro tanto of his claim against them for repairs. I think that in principle the case is not materially different from what it would have been if the landlord had paid a sum of money to the heir to induce him to renounce the lease. In such a case, as the primary obligation to put the buildings, &c., in repair, undoubtedly lies with the heir, although the landlord may not be bound to discuss him before suing the executors, I think it would be inequitable to allow him to maintain that after paying money to the person primarily liable to induce him to abandon the lease, he is entitled to enforce the obligation for repairs against the persons liable therefor only in the second place. And if the fences which the heir is primarily bound to maintain and leave in good order are out of repair either the money which he gives to the heir for the renunciation ought, in common fairness, to be applied in implementing that obligation, or the landlord must be held as passing from the obligation altogether. But if this be sound reasoning, then when the landlord, instead of paying money to the heir for a renunciation of the farms, takes it in an improved condition without giving any consideration therefor, surely he ought to impute the value of these improvements pro tanto to extinction of the liabilities of the whole body of the tenant's representatives to implement the minor conditions of the lease.

"This being so, I think the pursuers are entitled to a proof of the extent to which the landlord has been lucratus by the deceased tenant's improvements in the way of draining, trenching, and applying an extraordinary quantity of foreign manures beyond the limited quantity which is provided for in the lease. . . . . But I do not think that they ought to obtain decree for payment of any sum of money in respect of these meliorations, or that they are entitled to more than to have the amount ascertained in this action, so as to enable them to set it off pro tanto against the cost of the repairs. For that purpose this action should, before proof is led, be conjoined with the suspension, in which the exact amount of the cost of these repairs is to be ascertained."

take up a lease, were events which must always be in the contemplation of parties. A claim by a liferenter might be in a different position, because he has a right analogous to a right of property. The tenant really undertook that he or his heir would work out the lease. As he had failed to do so, his executors had no claim for unexhausted improvements.

Scott's executors argued;—When the landlord refused to accept an executor there was an equitable principle by which he was entitled to claim for unexhausted improvements. Such a principle was applied in analogous cases.[1] The landlord ought not to reap benefit from having himself prevented the lease from being carried out. In Thomson v. Fowler the ground of judgment was that there was no lease at all.

LORD PRESIDENT.—We have to dispose of two reclaiming notes presented in the name of Sir Thomas Buchan Hepburn, one in a process of suspension brought against him by the executors of one of his tenants, and the other in an ordinary action at their instance. First, there is a suspension of a decree of the Sheriff of Haddington. The decree was pronounced in foro, and therefore the suspension is properly, and in every respect, a process of review. In processes of review it is not usual that a record should be made up in this Court. But, according to the Acts regulating this kind of procedure, I think the Lord Ordinary was right in the view upon which his interlocutor of 30th June last proceeds, and that it was indispensable that there should be a record made up and closed in this Court. But then what must the suspender's averments be in that record? They must be in substance reasons of appeal. They must assail the judgment on the merits, and shew that it is ill-founded. If the suspender is successful he will get the decree suspended, because the Sheriff has done injustice between the parties. I do not say that a suspension might not be brought on the ground of irregularity. But in the ordinary case this kind of suspension is brought, not for the purpose of quashing a decree vitiated by irregularity, but for the purpose of review on the merits.

The late David Scott was tenant of the farm of Ugstonrigg, under a lease of nineteen years from 1866. He died on 24th November 1871, after having possessed the farm for about five years. His heir was a lunatic, and the curator ad litem appointed to him renounced the succession. The landlord resumed possession of the farm after Scott's executors had reaped the waygoing crop and removed the stock. He then brought an action against the executors for the expense of putting the fences in tenantable condition, in terms of an obligation in the lease. It is necessary to attend particularly to its terms,—"Sir Thomas Buchan Hepburn assigns to the said David Scott the obligations on David and William Scott, the present tenants of Ugstonrigg, and on Alexander Henderson, the present tenant of Spittalrigg, contained in their respective leases, to leave the houses, offices, and fences, and in the case of Ugstonrigg, the thrashing-mill and machinery, dams and aqueducts, in the order and condition therein stipulated; and in respect thereof the said David Scott accepts of the whole houses, buildings, and fences on the lands hereby let, and the thrashing mill and machinery, dams and aqueducts on the farm of Ugstonrigg in good and sufficient order and repair, and binds himself during the currency thereof to keep, and at the expiry to leave the whole houses and buildings, erected or to be erected, and the whole fences except plantation fences, as after provided for, gates and ditches, and the thrashing mill and machinery, dams and aqueducts at Ugstonrigg, in the like order and repair."

The construction and effect of this clause are not doubtful. The previous tenant had undertaken an obligation to leave the fences in good tenantable condition. Whether he had performed that obligation or not it is unnecessary to inquire. If he had, Scott was bound to accept them as sufficient. If he had not, Scott had put into his hands the means of enforcing the obligation, and in consideration of obtaining the assignation he distinctly takes the fences as being in good order, and binds himself to keep and leave them so.

If the fences were out of order at the death of Scott it is clear that there was an obligation on his representatives to put them in repair, and it was for the purpose of enforcing this obligation that the action in the Sheriff Court was brought. The Sheriff decerned for payment of £202 as the expense of putting the fences in proper repair.

Now, it appears to me that there are only three grounds on which prima facie this decree can be assailed. First, that the obligation is not binding on the executors. It is not in terms made binding on executors, as such obligations in leases often are, but it is quite clear that the executors were bound as such to fulfil that obligation. Then it might be said, secondly, that the fences were not in point of fact in bad order; or, lastly, that the sum decerned for was excessive in amount. But what is alleged on record? The Lord Ordinary has found that the complainers ought to have a farther proof of their averments so far as relevant, and that they are entitled to a proof of their averments contained in articles 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, and 21 of their statement. We must examine these statements to see whether they are relevant. To begin with the last, statement 21: It is there said that the decree was "pronounced without proper inquiry into or investigation of the facts; that for some time the complainers had no agent, and that their case was misconducted." Supposing that statement to be true, an appeal was competent. That course was not adopted, but the case is now before us in the shape of a suspension. The suspender is entitled, on cause shewn, to avail himself of further evidence. We are entitled by the Judicature Act to allow additional proof, and even to send the case to a jury. But what is the use of saying that the case was misconducted if it is not disputed that the decree was just? If the complainers were subject to the obligation, if the fences were in disrepair and the sum decerned for not extravagant, what injustice has been done? Looking to the other statements, I cannot find anything which can be admitted to probation. In the 13th statement it is said that in January 1873 Peter Brown reported that it would take £142 to put the fences and building in a temporary or tenantable state of repair. I do not see that that is an averment of the smallest consequence. The complainers do not aver that £142 is enough to put them in repair, or anything short of £202. Then in the 14th statement it is said that Sir Thomas Hepburn at one time asked only £140, but that does not preclude him from asking more now. Then in the 15th statement it is said that there was never any inspection at which the complainers were present. It may be so, and if in consequence of that too much money has been spent, they may be entitled to redress, but they do not say that £202 is too much. Then the 16th article states that Sir Thomas raised the action in the Sheriff Court without first discussing the heir-at-law. I cannot see what that has to do with the merits of the case. In none of these articles is there a word impugning the justice of the decree. I have already adverted to the 21st article. It is in vain merely to say that all the proof has not been led which might have been led, unless it were said that on leading the proof such and such a result would be found to be the justice of the case. There is not a word of that. Therefore, I think these several averments are entirely irrelevant, and that the process ought to be dismissed.

The other reclaiming note raises a question of a different kind. The executors of David Scott have raised an action against the landlord, concluding, inter alia, for a sum as the value of certain improvements, such as trenching and draining, the effect of which is not exhausted, and by which the landlord is alleged to be lucratus.

The Lord Ordinary has found, not that the action is in itself relevant, but "Finds that, in respect that the defender is thus enforcing against the pursuers as the executors of the said David Scott, the obligations as to repairs incumbent on him as tenant under the foresaid lease, the pursuers are entitled to set off pro tanto against their liability for said repairs the amount, if any, which they shall establish to have been expended by the said David Scott in improvements and meliorations upon said farm by draining and trenching the land, and applying foreign manures in excess of his obligations under said lease, in so far as these were unexhausted at the time of his death, and in so far as by them the defender has been lucratus. . . ." In his note he explains this part of his judgment in the following terms:—"It is thus only where the heir declines to take up the lease from which assignees and subtenants are excluded, and leaves the farm in the hands of the landlord without asking or receiving any consideration, that any claim for meliorations could be made by the tenant's executors or general disponees, and in an ordinary case of that kind I should have great difficulty in giving effect to any such claims. The claim for meliorations, if competent at all, would rather seem to be an accessory to the right of the heir than a claim competent to the tenant himself and transmissible to his general representatives. And the heir, in abandoning the lease, abandons also the claim for recompense. The case, however, would appear to be different where, as here, the following circumstances exist:—(1) The heir has renounced the lease, or, which is the same thing, has declined to take it up, and the landlord has taken up the farm, and is alleged to be lucratus by the deceased tenant's extraordinary outlay; (2) the general disponees and executors of the tenant are desirous to carry on the farm as tenants under the lease, but the landlord has refused to accept them, and has removed them, and has himself taken possession of the farm; (3) the landlord having thus taken benefit by the tenant's outlay, seeks, without allowance for that benefit, to enforce against the tenant's executors and general disponees an obligation in the lease which they are certainly not primarily liable to implement, viz., the obligation to keep and leave the buildings, fences, &c., in proper repair. I do not think it would be equitable to allow such a claim on the part of the landlord without allowing the executors to plead the meliorations as a counter claim, to the effect at least of liberating them pro tanto from their liability to implement the obligation as to repair."

Now, I understand from that passage that his Lordship was not prepared to give decree in this action (which was not conjoined with the suspension) for the sum representing the amount to which the landlord was lucratus. Indeed that is made quite clear by a subsequent passage in the note. But his Lordship thinks that though this is a claim which cannot be made in an ordinary action, it may be pleaded by way of compensation. Now, that is rather a puzzling idea. I confess I am not acquainted with a kind of claim which cannot be enforced by ordinary action, but may be pleaded in compensation. There are many claims which may be pleaded in an action but cannot be stated by way of set off. But I am not aware of the converse. And it would be a very singular thing, as Mr Gloag argued, that such a claim should arise indirectly to the tenant from his failure to put the fences in repair.

But putting that aside for the present, and assuming that such a claim could be enforced either by a summons or by way of compensation, let us see whether it is well-founded in law. There is, no doubt, a semblance of authority for such a doctrine in Bell's Commentaries and Principles, in Hunter on Landlord and Tenant, and in Bell on Leases, all respectable authorities, but these opinions are all founded on a single case, and that case these learned authors have misread and misunderstood. But the circumstance of this concurrence of very high authority among legal writers makes this a question of more than usual importance, and makes it necessary to examine the principle on which a right to claim compensation has been generally disallowed, but which it is said suffers an exception when the lease comes to a premature termination.

As to the general rule there cannot be the smallest doubt that the law has uniformly rejected such a claim,—and on this broad principle, that the title is temporary, and that the tenant must be held to have done what he has done exclusively with an eye to his own benefit during the subsistence of his right. Now, does that principle not apply when the lease comes to a premature termination? If the event was an altogether unexpected one, against which no provision could be made by anybody, the case might be different. But it is not so. Both landlord and tenant contemplate the possibility of a premature termination of the lease from various causes, and it is often provided that it shall come to what is called a premature termination in certain events,—such as bankruptcy. In the case of the death of the tenant it always comes to an end if the heir will not take up the succession. All these events are in the contemplation of the parties. Therefore, when the tenant spends his money, he knows that he is running certain risks. His improvements may still have value at the end of the nineteen years, and still more probably if the lease comes to a premature termination. Therefore the same principle applies whether the lease expires at its natural period or comes to a premature termination.

But it has been supposed by learned writers that a principle of a different kind is laid down in the case of Morton v. Montgomerie. That is the single decision on the strength of which this opinion has been ventilated. Now, what was that case? Lady Montgomerie let certain farms for twenty-one years from 1811. The lease excluded assignees and subtenants, and contained the following provision in regard to buildings:—"And the said tacksmen hereby bind and oblige themselves and their foresaids during the two first years of their lease to lay out, at the sight of the masters, the sum of £1100 in building and furnishing a steading of slated houses, which sum the masters are to repay the said tacksmen, or their foresaids, at the issue of the lease," &c. The tenant expended £600, and then in 1813 he became bankrupt. His trustee brought an action for repetition of the sum expended, alleging that Lady Montgomerie was lucrata. The claim was not sustained, which of itself takes away the authority of the case as a decision affirming the principle contended for. But it is said that the reason why it was not sustained was because the proprietrix was not proved to be lucrata, and that the opinions indicate that if she had been the decision would have been different. I do not so read them. But supposing it were so, and the proprietrix had been there proved to be lucrata, and decree given for that sum, would that have been an authority for the claim here maintained? Certainly not. The expenditure there was made under a clause in the lease authorising it, and providing for a claim for repayment at the expiry of the lease. The only question was whether, the lease having come to a premature end, and therefore the time fixed for repayment not having come, the trustee for the tenant's creditors was nevertheless entitled to repayment to the extent to which the proprietrix was lucrata.

The case is somewhat like that of Pendreigh's Trustee v. Dewar, in which a similar claim was made against the landlord as debtor in a sum of £200 which the tenant had agreed to expend, and had expended, and which was to be repaid to him at the end of the lease, if it had come to its natural termination. We held that as the whole sum had been expended, the relation of debtor and creditor subsisted, and we regulated the rights of parties on an equitable footing. A similar question might have arisen in Morton v. Montgomerie if the proprietrix had been found to be lucrata. But these cases give no countenance to a general rule that money expended by the tenant not under agreement can be claimed either at the expiry of the lease or at its premature termination.

The case of Morton v. Montgomerie has been explained before much in the same way as I have now done by Lord Wood in Thomson v. Fowler. Setting aside the case of Morton there is not a vestige of authority for what the Lord Ordinary has done here. It is a plain and clear violation of the general principle established by a series of decisions that a tenant spending money as is here averred does so entirely for his own behoof, and without recourse in any event against his landlord. Therefore I think the defender must be assoilzed.

LORD DEAS.—In the suspension, I am of opinion, with your Lordship, that it was incumbent on the suspenders to have made averments shewing why and in what respect the Sheriff's judgment was erroneous. They do not allege that the fences were left in a proper state of repair, or that the sum awarded was too large, and therefore I think there is no room for the proof which the Lord Ordinary has allowed.

Upon the question, whether the executors are liable for that claim, I have no doubt. The claim is clearly one which had emerged and might have been enforced against the tenant in his lifetime, and for which, therefore, his executors are liable.

As to repairs, the important question arises, whether, when a lease comes to a premature end, there is any claim competent to the tenant for meliorations. It is clear that if the lease had come to its natural termination there would have been no such claim. The contract of lease is very usually made on the footing that the lands are capable of improvement, at a cost for which the tenant will be able to remunerate himself by the end of the lease. The landlord agrees to accept a smaller rent than he would have done because he expects to get back his land in an improved condition. If the termination of the lease is premature, without fault on the part of the landlord, it lies on the tenant's representatives to shew why a claim should arise in that case any more than in the other. They have cited no precedent to that effect.

The executors are walking out,—it may be with profit or it may be with loss. There may be an advantage to the landlord, or there may be a disadvantage from the premature termination of the lease. Both parties, I think, have taken their chance of these results. It would be a novel proceeding if we were to enter into a proof whether the tenancy had been profitable or not, and, if unprofitable, whether this had arisen from the fault of the tenant or not. If the executors have a claim for meliorations on the one hand, the landlord must have a claim for loss on the other. The past seasons may have been highly favourable both in crops and prices, and the remaining seasons may be very unfavourable. The tenant may have realised a large profit during the past years, and the farm may have to be carried on at a loss, or a smaller rent may have to be accepted during the succeeding years. If the principle contended for were adopted in agricultural leases I do not well see why it should not be extended to mineral leases. These are seldom for less than thirty-one years. If the lease comes to an end long before that time by the heir being unwilling or unable to take up the lease of the deceased tenant, are the executors to have a claim against the landlord for sinking and fitting up the pits, although they succeed to a large fortune made by the tenant during the previous years of the lease? Where the lease is terminated by bankruptcy the presumption is that the landlord is a loser; and, on the whole, I know of no principle or authority for such a claim as the present, except the opinion of certain learned writers, which is not borne out by the case of Morton v. Montgomerie, on which alone it appears to be founded.

I likewise agree with your Lordship that if we could not give decree for this sum in a petitory action the claim cannot be made better by being stated as a set-off.

Lord Ardmillan.—In the process of suspension I have nothing to add.

The tenant's obligation under the lease to keep buildings and fences in repair has been explained by your Lordship. I agree in regard to the construction of the lease, and in the result, and in the grounds of your Lordship's opinion.

I think it is right to say, in order to avoid misunderstanding, that the question which arose in Bethune v. Morgan, Dec. 16, 1874 (ante, vol. ii. 186), has not arisen here.

In this case the obligation of the tenant was prestable on his death. The executry estate must meet it to the extent of the executry, and no more has been decided by the Sheriff.

In the action at the instance of the executors of the tenant for meliorations I have felt considerable difficulty. In refusing this claim without proof, or, in other words, in refusing it on the assumption of the truth of the pursuers' averments, I feel that we are very severely, and indeed inequitably, applying the rule of law. Still, if it be the rule of law, it must be applied.

I think it is quite settled on authority and decision that for improvements in the cultivation of a farm, such as are here set forth, made by a tenant spontaneously and for his own interest, he cannot, apart from special stipulation, claim recompense from the landlord at the expiry of his lease. He is understood to have made the expenditure on his farm in the course of his cultivation and for his own benefit, and in expectation of remunerating return during the currency of the lease. I do not advert to special cases where the express consent or the clearly implied consent of the landlord to an unusual expenditure may be held as creating an obligation to recompense for such unusual outlay. We have no such case here. But the general rule is, that where the course of the lease runs out the tenant cannot on its expiry claim recompense for expenditure made by him in expectation of remunerating return during the currency of the lease.

Scott's Executors v. Hepburn.

Where the lease has come to premature termination by the death of the tenant early in the lease, I think that there may be some fair and equitable principle in support of the view that the claim of the tenant should be inquired into, and should be sustained in so far as by the tenant's expenditure in improvement the landlord has been lucratus. Where the lease is to the tenant and his heirs, excluding assignees, and where the heir of the tenant is, as in this case, a lunatic, and cannot take up the lease, and where the landlord will not permit the executors to take it up, but brings the lease to an end by removing them all from the farm, getting the benefit of the tenant's expenditure and improvements, I cannot help thinking that the claim for meliorations, in so far as the landlord is lucratus, would be equitable. The rule of pleading must not be forgotten. A proof is offered by the pursuers; and if the proof is refused the truth of the averments must be assumed. We are on relevancy at present; for the landlord, while resisting a proof, demands judgment on the relevancy—that is, assuming the truth of the pursuers' statements. The pursuers aver that the expenditure was fairly and judiciously made by the tenants; that the land has been improved, and that the landlord is lucratus; that if the lease had run to its termination remunerative return for the expenditure would have been obtained; and that the lease was abruptly and prematurely terminated, not by the death of the tenant—it is a mistake to say that—but by the act of the landlord—by the removal of the family at the instance of the landlord—who obtained a renunciation from the curator of the lunatic heir. If the facts are as stated, then I am impressed by the fairness and equity of this demand. The Lord Ordinary has allowed a proof, and a proof would have cleared up the facts. But your Lordships are prepared to refuse the claim of the tenant's executors without proof—without inquiry; to refuse it whether urged as a separate claim or as a claim of compensation or set-off against the landlord's demand for damages in respect of failure to maintain buildings and fences. If the law be so clear as to shut out his claim, it is better for the parties to declare and enforce it at once; and I quite admit that if the tenant's demand is not good as a separate claim, it cannot be sustained as a compensation.

I feel that the rule we are enforcing must often be severe in its application. Accordingly, I have endeavoured to find sufficient direct authority in the law to support the proposition that the premature termination of the lease by the landlord before its natural expiry gives to the tenant or his representatives a right to claim allowance for outlay on meliorations of which the landlord reaps the benefit, but which the tenant could not have claimed if the lease had run its full course. In that case—the case when the lease runs on to its expiry—I concur in holding that the law is settled. The tenant cannot make such a claim. There is no doubt that this is the general rule. An exception from the rule in such circumstances as have here arisen might, I think, have been most equitable and just (of course assuming the pursuers to succeed in their proof); and this is, I think, the opinion of Professor Bell, of Mr Robert Bell, and of Mr Hunter—(Bell's Prin. par. 1255; Bell on Leases; Hunter's Law of Landlord and Tenant); but I am afraid that in the case of Morton, the only case referred to, the point was not decided, and in the absence of direct decision, and indeed of any decision, I have not a sufficient foundation for pressing this exception from the rule as an exception supported by law. We must abide by decision; and recognising the rule, and in the absence of authority to support the exception, I cannot venture to differ from the conclusion at which your Lordships have arrived.

Lord Mure.—I have little to add to what has fallen from your Lordships upon this case, and I have come to the same conclusion. There is no doubt that when a party brings a suspension of a decree in foro he requires to state very distinct and relevant grounds why the decision of the Sheriff should be set aside. In the present case there is a finding in the judgment of the Lord Ordinary to the effect "that the complainers allege that the sum for which the respondent obtained decree against them in the Sheriff Court in name of repairs is excessive, and that the same was pronounced without proper inquiry or investigation into the facts, and that they were not represented at the proof." Now, if that were the case, I should not be disposed to differ from his Lordship in thinking that farther proof should be allowed. But I am unable to find in the statements of facts for the complainers any distinct allegation that the sum claimed by the respondent, and decerned for, was excessive. With reference to the conduct of the cause, and statement 21, where it is said, inter alia, that, "during the most important stages of the cause the complainers had no law-agent," I do not think there is any sufficient relevancy in the averments to entitle a party to have the proof opened up; and upon examining the inferior Court proceedings I find that an agent was employed, and was acting on the part of the complainers, at the time when the questions of law were decided; and I also find that when that agent ceased to act due notice was given to the complainers, by order of the Sheriff, of the day when the proof was to be proceeded with, that they might either attend themselves, or appoint another agent, which they failed to do. Now, when a full opportunity has been given to an agent to attend, it requires, in my opinion, much more distinct averments than any which are to be found in this record to warrant us in holding that a decree in foro should be suspended.

On the important question raised in the petitory action, I agree with your Lordships that, in an ordinary lease, the tenant has no claim for reimbursement for improvements when it terminates. The opinion of Baron Hume in the case quoted in the Lord Ordinary's note is conclusive upon this point, and in practice it has always been acted upon. The question is, whether that rule of law does not apply in the case of a lease suddenly terminating by the death of the tenant. In principle I do not see why it should not apply in the one case as well as in the other; because such a result must in most cases be in the contemplation of parties as possible when the lease is entered into, and the only difficulty I have felt is in regard to the statements of several writers of eminence as to the rule of law applicable in the case of a premature termination of a lease. But the case of Morton v. Montgomerie, upon which they proceed, has plainly been misread to a considerable extent, for it proceeded upon an express stipulation that the tenant was to have repayment of sums expended in buildings. The only question, therefore, which could there arise, was whether the tenant in that particular case was entitled, upon equitable considerations, the lease having come to an unexpected termination, to get a less sum than £1100, the amount which it was stipulated the tenant was to expend during the lease, and which was to be repaid him at its termination. It was held that he was not so entitled, as the landlord had not been lucratus, and the case is therefore no authority for the present contention. It is, moreover, quite plain to me that the fact that the tenant did not during his lifetime put the fences, &c., in good condition, cannot give his representatives a better claim against the landlord to be reimbursed for meliorations made by the tenant than they would otherwise have had.

THE HONOURABLE MRS ELIZABETH BINNY OR MAULE AND ANOTHER, Petitioners.—D.-F. Watson—H. Johnston.

Entail—Disentail—Fee and Liferent—Fiduciary Fee—Entail Amendment Act, 1848 (11 and 12 Vict. c. 36), sec. 3.—In a marriage-contract the lady's father entailed an estate by procuratory of resignation in favour of himself in liferent, and after his death the spouses and the longest liver of them, also in liferent, but under certain restrictions and limitations, and the heir-male, whom failing, the heir-female of the marriage in fee.

There being no heir-male of the marriage, after the death of her father and husband the lady and her eldest daughter jointly presented a petition for authority to disentail under the 3d section of the Entail Amendment Act. Held (1) that it was necessary to determine which of the petitioners, if either, was heir in possession within the meaning of the Act; (2) on a construction of the deed, that the interest of the spouses was restricted to a liferent allenarly; (3) that the spouses had a fiduciary fee till the dissolution of the marriage by the husband's death, when the heir of the marriage was ascertained; (4) that on the dissolution of the marriage, the eldest daughter being ascertained to be the heir of the marriage became heir of entail in possession; and authority granted to her to disentail upon producing the necessary consents.

Lord Ruthe
furd Clark.
B.

THIS petition, for authority to disentail the estate of Fearn, in Forfarshire, was presented under the 3d section of the Entail Amendment Act, 11 and 12 Vict. c. 36, and the relative statutes 16 and 17 Vict. c. 94, sec. 4, 31 and 32 Vict. c. 84, 38 and 39 Vict. c. 61, sec. 12, by Mrs Maule, widow of the Honourable William Maule Maule, and her eldest daughter, Miss Elizabeth Patricia Maule.

The petition set forth that Mrs Maule was institute or heir of entail in possession of the estate under an entail executed by the deceased Thomas Binny, Mrs Maule's father, and contained in a contract of marriage dated 9th April 1844 between W. M. Maule and the petitioner Elizabeth Binny (Mrs Maule), to which Mr Binny was a party. The entail was in the form of a procuratory of resignation in favour of, and for new infeftment to be given to, "Thomas Binny, in liferent, during all the days of his lifetime, and after his death to the said Elizabeth Binny and William Maule Maule, the said intended spouses, and to the longest liver of them, also in liferent; but subject to the restrictions and limitations, provisions, and declarations thereanent, all as after expressed, and to the heirs-male of said intended marriage between the said William Maule Maule and Elizabeth Binny in fee; whom failing, to the heirs-female of the said intended marriage," and other substitutes, excluding heirs-portioners. Resignation was made of the lands, and a crown-charter was expede, containing precept of sasine in terms of the above destination. Thomas Binny and the spouses were infeft in 1844 for their respective rights of liferent. But the precept remained unexecuted as regarded the fee.

Thomas Binny died in 1845, and W. M. Maule in 1859. There were two sons and four daughters of the marriage, but the sons predeceased their father. Miss Maule was of full age, and born before 1848. The three other daughters, who consented to the petition, were also of full age.

The petition set forth further, "that in the event of the right of the petitioner Mrs Maule not being that of the institute or of an heir of entail in possession, . . . but being only that of a liferenter, the petitioner Miss Maule is the institute or heir of entail in possession."

The prayer was "to authorise the petitioners to disentail and acquire in fee-simple the said entailed lands, and to execute an instrument of disentail," &c.

Miss Maule had made up no title.

Although the destination to the spouses did not contain the words "for liferent use allenarly" there were numerous passages and expressions in the marriage-contract, which are quoted in the Lord President's opinion, shewing that it was the entailer's express intention to restrict their right to a mere liferent.

The Lord Ordinary remitted to Mr W. R. Kermack, W.S., who reported his opinion that he did not consider himself called on to consider whether Mrs Maule's right was merely one of liferent, although it appeared to him that there were various clauses in the deed which might be held to limit her right to a liferent as distinctly as if the word "allenarly" had been used; that assuming that the fee was vested in Miss Maule, it was not clear that she was entitled to disentail as heir of entail in possession, because Mrs Maule might perhaps be still regarded as fiduciary fiar, to whom on her death the next heir entitled to succeed would, in practice, make up his title; but he reported that authority to disentail might be granted to the petitioners jointly.

* "NOTE.— . . . . The estate of Fearn belonged to Mr Binny, and in the contract of marriage between his daughter and Mr Maule it was settled by a strict entail. The destination is in favour of Mr Binny in liferent, and Mr and Mrs Maule and the survivor in liferent, but subject to the restrictions specified in the deed of entail, and to the heirs-male of the marriage of Mr and Mrs Maule in fee; whom failing, to the heirs-female of that marriage; whom failing, to the heirs-male of any subsequent marriage of Mrs Maule; whom failing, to the heirs-female of such subsequent marriage; whom failing, to a series of other heirs.

"The marriage was dissolved by the death of Mr Maule. He was survived by four daughters. The petition is presented by Mrs Maule and her eldest daughter. It proceeds on the footing that one or other of the petitioners is the heir of entail in possession, and prays that the petitioners may be authorised to record an instrument of disentail executed by both.

"It was not maintained that Mrs Maule was fiar. It is true that in the dispositive clause neither the word 'allenarly,' nor any equivalent, occurs. But the subsequent clauses of the deed seem conclusively to shew that her right is limited to a liferent.

"It was urged, however, that Miss Maule was the fiar, and that she was entitled to disentail. Her right of fee, if it exist, is of course subject to her mother's liferent, and her title is not made up; but in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary neither of these circumstances prevent her from proceeding with the petition, if it is otherwise well founded—See 11 and 12 Vict., c. 36, sec. 42. It is possible that she may be required to complete her title before she is allowed to record the instrument of disentail.

"The question is, whether a right of fee emerged in favour of Miss Maule on the dissolution of the marriage, or whether Mrs Maule is fiduciary fiar for such of her children as shall on her death be the heir under the destination. The Lord Ordinary is inclined to adopt the former view. He thinks that Miss

Argued for the petitioners;—The petition was presented on the footing that as one or other of the petitioners must be the heir of entail in possession, a deed of disentail executed by both, and with the necessary consents required in either view, would be valid.

If, however, the Court were of opinion that it was necessary to determine which of the petitioners was heir of entail in possession they then contended that Miss Maule was.

Another view was suggested by the reporter, that Mrs Maule was fiduciary fiar, and that there could be no disentail till her death.

In the first place, Mrs Maule's right was a mere liferent. The words of the destination taken alone, if all the rest of the deed were disregarded, might have given her a fee. But such construction could not be applied to a marriage-contract, and there were abundant indications in the deed that the entailer intended the liferent which he conferred on the spouses not to import a fee but a liferent allenarly. Though the word "allenarly" was not used there were equivalents more than sufficient.

If, then, Mrs Maule had merely a liferent allenarly, the question remained, whether Miss Maule was now fiar and therefore heir of entail in possession, or whether Mrs Maule had and continued to have a fiduciary fee. Admitting that there was, stante matrimonio, a fiduciary fee in the spouses, or one or other of them, a fiduciary fee endured no longer than, fictione juris, the necessity for it existed. As soon as the heir emerged the fiduciary fee came to an end.[1] Where, as in the case of Ferguson v. Ferguson,[2] the real fiar was to be the heir-male of the body of the fiduciary fiar, he could not possibly be ascertained till the death of the fiduciary fiar. But here the real fiar was to be the heir-female failing heirs-male of a marriage. The heir of a marriage was necessarily ascertained at the dissolution of the marriage, and therefore from the date of the dissolution of Maule is, in the sense of the deed, the heir of the marriage, and that her right as such was ascertained on the death of her father.

"In the case of Ferguson v. Ferguson, 2 Rettie, 627, it was decided that under a destination to A in liferent, for his liferent use allenarly, and the heirs-male of his body in fee, no right of fee could vest during the lifetime of A. The ratio decidendi is, that until the death of A it could not be ascertained who was to be his heir, and that he was necessarily fiduciary fiar for the uncertain heir.

"But in Maxwell v. Logan, 15 Sh., 291, and Maclean and Robinson's Ap. Cases, 790, it was held that when an estate was disponed to a woman in liferent only, and to her second son in fee, the son became fiar as soon as born. Accordingly, he obtained, during his mother's lifetime, a decree of declarator that the fetters of the entail did not apply to him, and that he was entitled to sell and dispose of the estate at pleasure.

"Here the disposition is not in favour of a child, but of the heir of the marriage. So long as the marriage subsisted such an heir could not have existed any more than an heir-male of the body. But on the dissolution of the marriage the heir is ascertained just as much as a second or other son, and when this is so the Lord Ordinary thinks a right of fee at once vests in such an heir.

"Some difficulties have been suggested as to the mode of making up the title. It is said that it may be necessary to serve to the fiduciary fiar, and that no such service can be expede until the death of the mother. But if the Lord Ordinary is right, a service was not necessary under the former law to take up or transmit the fee. The heir, when he is ascertained, is in truth a disponee.—See the Note of Lord Corehouse in Maxwell, above cited; Douglas, 8 Macph. 374."

the marriage the succession opened to Miss Maule, who became at once heir of entail in possession, subject to Mrs Maule's liferent, and Mrs Maule ceased to be fiduciary fiar. Miss Maule was therefore in a position to disentail in terms of the Rutherfurd Act.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a petition for authority to disentail the estate of Fearn, presented by two parties, Mrs Elizabeth Binny or Maule and her eldest daughter Miss Elizabeth Patricia Maule. It is a singular example of a petition to disentail, because the only person who, under the Entail Amendment Act, can execute a deed of disentail is the heir in possession, and it is clear that there cannot be two persons in that situation. I am, therefore, indisposed to treat this matter on the footing that there is a title in one or other of these parties, and so proceed blindfold to have a disentail executed by both as if they jointly constituted an heir in possession. It is necessary to consider which of these petitioners is the heir, or whether either of them is. The heir of entail, if he fulfils the conditions of either the 1st, 2d, or 3d sections of the Entail Amendment Act, has an absolute right to execute a deed of disentail. We have no right to prevent him. Our jurisdiction only extends to seeing that he has fulfilled the conditions of the statute, and if these have been fulfilled we are bound to authorise the deed of disentail to be recorded.

Now, the question who the heir in possession is depends on the construction of the instrument of entail itself. It is in the form of a procuratory of resignation, and is contained in a marriage-contract between the Honourable William Maule Maule and Miss Elizabeth Binny, the petitioner, dated 9th April 1844. The destination is in the following terms:—Resignation is to be made in favour of "Thomas Binny, in liferent, during all the days of his lifetime, and after his death to the said Elizabeth Binny and William Maule Maule, the said intended spouses, and to the longest liver of them, also in liferent; but subject to the restrictions and limitations, provisions, and declarations thereanent, all as after expressed, and to the heirs-male of said intended marriage between the said William Maule Maule and Elizabeth Binny in fee; whom failing, to the heirs-female of the said intended marriage;" whom failing, to other substitutes. Under this procuratory, if it stood alone, and were construed without reference to the other portions of the deed, it might well be contended that the spouses after the death of the lady's father were to be joint fiars, and that after the decease of William Maule, the petitioner Mrs Maule becomes sole fiar, because the estate is given without any restrictive words, and especially the words "for liferent use allenarly." But a reference to other portions of the deed creates a strong impression that Thomas Binny intended to give his daughter and her husband a bare liferent. There are several clauses which it is necessary to advert to.

In the first place, it is to be observed that in applying the fetters a distinction is always made between "the said liferenters and heirs of entail succeeding." Then permission is given to the liferenters to make provision for younger children "in such manner and to such extent as proprietors of entailed estates are authorised to do" by statute; "and declaring also that all provisions to younger children, to be granted in virtue hereof, shall be granted by the said William Maule Maule or Elizabeth Binny, subject to all the provisions and conditions, restrictions and limitations, contained in the said Act of Parliament, in like manner and to the same effect in all respects as if the said William Maule Maule and Elizabeth Binny had been proprietors of the said entailed lands, barony, and estate, and not liferenters as aforesaid." Thus, their position is distinctly contrasted with that of proprietors.

Then follows another clause to enable the lady to make provision for a second husband, in which exactly the same contrast is preserved. Then, in a subsequent part of the deed, it is declared "with regard to the liferent right hereby constituted in favour of the said Elizabeth Binny and William Maule Maule" that if William Maule survives and enters into a second marriage his life interest is to be restricted to £1000. And, on the other hand, "in case the said William Maule Maule shall happen to predecease the said Elizabeth Binny, leaving issue of the marriage, and that the said Elizabeth Binny shall enter into a second marriage, then her life interest in the said estate shall in like manner be restricted, as the same is hereby restricted, to the sum of £1000 sterling yearly, ... without prejudice, however, to the right of the said Elizabeth Binny to recur to the entire liferent of the estate on the failure of the heirs of this present marriage, and that notwithstanding she may have married a second husband." Then, there is a provision for the disposal of the surplus rents. Then follows this further provision:—"And in regard it is the said Thomas Binny's special wish and desire that the said Elizabeth Binny shall in every event enjoy a liferent interest to a certain extent in the liferent of the said lands and estate of Fearn hereby provided for her and the said William Maule Maule, and the survivor of them as aforesaid, alimentarily, and unaffected and unaffectable by the debts or deeds of them, or either of them, or of herself if she be the survivor of them, therefore the said Thomas Binny hereby declares that the foresaid conveyance of the foresaid lands and estate of Fearn to the said Elizabeth Binny and William Maule Maule, and the survivor of them, in liferent, is granted under the provisions and declarations following." Then it is provided that one-third of the rents during the subsistence of the marriage shall be payable to the lady on her own receipt. "And it is further declared, as regards the rights of the said Elizabeth Binny provided to her as aforesaid, both during the subsistence and after the dissolution of the said marriage, if she be the survivor, the same shall not be saleable or assignable, either in whole or in part, by the said Elizabeth Binny and William Maule Maule, or either of them, to any extent or effect, or upon any pretence whatever, the said liferent interest in favour of the said Elizabeth Binny, as well during the subsistence as after the dissolution of the said marriage, being hereby declared strictly alimentary on the said Elizabeth Binny."

Then follows a declaration—"That it shall be in the power of the said Thomas Binny, Elizabeth Binny, and William Maule Maule, to enter into leases of the foresaid estate, or any part thereof, for the like duration, and in all respects as fully and freely as is permitted to the heirs of tailzie foresaid, and that notwithstanding that they, the said Thomas Binny, Elizabeth Binny, and William Maule Maule, are merely liferenters." The word "merely" seems to come as near "allenarly" as any other word in the English language could do..

Taking all these passages together it is impossible to doubt that it was the distinct and express intention of the testator that Mrs Maule, both during the subsistence and after the dissolution of the marriage, should have no more than a bare liferent, as it is commonly expressed in our conveyancing, "for her liferent use allenarly."

It cannot be disputed at this time of day that the word "allenarly" is not absolutely essential as a technical expression to carry into effect such an intention. There are equivalents. I know no example of a decision to the contrary, unless it be the interlocutor of Lord Deas in Ramsay v. Beveridge,[1] but that was reversed by the Second Division, so that the case comes to be an authority the other way. If the right of Mrs Maule is one of bare liferent she has no title and no part of a title to present a petition for disentail.

I proceed now to consider whether Miss Maule is the heir in possession. Under the destination which I have read there was nobody in existence who could take the fee as proper fiar at the time when Thomas Binny died and the liferent of the spouses came into existence. The destination is to the heir of the marriage,—first, the heir-male, and, failing such, the heirs-female, excluding heirs-portioners. At that time there was no child born; at all events no one could tell who the heir of the marriage was to be. The legal consequence was that the liferenters must sustain a fiduciary fee for the benefit of the expected real fiars when they should be ascertained. It appears to me, therefore, that during the subsistence of the marriage there was such a fiduciary fee in the spouses jointly, but on the dissolution of the marriage, and in the moment of its dissolution, there was ascertained to be an heir of the marriage, who then became the real fiar, and the estate was vested in her, and the fiduciary fee came to an end. There was no fiduciary fee left in the survivor of the marriage, for the plain reason that the fiduciary fee is created by the necessity of the law, and endures only so long as the necessity. It is necessary that the fee should be somewhere, and therefore the law invented the ingenious contrivance of a fiduciary fee to satisfy legal principle.

When the marriage was dissolved, the heir of the marriage was ascertained, just as the heir of the body is ascertained on the decease of the party of whose body he is the heir. Therefore, it appears to me that Miss Maule, being the heir of the marriage at its dissolution, became by its dissolution the party entitled to take up the fee as disponee under this deed. She is ascertained to be the party called as institute of tailzie, and she was in substance the party who took for the first time as proper disponee.

The entail was made before 1848, and Miss Maule was born before that year, and therefore she must bring herself within the 3d section of the statute, and she appears to me to have done so, having obtained the consent of the three next heirs.

It only remains to be noticed that Miss Maule's title is not made up. That is a matter which will be considered afterwards in the conduct of the case before Lord Rutherfurd Clark. It is not before us at present.

Lord Deas.—This is an application presented under the Rutherfurd Act by the Honourable Mrs Maule, and her eldest daughter Miss Maule, for authority to disentail the estate of Fearn and others, in the county of Forfar. A doubt has been suggested whether the fee is vested in Mrs Maule or Miss Maule, and the application has consequently been presented in their joint names.

The entail is contained in a contract of marriage entered into in April 1844 between Mrs Maule (then Elizabeth Binny) and her late husband William Maule Maule, with consent of her late father Thomas Binny, Esq., whereby, in consideration of the obligations thereby undertaken by Mr Maule, "and for securing the support of the said intended spouses, and the issue of the said intended marriage," Mr Binny bound himself to resign, and did resign, the said lands and estate "in favour and for new infeftment of the same, to be made, given, and granted to himself, the said Thomas Binny, in liferent, during all the days of his lifetime, and after his death to the said Elizabeth Binny and William Maule Maule, and the longest liver of them, also in liferent, but subject to the said restrictions and limitations, provisions and declaration, thereanent, and to the heirs-male of the said intended marriage between the said William Maule Maule and Elizabeth Binny in fee, whom failing, to the heirs-female of the said intended marriage," whom failing, to the other heirs therein mentioned; but always with and under the conditions, provisions, clauses irritant and resolutive, and others therein written, and, inter alia, with the condition "that the said Thomas Binny, and the said Elizabeth Binny, and William Maule Maule, for their respective liferent rights aforesaid, and the whole heirs of tailzie and substitutes above mentioned, shall take and possess the said lands, barony, and estate of Fearn above described upon this tailzie only, and upon no other right or title whatsoever," and shall "be obliged to cause engross and verbatim insert the whole foresaid course and order of succession, at least so far as shall be subsequent to the life-renter or heir in possession for the time, with the several conditions, provisions, clauses irritant and resolutive, and others herein contained, on the charters and infeftments to follow hereon, and in all after charters, special services, retours, and instruments of sasine of the lands, barony, and estate above specified, or any part thereof."

It is then provided that "it shall be noways lawful to nor in the power of the said Thomas Binny, Elizabeth Binny, and William Maule Maule, or any of them, or any of the heirs of tailzie and substitutes above written," to alter the order of succession, or to sell or burden the estate, or to contract debt thereon, under the pain of forfeiture. But a power is conferred on Mr Maule, and, failing his exercising it, on Mrs Maule, if she survived him, "notwithstanding that they are liferenters, to provide for their children who shall not succeed to the said lands, barony, and estate of Fearn, in such manner and to such extent as proprietors of entailed lands and estates are by law authorised to do in terms of the statute 5th George the Fourth, chapter 87." This power, it has been explained at the bar, was exercised to its full extent by the late Mr Maule in his lifetime, so that it is not open to his widow, Mrs Maule, to exercise it to any extent, and this avoids an embarrassment which otherwise might have attended this question of disentail. There were two sons of the marriage, but they both predeceased their father without issue. The marriage was dissolved by the father's death, and the petitioner, Miss Maule, as the eldest daughter, is undoubtedly the heiress of entail of the marriage, and the institute under the destination entitled to disentail the estate, unless the fee is vested in her mother in respect of the liferent conferred on the latter not being restricted to a liferent use allenarly.

I am of opinion that in a deed of strict entail, such as this, the use of the word "allenarly" is not required in order to restrict the mother's right to a bare liferent. It will be observed that by this deed the prohibitory, irritant, and resolutive clauses are all expressly made applicable to the liferenters as well as the fiars, so that there was no room for adding anything to the effect of these clauses by the use of the word "allenarly."

I think this a more satisfactory ground of judgment than gathering specialties from expressions occurring throughout this particular deed, as was done in the case of Beveridge, which has the disadvantage, as strongly deprecated by Lord Eldon in Dewar v. M'Kinnon, 1 W. and S. App. 168-9, of leaving us substantially without any rule at all.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I am of the same opinion. There are certain dates which I think are important. The marriage took place in April 1844; Thomas Binny died in March 1845; William Maule died in February 1859; Miss Maule was born in May 1846,—that is to say, before 1848.

No. 135. June 14, 1876. Maule.

The rights of parties emerged on the dissolution of the marriage by the death of William Maule. During the subsistence of the marriage no person was, or could be ascertained to be assuredly heir of the marriage; but on the death of William Maule, Miss Maule was ascertained to be unquestionably the heir of the marriage. Mrs Maule is clearly a liferenter,—not a fiar. I do not think that the word "allenarly" is a verbum sine quo non. It is a word which was selected at a particular period of our law for a particular purpose; but when you find so many expressions indicating the same intention, and concurring towards the same result, as in the present case, the absence of the word "allenarly" is not fatal. Here we have an entail, a liferent declared to be "alimentary," the liferenters called "merely liferenters," and a whole series of provisions which make it very plain that no more than a liferent was intended to be given. There was undoubtedly a fiduciary fee, but that fiducia or trust was for the person mentioned as the heir who was to succeed,—that is to say, the heir of the marriage,—and when, on dissolution of the marriage, the heir of the marriage was ascertained, the fiduciary fee terminated. Therefore, I am of opinion that Mrs Maule was not the fiar; that from the date of the dissolution of the marriage Miss Maule was the fiar, and of course is now fiar. As to the combination of the two rights, as has been suggested, I think that although it is natural, appropriate, and prudent that Mrs Maule should be a consenting party, still the fiar, the true heir of entail, is the only person entitled to prosecute this proceeding.

Lord Mure.—I concur with your Lordship that we must make up our minds which of these petitioners, or whether either of them, is the party entitled to disentail; and that the execution of a joint instrument, on the footing that one or other of the petitioners has the right to disentail, would be of doubtful competency.

On the construction of the clauses of the deed I have no difficulty in holding, on the grounds stated by your Lordship, that Miss Maule is now the heir of entail in possession. Under the deed the right of the spouses was one of liferent. For although the word "allenarly" is not used, there are equivalent provisions which restrict their right, while they were at the same time fiduciary fiars till the dissolution of the marriage. On that event the eldest heir-female, if there was no heir-male, became the heir of the marriage, and fiar of the estate, and as Miss Maule is now in that position she should, I think, be authorised to execute an instrument of disentail.

This interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that the petitioner, Elizabeth Patricia Maule, is the heir of the marriage between the now deceased Honourable William Maule Maule and the other petitioner Mrs Elizabeth Binny or Maule, and that on the dissolution of the said marriage by the decease of the said Honourable William Maule Maule the fee of the estate of Fearn became vested in the said Elizabeth Patricia Maule, subject to the fetters of the entail, and subject also to her mother's liferent: Find that when the title of the said Elizabeth Patricia Maule shall have been duly completed she will be entitled, as heir of entail in possession of the said entailed estate, to execute and record an instrument of disentail, on complying with the conditions of the third section of the Entail Amendment Act: Remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed further in accordance with the above findings."

Nuisance—Pollution—Stream—Property—Landlord and Tenant.—A proprietor erected a village for the accommodation of the miners in his employment on the banks of a stream formerly suitable for primary uses. Drains were provided to carry off surface water and water from washing-houses through filtering beds into the stream, other arrangements being made by the proprietor for the removal of excreta and refuse from the miners' cottages, which, if attended to by the inhabitants, would have prevented such polluting matters from reaching the stream. In an action for interdict against the proprietor at the instance of an inferior heritor who alleged that the water from the drains polluted the stream the defender pleaded (1) that the stream was the natural channel of the drainage of his lands, and (2) that there had been no pollution. Held, on consideration of a proof, that pollution of the stream by the drains had been proved, and that, unless the pollution was stopped the pursuer would be entitled to have his rights protected by interdict against the defender.

Observed (per Lord Gifford) that if a landlord cannot erect a village without polluting a pure stream he must not erect it.

2D DIVISI
Lord Shan
I.

THE Caledonian Railway Company, who were proprietors of the Forth and Clyde Canal, presented a note of suspension and interdict against William Baird and Company, iron and coal masters, owners and lessees of minerals in the neighbourhood of a part of the canal, praying that the Court should "interdict, prohibit, and discharge the said respondents from carrying or conveying the drainage or sewage of the dwelling-houses, and out-buildings connected therewith, recently erected by them at Auchinsterry, in the parish of Cumbernauld, into the burn or watercourse immediately on the west of said houses and buildings, and thence into the canal known as the Forth and Clyde Canal, the property of the complainers."

The complainers averred, and it was admitted, that "the respondents are extensive owners or lessees of minerals in the neighbourhood of Auchinsterry, and for the accommodation of their miners and workmen engaged at their pits and works in that locality they have recently erected about 100 dwelling-houses, which at present contain a population of about 600 persons."

The complainers further averred;—"The said dwelling-houses are built in rows or streets, and they, and the various out-buildings connected therewith, consisting of wash-houses, privies, and other conveniences, are all situated on an acclivity sloping towards said canal. Along each of said rows or streets the respondents have formed a gutter, by means of which the drainage or sewage from said dwelling-houses, and outbuildings connected therewith, is conveyed into a covered drain, also constructed by the respondents, and at the extremity of which, next to the canal, they have constructed a cesspool for the reception of the said sewage. The said cesspool has an outlet, from which the respondents have constructed a drain to connect the said cesspool with the burn or watercourse referred to in the prayer of the note, and which at the point of connection is the property of the complainers, and flows into the said canal."

The respondents answered this article as follows:—"Admitted that the said dwelling-houses are built in rows, and that they, as well as the wash-houses, privies, and other buildings, are situated upon ground sloping towards the canal. Admitted that the respondents have, on their own ground, formed gutters or open syvers, along which the surface-water and the water from the wash-houses is conveyed into cesspools, from which it is conducted into a covered drain on the west side of said ground. Quoad ultra denied; and explained that, at the extremity of the said covered drain, the water flows into a filtering pond, containing a filtering bed of coke dust or ashes, and divided into three compartments, through each of which the whole water passes successively, and that it is only after the water has been so filtered that it flows into the burn, at a point within the respondents' own ground, and the burn carries the water, at some little distance, into the canal. Explained that there are no water-closets on the ground, and no drains from the privies or dust-bins, which are roofed over. The ashes from the dust-bins are used in taking up the liquid and other matters in the privies, which by these means are kept dry. The dust-bins and privies are regularly emptied, and consequently no sewage reaches the canal from the respondents' ground. The respondents keep a man constantly employed as a scavenger in cleaning the streets and roads opposite the said houses, as well as the open water-channels and syvers; and their respective cesspools are cleaned out every alternate day. The coke dust or ashes in the filtering ponds is renewed every month,—the previous coke dust or ashes, and any matters which it may have detained from the water, being removed."

The complainers pleaded;—(1) The complainers being the proprietors of the said burn or watercourse at the place where the drainage or sewage referred to in the prayer of the note is discharged into it, and being also proprietors of the said canal, and the respondents having no authority to carry the said drainage or sewage into the said watercourse and canal, the complainers are entitled to interdict as craved. (3) The carrying of the said drainage or sewage into the said canal being calculated to cause a nuisance, and to injuriously affect the navigation on or use of the said canal, the complainers are entitled to the interdict craved, with expenses.

The respondents pleaded;—(1) In respect the burn above mentioned is the natural channel for receiving the drainage of the respondents' ground, and that their rights as owners are preserved by the Canal Act, they are entitled to continue to drain into the said burn as heretofore. (2) The complainers are not entitled to interdict as craved, in respect that the drainage of the said land has been conveyed into the said burn, and thence into the canal, for a period of more than forty years, or at least for a period exceeding seven years. (3) The prayer of the note ought to be refused, in respect that the respondents are not, and have not been, polluting the canal, to the nuisance of the complainers.

The Lord Ordinary on the Bills passed the note, but refused to grant interdict in hoc statu.

The Lord Ordinary closed the record on the note of suspension and answers. A proof was subsequently taken by the Lord Ordinary, in the course of which the following leading facts were brought out:—

The burn, of the pollution of which the railway company complained, was a small stream of about 250 yards in length, flowing northward from its source through a piece of ground ten yards in breadth belonging to the complainers into the canal. Prior to the operations of the respondents no sewage or drainage of any sort, excepting the ordinary agricultural drainage of the land through which it ran, had found its way into it, and the water had been perfectly pure and suitable for primary purposes. In 1873 the respondents commenced building the village of Auchinsterry, which consisted of four rows of houses, 95 feet apart, facing to the canal, the nearest row to the canal being 120 feet from it. In front of each row, and about 30 feet from the houses, were outhouses, consisting of ashpits, dry privies, and washing-houses, there being a set of outhouses for every six or eight families. At a distance of 40 feet from the houses open drains or syvers were constructed, and at the end of each row there was a cess-pool, the overflow from which was in turn conducted to a filtering apparatus about 50 feet from the burn. This filter consisted of a settling tank, and two other compartments filled with "danders" or engine ashes and coke dust. From this filter a pipe conveyed the overflow into the burn at a point about 30 feet from its outcome into the canal. It was the fluid coming into the canal from this filter that the railway company complained of as causing the nuisance and pollution which they were desirous to stop. The respondents adduced evidence to the effect that the only water which could come into the open syvers was rain water from the roofs of the houses, and the water from the washing-houses which were in communication with the syvers. The privies and ashpits had no connection with these drains, and there were no drains in the houses. The privies were dry privies, and the filth from them was mixed with ashes and regularly removed. The filter was also emptied every six weeks, and fresh "danders" and coke dust put into it. The respondents also employed a man, whose sole duty it was to act as scavenger and clean the privies, syvers, and streets of the village. It was, however, proved that the children and others were in the habit of using both the syvers and the ground round the outhouses instead of the privies, and that, in that manner, and from the emptying of household utensils, offensive sewage found its way into the syvers and thence to the filter and burn. Samples of the outflow from the filter were analysed by chemists for both the parties, and although there was some conflict as to the actual amount of pollution it was abundantly clear that organic matter of an offensive and noxious nature was present in the water in considerable quantity. Flocculent growths and other symptoms of pollution by domestic sewage were also apparent on the stones and sides of the burn below the point at which the outflow entered it. There was a considerable conflict of evidence as to the appearance and odour of the outflow, and of its effect upon the burn and canal, the complainers' witnesses describing it as very offensive and foul, and as polluting the canal to such an extent as to be visible for four or five yards all round the point at which it entered it, while the respondents' witnesses took a much more favourable view of its extent and effect. It was, however, clearly proved that the water of the burn was unfit for drinking or any primary use after the outflow from the filter entered it.

In the course of the proof, the respondents adduced witnesses to depone to the fact that every effort was made by them and their officials to compel the inhabitants to use the privies and ashpits as receptacles for all such filth as might constitute a nuisance, any one contravening the regulations for the use of the drains, &c., being liable to removal after one warning.

On 3d February 1876 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor: —"Finds that the respondents, in the erection of the mining village belonging to them on the lands of Auchinsterry, have provided a system of drainage, by the use of which, in accordance with the purpose and design of the works, sewage or drainage of a grossly polluting kind has been for some time carried into the burn to the west of these lands, and thence into the Forth and Clyde Canal, to the injury of the complainers, and in violation of their legal rights: Finds that in these circumstances, and unless the evil complained of shall be forthwith remedied, the complainers are entitled to the interdict asked; but supersedes consideration of the cause for one month, to allow the respondents an opportunity of stating the means they propose to adopt to prevent further pollution of the water of the burn and canal: Grants leave to reclaim against this interlocutor; and meantime reserves all questions of expenses."*

* "NOTE.— . . . In this state of the facts it does not appear to me to admit of serious doubt that the complainers are entitled to the interdict which they ask.

No. 136. The respondents reclaimed, and argued;—(1) On the evidence there was not sufficient proof of the existence of a nuisance to entitle the Court

June 14, 1876.

Caledonian Railway Co. v. Baird & Co.

It was maintained in argument, on the assumption that the respondents can be regarded as the parties causing the pollution, that they were entitled to run into the burn water polluted to some extent, if the pollution arose from what was called the natural occupation and use of their property. No authority was cited in support of this view, and I see no reason to doubt that the complainers, who have hitherto had a flow of pure wholesome water into and through their lands into the canal, are entitled to resist any material change in the character of the water as a violation of their rights. The erection of a mining village may be a fitting and proper use by the respondents of their property, but in that use they are not entitled to invade the rights of their neighbours by destroying the flow of pure water which has hitherto been enjoyed. They must make their arrangements for disposing of the sewage without invading the rights of the lower heritors, or otherwise discontinue a use of the subjects which involves an invasion of these rights, and which, on that account, is not a proper or lawful use of their property. But, again, it is said the respondents are not the parties who have caused the pollution, or who are responsible for it, and that the complainers' remedy is by interdict against the true wrongdoers—the occupants of the houses. On this point it cannot, I think, be disputed that in erecting so many houses to be occupied by hundreds of persons the respondents were bound to make some provision for carrying off the filth and sewage which is necessarily incident to the occupation of the buildings, without violating the rights of others. If no provision had been made, and the tenants of the houses had been left to discharge filth of every kind directly into the burn, which no doubt they might have been interdicted from doing, I cannot doubt that the respondents would also have been liable to interdict against a use of their property which must necessarily result in pollution of the stream. The respondents have recognised their obligation to make proper drainage or sewage arrangements, and the question is whether the works executed are of a nature sufficient to relieve them from responsibility. If it could be shewn that pollution would not occur from the natural and ordinary uses of these works, which are in all respects sufficient to provide the means of drainage without causing pollution, but has arisen entirely from the wilful acts of the occupants of the houses in declining to avail themselves of the provisions made by the respondents to prevent pollution, the complainers' complaint and remedy might not be against the respondents. But this is not the true state of the facts. The respondents have no doubt made arrangements which will secure that the houses, and outhouses, and surrounding ground, shall be kept free from any permanent accumulation of filth, and so far, as regards the sanitary arrangements for the houses, these arrangements may be entitled to the commendation bestowed on them by some of the witnesses. But the drainage works provided for the use of the village are not only of a kind which will admit of pollution being caused by their misuse, but are such that if used, as it may naturally and reasonably be expected they will be, will and do cause pollution. The respondents' case is that no excretal matter finds its way into the drains, which are used, only as intended, for the liquid refuse from the houses and the draining of the wash-houses. It is clear there is pollution in fact, and if this be as the respondents allege, then the pollution is the direct and inevitable result of their draining scheme, used quite in the way they intended and designed it should be by their tenants. I am of opinion, however, from the evidence, that the drains do carry off to some extent sewage material of a more noxious character than the respondents admit; and, in particular, convey excreta carried out from the houses and thrown into the open gutter, and washed into the gutters in wet weather from the outhouses and surrounding ground. That the drains and gutters are used and act in this way is, I think, the natural result of the situation in which they are placed, for they form the only means of carrying away filth which has accumulated in their neighbourhood in wet weather, and the most likely and convenient means to be used by the inhabitants for getting rid of much of the filth and refuse from their

to interfere.[1] The use that was being made of the land was a natural use, and quite legal. There was no opus manufactum. It could not be said to be an illegal or unusual act to bring a population of human beings to any spot, and whenever there was a population in close proximity to a stream that stream lost its purity. A similar result happened from cultivation: the quantity of surface water was increased, and it was often saturated with manure; still no one was ever interdicted from draining his fields for agricultural purposes.[2] (2) If there was a nuisance it was not really caused by the respondents, and therefore the interdict to prevent the nuisance should not be directed against them.[3] The whole scheme of their system of privies and drains was to obviate anything of this sort. If the privies and syvers were used as they intended them, and endeavoured to cause them to be used, no pollution was possible. All that would flow through the syvers would be surface water, such as would have found its way into the burn and canal from the natural slope of the ground without any drains. The syvers were made for a lawful purpose, and if they were used unlawfully by other persons the landlords could not be held responsible. The illegality, if any, was not in having the drains, but on the part of those who used them improperly, and these were the persons who should be interdicted.

Argued for the complainers;—(1) The respondents had constructed premises which polluted a stream formerly suitable for primary uses. The right to send down clean water did not imply the right to send down dirty houses. On these grounds I am of opinion that the pollution complained of is the result of the use by the inhabitants of the drainage system provided by the respondents which might naturally and reasonably be expected. This being so, the pollution is to be traced to the respondents' works, and for the result of these works the respondents are responsible.

"It does not appear to me that any separate or difficult case arises in reference to the canal as distinguished from the burn. The complainers are entitled to resist the discharge of sewage or polluted drainage water into the canal as effectually as into the burn, but on the other hand their rights are no higher in regard to the canal than in reference to the burn. They have an obvious interest to prevent the water of the canal being made a receptacle for gross impurities, for the water being, comparatively speaking, stagnant, such impurities are calculated to make it most offensive, and so to injure the canal seriously for the purposes of navigation. It is surprising to find from the evidence that at some points considerable quantities of sewage are permitted to run into the canal. The fact that this is so does not, however, give the respondents a right to use the canal in this way for a new village, and it may yet be found that other parties so using the canal have no better right to do so than the respondents.

"As the result of my judgment, the complainers are entitled to put a stop to the present use of the drains leading to the burn and canal. But before granting interdict I think it is reasonable, in the circumstances, that the respondents should be allowed some time to make other arrangements; and while I shall find that the respondents have caused the pollution complained of in violation of the rights of the complainers, I shall in the meantime supersede consideration of the case for one month, to allow the respondents an opportunity of stating what they propose to do to put a stop to the existing evil."

water.[1] (2) With regard to the argument that the landlords here were not the true polluters, and that anything that was done was done against their will, there was no such averment or plea upon record. The only plea taken was that there was no pollution. It had been proved that there was pollution, and so the complainers were entitled to their interdict. The first trace of this defence was in the proof, when the respondents examined their officials. But even if this ground could now be taken it would not avail them, as they were responsible for their tenants, who were removeable at will.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think, in the shape in which the case has now been presented, any difficulty that I felt on one part of it has been entirely removed.

I have no difficulty on the question of nuisance. It is quite clear, I think, from the evidence, that the amount of pollution which is caused by the burn to the canal is greater than it was before, and the superior heritor was not entitled to increase the amount of impurity. But it goes a great deal beyond that; because, making all allowance for difference of opinion among scientific men, it cannot be doubted that the state of the burn between the outlet of the syvers and the canal, and the state of the canal itself where the burn flows into it, is a nuisance in the strongest sense of the word. Neither have I the slightest doubt that the defender, Mr Baird, or his tenants, had no right to do this, and that it was no part of the natural right of the riparian proprietor to discharge these drains into the burn.

The only defence that appeared to be important was that Mr Baird pleaded that he has done nothing which he was not entitled to do; that he provided this means of outlet, not for polluted water, but for clean water, or at least water that would not be productive of a nuisance, and that the bad habits of his tenants in this village have created the nuisance, such as it is. That defence might have had some importance if the facts of the case had been sufficient to sustain it. But in the present case it appears to me that this question does not arise. In the first place, it is not pleaded. Mr Baird not unnaturally assumes the responsibility, and challenges our verdict on that footing; for he raises no question as to his not being the perpetrator of the nuisance, if nuisance there was, but denies that there was a nuisance; and, secondly, he says that he had done no more than exercise the right which he had. Although I do not think there would have been any inconsistency in maintaining both pleas if he had done so, I find nothing in this record which indicates that his defence was that some one else had committed the nuisance, and that he had done nothing to aid or assist it. It turns out that the inhabitants of these houses are his colliers, who are working in his mines, and I suppose receive their habitations as part of their wages, and only as long as they remain his servants. In such a matter as this, I am disposed to look on these men as being entirely under the control of their landlord, and truly as representing him in what they have done, and I think he is responsible for their acts. He can at any time turn them out of their houses; and even if he had pleaded, which he has not done, that they are the wrongdoers, and not he, I should not have been disposed in the circumstances to sustain that plea. I do not think a tenant who has an independent position, even a tenant for a year, would be in the same position with regard to his landlord. The landlord would not then be liable for all the tenant might do. But I regard these men as being truly only the servants of the landlord, occupying these houses as part of their wages; and therefore I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

It is certainly a case involving some hardship in the ultimate result, nor do I very clearly see in what way the rights of parties are to be extricated. But it is not necessary to attend to that at this stage of the proceedings. The Lord Ordinary has in the meantime allowed Mr Baird to say what he proposes to do in order to mitigate the nuisance, and I think that was a very proper thing to do, and it would be well if attention were directed to it. One can see that great inconvenience may arise on the other side; but I have a strong conviction that in the appliances of engineering science some means of abating this nuisance may be found. It may be a matter of money; but in the meantime I think Mr Baird is responsible for the nuisance, and must take means to abate it, or otherwise the interdict here asked must pass against him.

LORD NEAVES.—I am of the same opinion. This is a question on which, in various aspects of the circumstances, nice points of law may arise; for instance, as to the liability of the landlord for what his tenant does wrong. But I do not think these questions arise on this record. I do not say that the judgment in Dunn v. Hamilton was not a right one in its circumstances; but I would not lay it down as a general proposition that a man accused civilly or criminally of a wrong thing—a nuisance or a crime—may not plead so as deny that there is a nuisance, and ultimately to say that if there is he did not commit it. This could not be held to make him liable for another man committing it, if it were held a nuisance, any more than in a case of murder a man could be prevented from pleading both that there was no murder, and that if there was, he had no hand in it. The case here is not what I have there supposed. The statements on record come to this: The Messrs Baird admit—what they could not deny—that their buildings and relative erections are the origin of the pollution that takes place. They mention, however, the expedients they have adopted for preventing the natural consequences arising from their buildings and erections, and from the population which they have thus brought there. They state that they have provided syvers and cesspools, and the question of fact is raised whether at the end of the filtration thus attempted the water is pure or unobjectionable. In one of the articles of their record they change that view into a sort of plea of tu quoque, by saying that the water of the burn is at least as clear and pure as the water of the canal; but the true defence to be extracted from all this is that the filtering ponds and cesspools do purify the water sufficiently for the purpose required. If they fail in that, if it is not proved that they purify the water or make it unobjectionable, I do not see that they have any other available plea. They do not say that they are prevented from doing anything that they wish to do. They take on themselves the responsibility of the arrangements, and plead upon their success. That is the issue raised here. But it is plain that they are the carriers and conveyers of the water as it now stands into the canal. The whole apparatus is their work. The channels made for the water reaching the burn and the canal are of their construction, and the question comes to be, as already indicated, whether the water is in such a state as to be a nuisance? If it is, I see no alternative but to hold them liable for the consequences, and as the proof shews that there is a nuisance, I think the Lord Ordinary is right in giving the Messrs Baird the opportunity which he has allowed them in the interlocutor. I am not quite satisfied with the mode in which it is expressed—"an opportunity of stating the means they propose"—(I do not see that they have proposed any means)—"to adopt to prevent farther pollution." Does that mean additional pollution? I suppose it means future or continued pollution; but that is a mere criticism on the words.

LORD ORMIDALE.—I am of the same opinion. Two questions arise in the case—1st, Has a nuisance been created,—or, in other words, has there been a breach of the laws of neighbourhood? And, 2d, If nuisance has been created, who is answerable for the consequences, or rather, are the respondents answerable for the consequences?

In regard to the first of these questions I concur with your Lordship in thinking that there can be no reasonable ground for doubt. The proof is to my mind quite conclusive to the effect that a nuisance has been created. It was indeed conceded that there was sufficient evidence of the canal having been made more offensive and more a nuisance than it had been originally. The canal, like all canals, did not, I suppose, contain the very purest water, and probably it was not fit for primary purposes; but the defenders were not entitled to make it worse. They might, on any other assumption, go from one step or degree to another till they rendered the canal so completely a puddle that it would be impossible for the ordinary traffic to be carried on. I entertain no doubt whatever therefore on the first of the disputed questions.

The other question might be a very nice one in many circumstances, but it appears to me that in the circumstances of this case there is not much difficulty, and I think the Dean of Faculty before he concluded made that very clear. The case of Dunn v. Hamilton was a very different one from the present. There the landlord, who was sought to be made answerable, as well as his tenant, had granted a lease, and he not only denied the existence of a nuisance, but he maintained that the purpose for which the lease was granted, viz., a dyework, was not calculated to create a nuisance,—he adopted, in short, the defence of the tenant on that footing, and accordingly, when it turned out that it did create a nuisance, he was held to be identified with the tenant, and equally responsible. But the present case is quite different. The Messrs Baird do not identify themselves with their tenants. They deny, no doubt, that there is any nuisance, but alternatively (and I think they are entitled so to put it) they say if a nuisance has been created they did not authorise it, and it was not the necessary consequence of anything they did. But the facts on which this branch of the case depends undoubtedly shew that they are responsible. They erected the village for the occupation of their own workers; they established the system of drainage, but they did not do so in such a manner as to render the water pure or free from pollution where it was passed into the burn and from thence into the canal. It is in this way the evil complained of has arisen. But having thus established the system of drainage, and having also assumed the control of it, they in a manner told their work people—the inhabitants of the village—"You have nothing to do with the drainage or sewerage, we will attend to that, and you may rely upon us to do so." They have failed, however, to do so in such a way as to preserve the burn and canal from pollution, and therefore they must take the consequences.

In these circumstances, and without going the length of holding as a universal and absolute proposition that every proprietor who erects a number of houses into a village is bound in all circumstances to prevent pollution, I entirely agree with your Lordship in thinking that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is in this case well founded, and ought to be adhered to.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am entirely of the same opinion as your Lordship in the chair.

I regard this case as one of very considerable importance to the general law, because it raises the question how far a landowner, who is laying out his ground for feuing or for the erection of houses, is bound to take the necessary precautions to secure that a pure and potable stream which flows through his property shall continue to be transmitted in the same state to the heritor below him. Now, I think the upper heritor is bound to do whatever is necessary to secure that the stream which he found pure and potable shall not be destroyed by his operations. In the present case there is no material dispute as to the facts, and there can be no great variety of opinion as to the true circumstances in which the question arises. I think it is completely proved, first, that this burn was a pure and potable stream, fit for primary uses, before the respondents' village of Auchinsterry was erected. In the next place, I think it is proved that since this mining village of Auchinsterry was erected there the burn is no longer a pure and potable stream, fit for primary uses, but is a polluted and polluting stream. And, in the third place, I think it is proved that the source of the pollution which has made the change on the burn is sewage water introduced into the burn from the houses erected by the respondents. I use the word "sewage" in its large and general sense—polluted fluid coming from dwelling-houses, or from inhabited houses, or from a village, or from streets where men and women reside. Now, I do not think that there is any good distinction between pollution created by sewage and pollution which is created by any other means by which water is made dirty, and rendered unfit for the primary uses to which it had formerly been applied. Sometimes the refuse from a manufactory may create a greater nuisance than ordinary sewage, but this is a mere question of degree, and sewage from a populous district is often worse both in quantity and in intensity than the refuse of manufactories. Understanding, then, by sewage, in the general sense of the word, all the polluted fluid which comes from human dwellings, the question really is—Is it lawful to pollute and destroy a pure stream by sewage water? Of course, there will always be questions of degree. A single dwelling may produce no appreciable injury, and the case was put of a hydropathic establishment, where, although much water was used, it was said there was no apparent pollution. But in the ordinary case, where a new village is at once erected near a small stream, and where the whole polluted water created in the houses is discharged directly or indirectly into the stream, the result will be that the water of the stream is destroyed for drinking or for domestic purposes. In the present case this is the result. I think it is proved that the polluted water comes from the village of Auchinsterry, and is sent down or flows down a drain or pipe, cesspools, and filtering ponds, and ultimately into a discharge pipe, all the property of, and all constructed and maintained and upheld by the respondents. This discharge of sewage, even although it may be partially filtered, destroys the burn for primary and domestic purposes. Now, what is the law in a case of this kind? The respondents conceded that if the pollutions were caused by a manufactory or by artificial operations it could be stopped and interdicted by the lower heritor. But they maintained that it was otherwise if the pollution were caused as they said "naturally" by ordinary sewage from ordinary dwelling-houses. In such a case it was argued the pollution must be submitted to. I cannot assent to this doctrine. I think the law may be laid down, and I am disposed to lay it down in very broad terms, that an upper proprietor is not entitled in any circumstances or by any means whatever to pollute a pure and potable stream which passes through his property, and to send it down changed into an impure and unwholesome stream upon his neighbour's property. I cannot go along with the argument so ably maintained by Mr Balfour that in the case of ordinary dwelling-houses erected in bona fide, in the usual way, and sine animo injuriandi, the evil is practically inevitable, and therefore that the upper proprietor has a right to cause it. I think he has no right to cause it. If he cannot erect a village without polluting this stream, and, it may be, depriving his neighbours of their only supply of pure water, then he can let the village alone. He is under no obligation to build a village any more than to build a manufactory. I do not see that he has any right to interfere with the property of another man by building a village for his own behoof. No doubt he may use his own property for any lawful purpose; but the rule is he must so use it as not to injure his neighbour. I do not think it necessary to go into the nice and speculative questions about agricultural drainage, and how far agricultural drainage tainted with agricultural manure might or might not be stopped by inferior proprietors. Very difficult questions may arise in such cases, and there will always be a broad distinction between natural percolation through soils or strata and the actual discharge of polluting matter into a running stream. It is enough for the present case to find that an upper proprietor cannot in any circumstances send sewage water into a pure stream to the effect of destroying that stream for its primary uses. I think this is the result of the cases referred to. One of these cases was a very strong one. It was that of a city where there were hundreds of thousands of inhabitants, and it was said—"Where are they to send their sewage?" The answer was—wherever they liked, but not into their neighbour's property—not so as to destroy the land or the water belonging to those who happen to be on a lower level and so fitted to receive the polluting discharge. And this was the judgment of the Court. A stronger case than this could hardly be, and it is an a fortiori case to the present.

Nor is there any real hardship in holding that a person who produces polluted or polluting refuse must himself dispose of it otherwise than by putting it upon his neighbour's property. Its production will be lessened, or uses will be found for it in the end far better than merely throwing it down or leaving it to run over on the unfortunate residents who dwell below.

The only remaining point of the case is this: Who are the true authors of the nuisance? Is this pollution substantially caused by the defenders, and is the remedy asked for the proper one? I think it is. If the respondents had demised all their property, including this system of drainage, to somebody else who had the sole control, or if they had feued the property generally, and the vassal had erected the villas or houses, the case would have been quite different; but the proprietors of this village are the Messrs Baird, they draw the rents, and they let the property as it is. The system of drainage is exclusively the property of the respondents, devised and upheld by them alone, and it is by means of that system of drainage that the injurious substances which destroy the complainers' pure stream are sent into it. I cannot hold that any remedy lies at the instance of the complainers against the tenants. One tenant might be interdicted from doing a particular thing, but the sewage will still come down that stream, and it is very conclusive against the respondents to see that they intended it so to come down, that they made provision for sewage water coming down in that way, making the ordinary arrangements for stopping the solid sewage by means of cesspools, and ultimately by means of a filtering tank, but leaving the fluid sewage, which is the thing that does the mischief, to flow from the cesspools into the filtering tank, and from the filtering tank direct into the stream, which it absolutely destroys. I cannot doubt that the respondents are doing the thing complained of. It is asked, what will happen if nothing is done, and the case comes up for breach of interdict? and the question is a proper one, because I quite agree that the Court is bound to take care that they do not give such an interdict as it is impossible to enforce, or such an interdict as the parties against whom it is directed cannot really obey. But I do not see that there is any difficulty as to that. I have a little doubt with Lord Neaves as to the words of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, for he finds "that unless the evil complained of shall be forthwith remedied the complainers are entitled to the interdict asked." I hesitate about affirming that, because it defines what we are going to interdict. The pursuers are entitled to have a remedy, to have the pollution stopped, and when we come to frame the terms of the interdict I think there will be no difficulty in doing it. The thing to be prevented is the discharging of polluted water from the village of Auchinsterry into this pure burn by means of any apparatus belonging to the respondents for that purpose. I do not think we could prevent a miner from running out at night with refuse and throwing it into the stream. That would not be a thing for which Messrs Baird would be answerable, but they must not leave this drain and these pipes and filtering tanks to overflow into and pollute the burn. That is what I am prepared to interdict if Messrs Baird do not adopt some remedy in the meantime. I do not doubt that a remedy is possible, and if it is said that the matter may be worse than ever if the present system is put a stop to, there will be another remedy for that, viz., a proceeding under the Sanitary Acts, or a prohibition with reference to inhabiting these house. I take a pretty strong view of this case. I think this burn must at all hazards be kept pure. It might be the only water supply for these parties. I do not think anything turns on the fact that it runs into the canal, because it might be the only supply for miles along the canal for their workmen drinking. I know nothing about that. All I know is that the canal company are the proprietors of this pure and potable stream, and I think they are entitled to assert their right to it by interdict against anybody who makes it unfit for primary uses.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Refuse the said reclaiming note, and adhere to the interlocutor complained of, with the variation that the month thereby allowed to the respondents shall run from this date: Find the respondents liable in expenses," &c.

JAMES PARK, &c. (Park's Trustees), First Parties.—Kinnear.
WILLIAM PARK, Second Party.—Adam.
JAMES PARK, &c. (Park's Tutors), Third Parties.—J. C. Lorimer.

Special Case—Competency—Process—Minor.—Held that the Court could not entertain a special case presented by certain persons for their own interest, and also as tutors for pupil children having an adverse interest.

Observed that a special case is a contract fixing the parties to a certain statement of facts, and therefore that persons incapable of contracting cannot enter into a special case.

1st DIVISION. B.

WHEN this special case appeared in the Single Bills, counsel for the third parties, the tutors appointed by the truster to the pupil children of William Park, asked the Court to appoint a tutor ad litem to the pupils, in respect that the children had an adverse interest to the tutors.

At advising, the opinion of the Court was delivered by the LORD PRESIDENT.—The Court are of opinion that they cannot entertain this special case. The first parties are the testamentary trustees of the late James Park. These gentlemen are three nephews of the late Mr Park. The second party is William Park, another nephew of the late Mr Park. The third parties are the same individuals as the first parties, but in the separate character of tutors appointed by the late Mr Park to certain pupil children. Now, there is an adverse interest between the first parties and the second party, between the first parties and the third parties, and between the second party and the third parties. The effect of this special case, which is necessarily a contract, is to bind the pupil children through these tutors to a certain statement of facts. We cannot entertain a special case between parties who are not entitled to contract. If it is necessary to have the question decided at present the parties must resort to the ordinary form of a declarator.

THE HIGHLAND RAILWAY COMPANY, Petitioners and Appellants.—D.-F. Watson—Mackintosh.

Railway Clauses (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. c. 33), sec. 90—Tolls—Lien.—The 90th section of the Railway Clauses Act enacts that "if on demand any person fail to pay the tolls due in respect of any carriage or goods it shall be lawful for the company to detain and sell such carriage, or all or any part of such goods, or, if the same shall have been removed from the premises of the company, to detain and sell any other carriages or goods within such premises belonging to the party liable to pay such tolls."

The interpretation clause (sec. 3) bears that "the following words and expressions, both in this and the special Act, shall have the meanings hereby assigned to them, unless there be something in the subject or context repugnant to such construction. . . . . The word 'toll' shall include any rate or charge or other payment payable under the special Act for any passenger, animal, carriage, goods, merchandise, articles, matters, or things conveyed on the railway."

Held (1) that the word "tolls," as used in the 90th section, was to be construed as meaning tolls proper, or payments for the use of the line by persons using their own carriages, the language of the 90th section being repugnant to the wider construction of the word given in the interpretation clause; and therefore (2) that the remedies given by the 90th section were not available for the recovery of charges for goods carried by the railway company as common carriers.

Highland Railway Co. v. Jackson.
1st Division. M.

THE Highland Railway Company presented this petition to the Sheriff of Inverness-shire on 23d November 1874, for authority to sell three bags of wool and other goods in their possession belonging to Nicol and Company, manufacturers, Inverness, and to apply the proceeds in payment of an account for railway carriages from 1st July to 9th September 1874, amounting to £26, 17s. 1d. The petitioners founded on the Railway Clauses (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 90, and the interpretation clause, sec. 3.*

Nicol and Company's estates were sequestrated on 9th September 1874, and the trustee, Mr Jackson, opposed the petition. He pleaded;—(1) The petitioners, as common carriers, have not a general lien at common law. (2) Nor have the petitioners any such lien in virtue of the Railway Clauses Act of 1845, the right of lien thereby conferred being confined to goods undelivered; and the petitioners having ceded possession of the goods mentioned in their account, other than those stated in the petition, their right of lien over the former was relinquished, and cannot now be revived.

It was admitted that the petitioners were in the habit of keeping a monthly account with Nicol and Company; that they gave credit for the carriages mentioned in the account, other than the carriages of the goods mentioned in the petition; and that they voluntarily delivered the other goods in the ordinary way of business.

The Sheriff-substitute (Blair) pronounced this interlocutor:—(After findings in fact)—"Finds in law that the provisions of the said 90th section of the said Act apply to charges for the carriages of goods, and are not limited to the tolls for the use of the road, and that when the petitioners have within their premises goods belonging to their debtor, they may detain and sell the same for the payment of the tolls due for the carriage of other goods which have been removed without payment: Therefore repels the defences stated for the respondent, sustains the pleas in law stated for the petitioners, and grants warrant as craved in the petition," &c.

On appeal, the Sheriff (Ivory) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recalls the interlocutor appealed against: Finds that the estates of Nicol and Company were sequestrated on 9th September 1874, and were as at the said date transferred to and vested in the respondent as trustee for behoof of their creditors: Finds that on 23d November 1874, being the date when the present petition was presented, the goods mentioned therein, and a warrant to sell which was craved by the petitioners, had ceased to be the property of Nicol and Company, and then belonged in property to the respondent, as trustee on their bankrupt estate: Finds in point of

* 8 and 9 Vict. c. 33, sec. 90.—"If on demand any person fail to pay the tolls due in respect of any carriage or goods, it shall be lawful for the company to detain and sell such carriage, or all or any part of such goods, or, if the same shall have been removed from the premises of the company, to detain and sell any other carriages or goods within such premises belonging to the party liable to pay such tolls, and out of the monies arising from such sale to retain the tolls payable as aforesaid, and all charges and expenses of such detention and sale, rendering the overplus, if any, of the monies arising by such sale, and such of the carriages and goods as remain unsold, to the person entitled thereto, or it shall be lawful for the company to recover any such tolls by action at law."

Sec. 3.—"The following words and expressions, both in this and the special Act, shall have the meanings hereby assigned to them, unless there be something in the subject or context repugnant to such construction. . . . . The word 'toll' shall include any rate or charge or other payment payable under the special Act for any passenger, animal, carriage, goods, merchandise, articles, matters, or things conveyed on the railway."

law that the petitioners were not entitled to have the said goods sold, and the proceeds applied in payment of the account for carriages due to them by Nicol and Company: Therefore refuses the prayer of the petition, and decerns."

The petitioners appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for the petitioners;—1. The transference of the bankrupt's estates to the trustee could not prejudice the petitioners' lien. 2. The word "toll" in the 90th section was comprehensive enough to include ordinary charges for carriage. That was apparent from the interpretation clause. The word was also used quite generally in the special Act.[1] The point was expressly decided by Lord Shand in the Caledonian Railway Company v. Guild.[2] It was assumed in North British Railway Company v. Carter.[3] 3. The word "removal" in the section naturally covered delivery in the ordinary course of business.

Argued for the respondent;—When the clause was read with the context it clearly appeared that tolls and carriages were distinguished. That was decided in England.[4] The report in the Law Reports was imperfect, which misled Lord Shand. This limited meaning of the word "tolls" had been held to be the meaning in the 88th section.[5] The meaning was the same in the General Turnpike Act, which contained a similar provision for detention and sale of goods for non-payment of tolls.[6] Removal meant improper removal.[7]

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—When Nicol and Company, manufacturers in Inverness, became bankrupt, on 9th September 1874, they were owing to the Highland Railway Company, the appellants, an account of £26, 17s. 1d. for the carriage of goods by the railway company as public carriers between the 1st of July of that year and the date of the bankruptcy, and the railway company were at that time in possession of three bags of wool, one truss tweeds, and three bundles of empty sheets, forming part of the bankrupt estate. They presented a petition to the Sheriff for warrant to sell these goods, under the authority of the 90th section of the Railway Clauses Act, 1845, for the purpose of imputing the proceeds of the sale in extinction pro tanto of the account due to them. The demand was resisted by the trustee of Nicol and Company, upon the ground that the 90th section of the Railway Clauses Act did not apply to such a case. The Sheriff-substitute was of opinion that it did apply, and granted the remedy asked by the railway company. The Sheriff altered that judgment, but upon the ground, which was plainly untenable, that the lien claimed by the railway company was not available, because the goods in their hands were no longer part of the estate of Nicol and Company but were the property of the trustee,—that being the very situation of matters which makes the lien available. But the question which is raised under this petition is one of great importance and of very general application, and it depends upon a consideration of the meaning of

The state of the case is this, that the railway company were in the habit of carrying goods for the bankrupts as common carriers, and they allowed Nicol and Company to run an account; in short, they gave them credit for the amount of the charges for the carriage of the goods, and settled the account apparently quarterly, or at some other period. The consequence was that this sum was due when Nicol and Company became bankrupt for the carriage of goods by the railway company, and they proposed to detain and sell, under the authority of the 90th section, the goods remaining in their hands, for payment not only of the carriage of those particular goods, but also for the carriage of all the other goods contained in the account. Now, the contention of the trustee is that the 90th section does not apply to charges for the carriage of goods by the railway company as common carriers, but applies only to tolls in the proper and limited sense of that word. There are other and subordinate questions raised by this record, but that is the most important. A great deal undoubtedly depends on the meaning of the word "tolls" in the statute, but I think it is quite clear that tolls is throughout it a word of varying meaning. It sometimes means one thing, and sometimes another. It sometimes means tolls in the proper sense of the word,—that is to say, tolls levied from persons using the railway with their own carriages; and it sometimes means or comprehends charges for carriage by the railway company as common carriers. The definition of the word in the interpretation clause is undoubtedly comprehensive enough to embrace both of these things. But certainly the word "tolls" itself is not always used in this statute in a comprehensive sense.

The sections of the statute which are connected with the 90th begin with the 79th, and the preface (if it may be so called) of the 79th section is expressed in these words,—"And with respect to the carrying of passengers and goods upon the railway, and tolls to be taken thereon, be it enacted as follows." This general introduction shews that the sections which follow, from the 79th down to and including the 100th, relate to these two subjects, viz.,—the carrying of passengers and goods upon the railway, and the tolls to be taken thereon,—that is, on the railway. Now, the interpretation clause provides that "tolls" is to be held to include "any rate or charge, or other payment payable under the special Act for any passenger, animal, carriage, goods, merchandise, articles, matters, or things conveyed on the railway." That, as I said before, is very comprehensive, and would, in my opinion, embrace both tolls in the proper sense of the word and also charges for carriage. But, then, the word is to have that meaning only unless there be something in the subject or context repugnant to such construction, and the true question for consideration, therefore, is whether in the subject and context of the 90th section we find anything repugnant to the comprehensive construction of the word. Reverting again to the class of sections beginning with the 79th, I may observe that in that section, referring undoubtedly to the carriage and conveyance of goods and passengers by the railway company in their carriages, the meaning of the word "tolls" is really charges for the carriage of passengers and goods. But in the 80th section, which immediately follows, it is just as clear that it is used in the other sense, and means tolls proper only,—that is, tolls for the use of the railway by the carriages of other people. The 81st and 82d sections are not important in connection with this question, because they relate to special contracts with other railway companies; but in the 83d section, and also in the 84th, it appears to me that the word is used in its most comprehensive sense,—that is to say, that it includes both tolls proper and charges for carriage. But then, when we come to the 85th section, we have another illustration of the varying use of this word, because this section provides that "it shall not be lawful for the company at any time to demand or take a greater amount of toll, or make any greater charge for the carriage of passengers and goods, than they are by this and the special Act authorised to demand." There the word is used in contrast or contradistinction to the term "charge for the carriage of passengers and goods," and of course accordingly in its most limited sense. Now, if one were to seek for an illustration of a repugnancy such as is contemplated in the interpretation clause we could not find it better than in this 85th section. There is an absolute repugnance there in the context and subject-matter of the clause. You could not by possibility construe "toll" there as meaning anything but toll proper. I am not desirous to say much as to the meaning of secs. 86 and 88, for this reason, that while in the case of the Scottish North-Eastern Railway Company v. Anderson this Court decided that, under the 88th section, the term is used in its most restricted sense, as meaning tolls for the use of the railway by the carriages of other persons, they did not extend that interpretation to the 86th section, which is very intimately connected with the 88th; and as a question may perhaps hereafter be raised upon the meaning of the 86th section, distinct from the 88th, I desire to offer no opinion on the matter at present. But at least one thing is clear, as settled by the case of the Scottish North-Eastern Railway Company v. Anderson, that section 88 is confined to tolls in the proper sense of the word,—that is to say, for the use of the railway by the carriages of other persons; and the 89th section, following up that meaning, provides, "that the tolls shall be paid to such persons and at such places upon or near to the railway, and in such manner, and under such regulations as the company shall by notice to be annexed to the list of tolls appoint." Now, here I do not think there can be any doubt that the word is used in the same sense as in the immediately preceding section—the 88th—because a payment for the carriage of goods is not a kind of thing that is to be "paid to such persons and at such places upon or near the railway as the company may appoint." The carriage of goods is paid upon their delivery. In the case of common carriers the delivery of the goods and the payment of the charge for carriage are simultaneous, and that is not a thing to be paid upon the railway, or to persons stationed upon the railway, at all, but is to be paid at the place of delivery. The two sections, therefore, immediately preceding section 90, undoubtedly use the word "tolls" in its more restricted and proper sense.

Now comes section 90 itself—"If on demand any person fail to pay the tolls due in respect of any carriage or goods it shall be lawful for the company to detain and sell such carriage, or all or any part of such goods, or, if the same shall have been removed from the premises of the company, to detain and sell any other carriages or goods within such premises belonging to the party liable to pay such tolls, and out of the monies arising from such sale to retain the tolls payable as aforesaid, and all charges and expenses of such detention and sale, rendering the overplus, if any, of the monies arising by such sale, and such of the carriages and goods as shall remain unsold, to the person entitled thereto, or it shall be lawful for the company to recover any such tolls by action at law." The construction which the railway company put upon this clause is, that "tolls" here means not only tolls for the use of the railway by the carriages of other persons, but also charges for carriage, the result of which is that the section, according to their construction, is an extension of the common law lien of common carriers to goods other than those for which the charges are due; and I rather think that in the present case they go somewhat further, looking to the way in which they run up an account for charges, and must hold that this introduces into the law of common carriers, so far as railway companies are concerned, a lien for a general balance of accounts.

Now, it appears to me that it would be very remarkable if any such change upon the law of common carriers were introduced in this form, and under cover of such words, for I do not think—reading this section even by itself and without reference to the other sections which surround it both before and after—that that is the natural meaning of the words at all. The thing which is spoken of—the subject of the clause, if it may be so called—is the refusal of persons to pay tolls due in respect of any carriage or goods. Now, it is somewhat remarkable that that phrase "carriage or goods"—"tolls due in respect of any carriage or goods"—appears in this clause for the first time. It is not used in any of these clauses previously, but it is used in some of the subsequent sections, and I think it is used throughout in the same manner. The power of the railway company is not to retain the goods. The power is to detain and sell. If the common law right of a carrier to retain goods till his charge for carriage is paid were the thing in contemplation here, and if it was the purpose to extend that lien, I think the word "detain" would not have been used, but the word "retain," which is more properly descriptive of that right which a carrier has at common law, and of the mode of enforcing that right. Then it provides, that if the carriage or goods shall have been removed from the premises of the company, they are to be entitled to detain and sell any other carriages or goods. Here again there is a phrase very well worthy of attention. The carriage or goods must have been removed from the premises, that is, from the railway, in order to entitle the company to detain and sell other carriages or goods for the unpaid tolls. If this was intended to apply to goods carried by the company, and retained in security of unpaid charges, I think the phrase would not have been "if the same shall have been removed," and I cannot think that in the present case the goods in question have been removed within the meaning of this clause; because what was done with the goods in the present instance was simply that the railway company delivered them, as they were bound to do as common carriers, but delivered them without exacting payment of their charges for the carriage. It appears to me, therefore, that the language of this section itself creates a repugnancy to the larger use of the word "tolls" permitted by the interpretation clause of the statute under certain circumstances.

But I beg attention further, particularly to sections 91, 92, and 94, where I think the language employed is very instructive in helping the construction of section 90. Section 91 provides, that "Every person, being the owner or having the care of any carriage or goods passing or being upon the railway, shall on demand give to the collector of tolls at the places where he attends for the purpose of receiving goods, or of collecting tolls for the part of the railway on which such carriage or goods may have travelled, or be about to travel, an exact account in writing signed by him of the number or quantity of goods conveyed by any such carriage, and of the point on the railway from which such carriage or goods have set out," and so forth. I suppose no one can dispute that the carriage and goods spoken of in that section refer to the carriage of a person using the railway with his own carriage and carrying goods in it, and it is very important to observe that the same phrase, "any carriage or goods," is repeated here just as it was used in the 90th section itself. It is applied entirely to this class—to a carriage or goods using the railway, but not being carried by the railway company as common carriers. Then, in the 92d section it is quite plain that the subject of this clause is carriages and goods belonging to the persons using the railway with their own carriages and paying tolls therefor, and that the language here is throughout quite in accordance with the language of the 90th section. The 93d section, I may mention in passing, clearly applies to tolls in the proper sense, and refers disputes concerning these tolls to the Sheriff or Justices. So, too, in the 94th section, which provides, that "If any difference arise between any toll-collector or other officer or servant of the company, and any owner of or person having the charge of any carriage passing or being upon the railway, or of any goods conveyed or to be conveyed by such carriage, respecting the weight, quantity, quality, or nature of such goods, such collector or other officer may lawfully detain such carriage or goods, and examine, weigh, gauge, or otherwise measure the same," and so forth. Now, taking all these clauses together, from the 88th to the 94th inclusive, I am of opinion that they all, without exception, refer to carriages with goods passing along the railway being the property of other persons than the railway company, and that the word "tolls" in all these clauses is used in its restricted sense as a toll taken for the passage of the carriage and goods along the railway.

The remedy given in the 90th section itself is a very intelligible and suitable remedy for an attempted evasion of the tolls. If persons passing along a road contrive to get off the road before the toll is paid, and so evade the toll-collector, the necessity for some summary remedy at once suggests itself. They ought to have paid the toll at the proper place appointed for its payment, and to the person placed there in charge to receive it, and we were reminded, not inappropriately, that there are remedies of the same kind for the evading of tolls on turnpike roads, and therefore it is quite intelligible that a clause of this kind should be introduced to give a summary and very stringent remedy for such an evasion of tolls. And it seems to me that the whole language of the 90th section is in harmony with that idea, and that none of the words used in that section can be naturally applied to a lien for the carriage of goods by the railway company acting as common carriers.

I have thus stated my view of the construction of the Act of Parliament without referring to any of the authorities which have been cited, but it would be improper to conclude my observations without mentioning these authorities. There was a case in this Division of the Court which was referred to by the Sheriff-substitute—the case of the North British Railway Company v. Carter—in which it was assumed that the 90th section does apply to charges for the carriage of goods by the railway company as common carriers, and there was no objection made on the part of the opposite party, the trustee in the sequestration, to such a construction of the section. Accordingly we assumed, in giving our judgment, that the 90th section would cover the case of charges for carriage. We did not give any effect to the lien claimed, because we thought it objectionable on other grounds, but we undoubtedly assumed in that case, without any argument or objection, that such was the construction of the 90th section. I need hardly say that we had not on that occasion thoroughly considered either the words of the 90th section itself, or the other aids to its interpretation to which I have now adverted, and therefore that cannot be taken to be a judgment on the question which is now before us. In the case of the Caledonian Railway Company v. Guild there is a judgment by Lord Shand on the construction of this clause, where he arrives at a result the opposite of that which I have stated, and I regret that I cannot concur with his Lordship in the very elaborate opinion which he there expresses. I see also there are some obiter dicta in the case of Peebles v. The Caledonian Company which give some countenance to the larger construction contended for by the railway company here, but these are obiter dicta only, and are certainly not binding upon us as authority.

There is thus, I think, no direct authority upon this question in Scotland; but there is a case of Wallis v. The London and North-Western Company, decided in the Court of Exchequer in England, which is a direct authority in support of the view I have just expressed. The case, as reported in the ordinary Law Reports, appears a case of much less authority than it really is, because upon that report the impression conveyed to one's mind is that the point was suggested by the Court in the course of the argument, and very summarily dealt with. But on looking at the much fuller report of the case in the Law Journal reports, it appears quite clear that the question as to the construction of the 97th section of the English Act, which corresponds to the 90th section of the Scotch Act, was raised and pleaded, and formed the subject of a distinct argument by counsel, and of a deliberate consideration by the Court; and there was there a unanimous judgment affirming that more limited construction of the word "tolls" in the 90th section, which I think is the true construction. I feel, therefore, much satisfaction in finding myself, in forming the opinion I have formed, supported by this direct and weighty authority.

I am of opinion, therefore, upon these grounds, and without going further, that this petition ought to have been refused by the Sheriff.

LORD DEAS.—I quite concur in the judgment of your Lordship, and in the grounds of it.

LORD ARDMILLAN and LORD MURE concurred.

GLASGOW CORPORATION GAS COMMISSIONERS, Appellants.—M'Laren—Balfour.
SOLICITOR OF INLAND REVENUE, Respondent.—D.-F. Watson—Rutherfurd.

Revenue—Statute 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35 (Property and Income-Tax Act, 1842), sec. 100, sch. D.—The Glasgow Corporation Gas Act, 1869, authorised the corporation to acquire certain gas-works, and to manufacture and sell gas to the inhabitants. The Act provided that the surplus revenue, after payment of annuities and interest of debt, should be applied to a sinking fund to reduce the debt, and to the general purposes of the corporation. Held that the corporation

June 20, 1876. Glasgow Gas Commissioners v. Inland Revenue.

Observations on The Glasgow Corporation Water Commissioners v. Inland Revenue, ante, vol. ii. p. 708.

1st Division. B.

THE Glasgow Corporation Gas Commissioners appealed against an assessment made upon them under schedule D of the Income-Tax Acts for the year 1875-76 on the sum of £62,083, the alleged profits of the gas-works, and maintained that under the decision in the case of The Glasgow Corporation Water Commissioners v. Inland Revenue,[1] they were only assessable, under the Property and Income-Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, sec. 100), for their annuities, interest on mortgages, and feu-duties, from which they were entitled to retain the tax on payment.

The following case was stated by the Glasgow Income-Tax Commissioners :—

"The facts are these: By 'The Glasgow Corporation Gas Act, 1869,' the Glasgow Gas Light Company and the City and Suburban Gas Company of Glasgow, with all their privileges, obligations, and liabilities, were transferred to and vested in the municipal corporation of the city.

"The corporation are authorised to supply gas to the city of Glasgow and suburbs. They are also required to pay the shareholders of the original companies perpetual annuities to the extent of £34,762, 10s., and in the event of there being any deficiency of funds to pay these annuities they are authorised to assess the occupiers of all lands and heritages situated within the parliamentary and municipal boundaries of the city of Glasgow at a rate not exceeding 6d. per pound on the real rent or yearly value of such lands and heritages.

"The corporation are also empowered to borrow money, not exceeding £1,000,000 sterling, on mortgage, for the purposes of their carrying the Act into execution. They are further required, by section 83 [quoted in the Lord President's opinion], to set apart as a sinking fund a sum not less than one per centum per annum on the amount borrowed, which fund is to be applied in the redemption of the mortgages or annuities, and must never be less than £2000. They are further empowered to manufacture and sell gas, gas-pipes, and lamps, and carry on such operations and business as are for the time being usually carried on by gas companies. The price charged by the corporation must not exceed 4s. 7d. per 1000 cubic feet."

Section 86 enacts—"The corporation shall apply all monies from time to time received by them under the powers of this Act (not being money borrowed, or money for the application of which provision is hereinbefore made) in manner and order following, and not otherwise—'First, In payment of the expenses of and incidental to the raising, levying, and recovering the rents, charges, and revenues, and the borrowing of monies under this Act. Secondly, In payment of the expenses of managing and maintaining the gas-works of the corporation. Thirdly, In payment of the Glasgow corporation gas annuities, and annuities to holders of funded debt, and interest of money borrowed under this Act. Fourthly, In carrying the several powers and provisions of this Act into execution, including any extension and improvement of the gas-works and mains, and may carry any balance thereof to the credit of the corporation for their general purposes.'

"In support of their preliminary objection the corporation stated— . . . . The corporation admit their liability to pay tax on the annuities, interest, and feu-duties; but they maintain that they are not liable for income-tax on any surplus after payment of the working expenditure, nor for the sinking fund (which in the case of the water company were found not to be assessable), as such an assessment would be practically one on means and substance.

"It was submitted that the case of the gas-works is substantially the same as that of the water-works, in which it has been found by the Court of Exchequer that there can be no profits in the sense of the Income-tax Acts. The expenses and revenue are intended to meet each other, and if there happen to be a surplus it is simply carried forward to aid in reducing the price of gas in the succeeding year.

"The charge for gas in this case is cost price as nearly as can be estimated, and is simply 'a district rate' imposed by the corporation upon themselves, and payable in proportion as they use the article. The object of the corporation in taking over the undertakings of the old gas companies was to save profits, and give the inhabitants gas at cost price. There are no profits belonging to any one for his patrimonial interest, and no individual is enriched by the exercise of the statutory powers of the corporation, who are merely gratuitous trustees for the general community; and though the corporation have power to apply the surplus to their general purposes they have never done so, and have refused to do it, any surplus being always carried to next year's account.

"It was argued on behalf of the Crown that in the case of the water-works the whole point was whether the monies collected by means of a compulsory general district rate, under the authority of an Act of Parliament, could be regarded as profit; and the Court held that they could not be so regarded, because the rate must be, and was, adjusted so as to cover the expense incident to the supply of water, and leave no surplus.

"In the case of the gas-works there is no obligation upon any householder in Glasgow to have pipes laid down to his house or to burn gas, and the amounts paid by those to whom gas is supplied are in no respect general or compulsory rates, but are payments made according to the quantity consumed, and in conformity with contracts between the consumer and corporation.

"It was further submitted that it is a commercial undertaking.

"By section 54 of the said Act of 1869 the Glasgow Corporation is 'empowered to manufacture, purchase, supply, sell, let, lay down, place, and maintain gas fittings, meters, pillars, pipes, lamp-posts, lamps, burners, and other articles and things connected with gas-works, or with the supply of gas for public or private consumption, in such manner as the corporation think proper, and generally may carry on such operations and business as are for the time being usually carried on by gas companies.'

"Again, they compete beyond the municipal boundaries with other gas companies, which are purely commercial undertakings, and sell their gas at the same price as the corporation do.

"Further, by the last part of section 86 of the said Act (quoted supra), the corporation are empowered to carry any balance or surplus to the credit of the corporation for their general purposes, clearly shewing that it is anticipated that profits will be realised; and these profits, when so realised, may be applied as part of the common good.

"No such powers and privileges as those conferred on the corporation by sections 54 and 86 of the Gas-Works Acts are contained in the Water-Works Acts, so that the two cases are not the same in principle, nor are they analogous.

"It was therefore maintained that the assessment was correct, and should be affirmed.

"The Commissioners, having considered the case, were of opinion that there was no difference in principle between the two cases; and, as the trust existed for the benefit of the community, they sustained the appeal, and restricted the assessment to the amount of the annuities, interest, and feu-duties—say £59,712.

No. 139. June 20, 1876. Glasgow Gas Commissioners v. Inland Revenue.

"A case was then craved on behalf of the Crown for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer."

Lord Shand appointed the case to be heard before the First Division.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the Income-Tax Commissioners say that they have not found any difference in principle between the present case and the case which we decided in regard to the water assessments in Glasgow. If I could agree in that opinion I should be very glad to confirm the decision of the commissioners; but the distinction between the two cases is, I think, very palpable, and essential for the purposes of this question. The Glasgow Corporation Act of 1869 empowered the magistrates and town-council—the corporation of Glasgow—to purchase the undertakings of the two companies which had been previously authorised by Act of Parliament to supply Glasgow with gas, and the 4th section of the statute transferred the whole property of these two companies to the municipal corporation.

The way in which the corporation were authorised to pay the price for this subject which they so acquired is provided by the 11th section of the statute, and it was by way of annuity to the shareholders in the former gas companies, corresponding to the value of the interest which they held in those companies. The corporation were then empowered to manufacture and sell gas to the inhabitants of Glasgow and suburbs, and the 83d section provided that there should be a sinking fund to pay off the debt which, of course, the corporation were obliged to incur, in the first instance, for the purpose of erecting works and setting the concern agoing. The provision is—"The corporation shall, after the expiration of two years from the passing of this Act, set apart as a sinking fund a sum not less than one per centum per annum on the amount borrowed under this Act, which sinking fund shall from time to time be invested in Government securities, and shall, with the accumulations thereof, be, together with the interest on the several amounts paid off, applied by the corporation to the redemption of mortgages or annuities, and not otherwise; provided that the said sinking fund shall not be less than £2000 in any one year."

Now, as regards the other clauses of the Act with respect to the conduct of this undertaking by the corporation, it is only necessary to add that they have no power to compel anybody to take their gas. On the contrary, it is quite optional for any of the inhabitants to buy their gas from the corporation or not as they think fit, and the corporation are put under a restriction as to the price which they are to charge for the gas by the maximum price of 4s. 7d. being allowed. Then, finally, the 86th section of the statute provides for the application of all monies that are to go into the gas corporation in the way of revenue—"The corporation shall apply all monies from time to time received by them under the powers of this Act (not being money borrowed or money for the application of which provision is hereinbefore made) in manner and order following, and not otherwise (namely), first, in payment of the expenses of and incidental to the raising, levying, and recovering the rents, charges, and revenues, and the borrowing of monies under the Act; secondly, in payment of the expenses of managing and maintaining the gas-works of the corporation; thirdly, in payment of the Glasgow corporation gas annuities and annuities to holders of funded debt, and interest of money borrowed under this Act; fourthly, in carrying the several powers and provisions of this Act into execution, including any extension and improvement of the gas-works and mains, and may carry any balance thereof to the credit of the corporation for their general purposes." The revenue of the corporation is applied in terms of this section in the first place in payment of the interest of mortgage debt, and in payment of the annuities; and there can be no doubt that income-tax is charged on that part of the revenue—not on this corporation, but on their creditors—the creditors on the mortgage debts and the holders of annuities—because the income-tax which is levied on the corporation, in the first instance, forms a deduction from the payment of these interests and annuities. But then the question has arisen, and it comes to this very narrow point, whether, if there be anything beyond that—if there be any revenue beyond what is applied in this way, or in maintaining the work, and which goes into the sinking fund in terms of the 83d section, or goes into the coffers of the corporation for their general purposes under the 86th section—that is or is not liable for income-tax. Now, I answer that question in the affirmative. It seems to me that the corporation of the city of Glasgow is by virtue of this statute empowered to enter into a speculation as traders in gas. No doubt, it may have been for the benefit of the community—that is perfectly true—but they have all the character and attributes of a trading company. They acquired the works for the purpose of manufacturing gas; they manufactured gas, and sold it to those who were willing to become buyers; but they cannot compel anybody to take it who is not willing to do so, and willing to do so at their price. They are empowered and authorised—nay, bound—to make provision for the paying off of the mortgage debt which they had incurred at the commencement of the concern; and after they have done that, whatever surplus there is belongs to the corporation for its general purposes—that is to say, goes simply into the common good of the corporation, which is, in other words, saying that the surplus belongs to this company—to this trading company—for its own uses and purposes. The distinction between this and the case which is relied on by the Income-Tax Commissioners is very clear. There never could be any surplus or balance of profit under the Water Trust Act, for this simple reason, that the statute made it imperative so to use every shilling of revenue that was levied under that statute, so far as it was not otherwise employed, as to reduce the rates paid by the ratepayers; and in that way there never could be any balance at all. There was no trading in the sense that, after paying the expenses and interest, the balance which was not otherwise appropriated was to be devoted to the special purpose in question. The further distinction which exists between the two cases is this—that by the Water Trust Act the commissioners thereby appointed were authorised to levy the assessment within a certain district, at a certain rate, according to the rental of the property within that district, and that they were to apply it for a public purpose; and all the monies raised by means of that assessment were devoted exclusively to that public purpose—to the public purpose defined by the statute itself. In this case there is no authority to levy a rate at all, and therefore the case belongs to a different category, because that rate which is authorised to be levied by the 42d section* of the statute is really nothing more than the creation of a security or guarantee for the annuitants, the shareholders of the companies—an arrangement for the benefit of the concern, in turning it to as profitable account as possible, in order to enable the corporation to continue to pay the annuity. That, however, is not to come into operation under ordinary circumstances, and forms no proper part of the scheme under which the corporation are to conduct the business of manufacturing and selling gas. I think the distinction in this way between the cases is so clear that it is needless to waste more words upon it. The portion of the revenue which goes into the sinking fund is just a part of the income of this trading corporation, which is used by them for paying off their debt, and the portion of it beyond that, which goes into the funds of the corporation for their general purposes, is also just something which they have gained in the way of profit or surplus revenue for corporate benefit; and it does not require that profits shall be for the benefit of individuals only in order to make them profits within the meaning of schedule D of the Income-tax Act. If they are for corporate benefit they are just as much profit within the meaning of the statute; and I have no hesitation in setting aside the decision of the commissioners, and sustaining the assessment.

* "It shall be lawful for the corporation, and they are hereby authorised and

Lord Deas.—I need not repeat what was said when the former case was before the Court, because the opinions have been referred to at length in the course of the argument. Your Lordship in the chair has explained the circumstances of the present case clearly, and I am of opinion that no grounds have been stated for distinguishing between the position in which the corporation now stands with reference to the sale of gas from the position formerly occupied by the two original gas companies. I entirely agree with your Lordship.

Lord Ardmillan.—I also am of the same opinion, and have little to add to what has already been said. I think there are two grounds on which the distinction of this case from the case of the water company rests. In the first place, in the mode of operation by which the funds come in. How do the funds come in? In the case of the water company the funds came in by an assessment over all the parties liable in a public assessment, and every person had to pay that assessment whether he consumed the water or not. But in the case of the supply of gas every person is not bound to take it in. The relation between the corporation and the ratepayers in regard to gas is the relation between a company or corporation selling and individuals purchasing. In regard to the mere use of the article, the water supplied by the water company was not in the same position as the gas. If a person chose not to use the water so supplied, having a supply in his back-green or elsewhere, he was not bound to use it; but he was required from time to time, in the event of there being any deficiency of funds for payment of the Glasgow corporation gas annuities, to assess and levy on and from the occupiers of all lands and heritages situate within the parliamentary and municipal boundaries of the city and royal burgh of Glasgow, an annual assessment, to be called the gas guarantee rate, not exceeding sixpence in the pound on the real rent or yearly value of such lands and heritages; . . . . . provided also that the said assessment shall be levied and applied only for the purpose of paying the Glasgow corporation gas annuities, and any interest which may be due thereon, and the expenses connected with the levying and applying of such assessment."

bound to pay the assessment. But if he uses oil lamps in preference to the gas supplied by the corporation he may do so, and then he will be relieved from paying for the gas which the corporation manufacture. Therefore the distinction in the mode of operation as to the manner in which the funds are gathered is very obvious; but the other distinction is just as obvious. What is the ultimate result in administering the funds? In the case of the water-rate, the ultimate result led, by force of the statute, to a diminution in the water-rate. There is no such result in the case of the gas. The statute, after setting forth what may be done with the funds, ends by saying that the balance shall be carried to the credit of the corporation for their general purposes. I have no doubt these purposes are wise and beneficent purposes, but they are purposes within their own control, so far as this statute goes. I cannot see any ground for dealing with this company as other than a company choosing to sell to those who buy, and the profits they make, after complying with certain statutory regulations about the payment of debt, is property at their own disposal. The case of the water corporation is quite different, for a statute law came in and gave them statutory powers, and imperative statutory directions for the ultimate application of the fund for the benent of all assessed.

LORD MURE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Reverse the determination of the commissioners, and sustain the assessment to the full amount: Find the Commissioners of Inland Revenue entitled to costs, and remit," &c.

Naismith v. Cairnduff.

JAMES NAISMITH, Pursuer.—D.-F. Watson—J. A. Crichton.
JAMES WILSON CAIRNDUFF, Defender.—Asher—J. P. B. Robertson.

Superior and Vassal—Feu-Contract—Conditions—Minerals.—A feu-contract, in which the superior reserved the minerals, and bound himself to pay any damage caused to buildings by working them, contained a stipulation that the vassal should not erect any other building than cottages, to be used as dwelling-houses, with suitable office-houses. The vassal having built a house of two stories, held that the superior had a sufficient interest to enforce implement of the condition, and the vassal ordained to take down the house, in so far as it exceeded one square story and attics.

Superior and Vassal—Conditions—Plan.—A feu-contract provided that the buildings to be erected should consist of cottages, with suitable offices, "which cottages shall not exceed four in number, and shall be built on the sites shewn on the plan, and shall front the north, and shall each of them be in point of size and accommodation, as well as architectural character, at least equal to either of the two cottages which have been already erected." Held (dub. Lord Deas), in a question between the superior and vassal, that the feu-contract was not to be construed as restricting the vassal to the precise limits of the building sites shewn on the plan.

1ST DIVISION. Lord Rutherfurd Clark. B.

IN 1868 James Naismith granted a feu of 1 acre 1 rood and 30 poles of ground, lying in the parish of Bothwell, in Lanarkshire, to James W. Cairnduff. The feu-duty was £14, 7s. 6d. The feu-contract contained a clause reserving the minerals to the superior, with power to work the same, without entering upon or breaking the surface of the ground feued, and subject to the condition that Naismith and his successors should be bound to pay to the vassal all damage that might be done to the ground or the buildings to be erected thereon. The feu-contract also contained the following clauses:—"Declaring that the buildings to be erected on the foresaid plot or area of ground shall consist of cottages, with suitable offices, which cottages shall not exceed four in number, and shall be built on the sites shewn on the said plan or sketch, and shall front the north, and shall each of them be in point of size and accommodation, as well as architectural character, at least equal to either of the two cottages which have been already erected on the ground to the southward thereof, lately feued to the said William Henderson, and the outer walls of the said cottages, and also of any out-houses, coach-houses, stables, and offices to be erected on the ground hereby disponed, shall be built of stone and lime, and the said cottages and other buildings shall be covered with slates, and shall be erected at the distance of not less than 15 feet at all points from the west side of the said parish road; and the front and gable walls of the said cottages shall be of polished ashlar, or neatly dressed square rubble work: And the said James Wilson Cairnduff and his foresaids shall not be at liberty at any time to erect any buildings upon the said plot or area of ground other than the said four cottages, to be occupied as dwelling-houses, with suitable out-buildings or office-houses to be used and occupied in connection therewith."

The feu-contract had a plan or sketch of the ground endorsed, shewing, with four spaces marked red, the sites of cottages referred to in the charter.

Naismith had feued an adjoining piece of ground to a Mr Henderson in 1867, who had erected two cottages of one story and attics upon it.

Naismith brought the present action against Cairnduff, alleging that he was erecting, instead of a cottage, a double villa of two square stories in height, and upon a different site from that shewn on the plan. That a villa of this size was more likely to be injuriously affected by mining operations, and that the value of the pursuer's mineral property was in consequence depreciated.

The conclusions of the summons were, inter alia, for declarator "that the erecting by the defender of a double villa or dwelling-house of two square stories in height on any part of the said area of ground, or otherwise the erecting of such villa or dwelling-house on the site marked A B C D on the plan or sketch above-mentioned, is contrary to the conditions, declarations, and restrictions contained in the titles of the defender, and that the defender is not entitled to make such erection; and the defender ought and should, by decree foresaid, be interdicted from proceeding farther with such erection," and should be ordained "immediately to take down and remove the building already erected on the site above-mentioned; or otherwise to take down, alter, and remove the same, in so far as may be necessary to bring it into conformity with the declarations, conditions, and restrictions contained in the defender's titles, and, in particular, in so far as the said building is a double villa or dwelling-house, and also in so far as it exceeds in height one square story and attics; all at the sight of our said Lords, or of a man of skill to be appointed by them."

The defender admitted that the building he had erected was two stories in height, and contained two separate dwellings. He referred to the feu-contract, and the plan attached, as to the site of the buildings.

The pursuer pleaded;—(2) The dwelling-house which the defender is in course of erecting not being a cottage, and being in various other respects a violation of the contract of parties as embodied in the feu-contract and relative sketch or plan, the pursuer is entitled to interdict, and to have the same removed and taken down as and to the extent concluded for.

No. 140.
June 21, 1876.
Naismith v. Cairnduff.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant. (3) The defender not having violated any of the conditions of his feu-right, is entitled to absolvitor; and, separatim, if there has been any departure from the conditions of the feu, the pursuer having sanctioned or acquiesced therein cannot now challenge the same.

After a proof the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the defender has violated the conditions of the feu-contract libelled by erecting a house which is not a cottage: To that extent finds, declares, and decerns in terms of the conclusions for declarator and interdict: Decerns and ordains the defender to take down the house erected, or in the course of being erected by him, in so far as it exceeds in height one square story and attics, and that at the sight of Mr John Baird, architect in Glasgow: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses, of which allows an account," &c.*

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—What was meant by the feu-charter was that the defender should erect houses of at least the size of cottages—a cottage was the minimum which was to be erected. There was no restriction against there being more than a cottage. The object was to secure the feu-duty. The superior did not intend, by using the word "cottage," to restrict the vassal to a particular size of house. He had no interest to do so.[1]

The pursuer argued that the Lord Ordinary was right in the views expressed in his interlocutor and note.

* "NOTE.—The buildings of the defender are objected to—1st, because they are not cottages; and 2d, because they are not erected on the sites specified in the plan referred to in the feu-contract.

"The defender did not maintain that the house which he was erecting was a 'cottage,' but he contended that there was no restriction on the character of the buildings, provided that they were used as dwelling-houses, and that even if there were, the pursuer had no interest to enforce it.

"The Lord Ordinary does not think that this answer is well founded. The feu-contract declares that the buildings to be erected on the feu 'shall be cottages;' and again, that the defender shall not be entitled to erect any buildings 'other than the said four cottages.' These provisions are so express that, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, they cannot be extended by construction in the manner which the defender proposes.

"The Lord Ordinary is also of opinion that the pursuer has sufficient interest to insist on the fulfilment of this condition, as the contravention of it might diminish the value of the minerals which are reserved to him.

"With respect to the sites, the case is more difficult; for though the defender is not entitled to erect any houses other than cottages, he is not prohibited from building larger cottages than those referred to in the feu-contract. His obligation is to build cottages as good as those already erected on Henderson's feu, and this implies that he may erect cottages which are larger and better. But this could not be done without occupying a larger area than that shewn on the plan as the site for building. Further, it is not easy to reconcile the restriction for which the pursuer contends with the provision that the cottages and other buildings shall be erected at a distance of not less than 15 feet from the west side of the parish road.

"Considering that the restrictions on the use of property must, in order to be effectual, be expressed in the clearest manner, and besides, that the pursuer has no apparent interest to object to the position on which the defender's house has been erected, the Lord Ordinary has not given effect to the objection stated by the pursuer with respect to the site."

Naismith v. Cairnduff.

LORD PRESIDENT.—There are two questions distinctly raised here, and both of them must be considered. One is, whether the defender, in building his houses on the ground feued under the feu-contract of 1868, is entitled to deviate from the areas marked red on the plan, as applicable to each of the cottages. Now, the provision in the feu-contract is that "the buildings to be erected on the foresaid plot or area of ground shall consist of cottages, with suitable offices, which cottages shall not exceed four in number, and shall be built on the sites shewn on the said plan or sketch, and shall front the north, and shall each of them be in point of size and accommodation, as well as architectural character, at least equal to either of the two cottages which have been already erected on the ground to the southward thereof, lately feued to the said William Henderson." Taking the clause as a whole, I am satisfied, with the Lord Ordinary, that it was not intended to restrict the feuar to the precise limits of the areas marked red. That would be too strict a reading of the contract. I do not think every deviation from the areas marked red would be a violation of the contract. If it was intended that there should not be any deviation it would have been reasonable to specify in the feu-contract the exact dimensions of the areas, which might have been ascertained by applying a pair of compasses to the plan. If the feuar was to be restricted to an area of 40 by 30 feet it should have been specially stipulated. On this point I agree with the Lord Ordinary in refusing to sustain this ground of action.

But I also agree with the Lord Ordinary that this house is a violation in style and size so far as regards height. I think that what was intended to be erected was four buildings of the nature of cottages, in the ordinary sense of the word, that is, single story houses. It does not exclude apartments in the roof. As many cottages have rooms with windows in the roof as not, whether they be cottages for labourers or of a more ornate character. I should not be disposed to exclude apartments in the roof. There is a very good example of the kind in the ground feued in 1867 to Mr Henderson, which shews windows in the roof. But the building which the defender has erected is a house of two stories. If you look at the back there is no possibility of denying that there are two stories. When you look at the front there are two windows which run up into the roof, but this is only for the purpose of ornamentation. The two windows which are not ornamental do not run up into the roof. I do not think that this building is a cottage.

The question comes to be, whether the superior is entitled to have the building pulled down so far as it exceeds the limits of a cottage. I have no doubt there were several objects which the superior had in view in making the stipulation he did. One was, to have so much building as would secure his feu-duty. Another was, to ensure that the buildings on this ground should be of the same character as the buildings in the neighbourhood, and that was for the benefit of the adjoining feus. But surely it is not out of the question to say that there is an additional reason to be found, and that is suggested by the fact that there are minerals in the district of a valuable kind. They are reserved to the superior, and he contemplates working or letting them. He undertakes to be responsible for any damage which may arise, and has therefore a most material interest to stipulate what buildings shall or shall not be erected on the ground. Surely the superior would have an obvious interest on the face of the feu-contract to prevent the erection of buildings or manufactories of a ponderous character. But is it not equally natural that a superior, in such a position, should desire to secure himself against the erection of buildings even of the nature of dwelling-houses. If a street of dwelling-houses three or four stories high were erected, the risk of damage would be greatly increased. Therefore he limits his feuar as to the buildings to be put on the ground. But first of all he stipulates for one cottage to be put down at once, which will secure his feu-duty, and then there are to be three more. These are to be at least as good as the cottages erected by Henderson. But he has a separate clause of prohibition, which is in these terms :—"And the said James Wilson Cairnduff and his foresaids shall not be at liberty at any time to erect any buildings upon the said plot or area of ground other than the said four cottages, to be occupied as dwelling-houses, with suitable out-buildings or office-houses to be used and occupied in connection therewith." It is said that there is no restriction as to the size of the out-buildings or offices. I think these must be suitable. If he were to build a coach-house of two stories he would be liable to an action similar to the present.

I think the defender was entitled to build a house of one story only, and therefore I have no hesitation in agreeing with the Lord Ordinary.

LORD DEAS.—The first question is, what kind of building is prohibited by this feu-contract? It bears to prohibit every kind of building except cottages. I can have no doubt that by a cottage was here meant a building of one story. As your Lordship has pointed out, there were two things to be provided for with reference to the buildings—one, that there might be a sufficient building to secure the feu-duty; the other, that the amenity of the feuing stances might be preserved. Plainly these two things were in the view of the superior. But it does not follow that there was not a third thing in view,—namely, that the superior should be able to work the minerals without being liable to pay ruinous damages. Any mining engineer who knew the district might be able to say whether coal existed in it. The superior reserves the minerals, and agrees to pay the surface damages which may be caused by working them. It is impossible to imagine a better reason for his wishing that the houses should neither be heavier nor more valuable than one-story houses. I am disposed to concede that the superior must have an interest in order to entitle him to enforce such a restriction. But I think he has here a clear interest, and I have therefore no hesitation in coming to the same conclusion with the Lord Ordinary.

I give no opinion on the other point, whether the vassal was bound to build exactly on the sites marked on the plan.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary. This house is not the sort of house contemplated by the contract of feu, and it is not a cottage in the ordinary sense. I am glad to be assured on this point by referring to Richardson's Dictionary. The word "cottage" does not indeed occur in its proper place in the alphabetical order; but under the word "cote" or "cot" the word "cottage" is given, and these words are explained as "anything which covers, shelters, or protects the human or any other body, whether applied to a place for men to dwell or rest in, or for the shelter and protection of sheep, pigeons, or other animals,"—a very general description, but including a cottage.

Chaucer and Surrey are quoted as giving illustration of the word "cote." Spenser says—

> "But if to my cottage thou wilt resort,
> So as I can, I will thee comfort."

No. 140.

Naismith v. Cairnduff.

Dryden says—

"But what plain fare her cottage did afford—
A hearty welcome at a humble board—
Was freely hers; and to supply the rest
An honest meaning and an open breast."

I cannot doubt that what is meant generally by the word "cottage" is a dwelling with a character of simplicity and humility. What was in this case meant was a house of one story; and the superior had an interest to make that a condition, as larger buildings might increase his responsibility for mineral workings.

ROBERT SNEDDON, Pursuer and Respondent.—Fraser—Lorimer.
MOSSEND IRON COMPANY, Defenders and Appellants.—D.-F. Watson—Pearson.

Master and Servant—Reparation—Culpa—Collaborateur.—Held that where a coalmaster had devolved the entire charge of a coal-pit upon a competent manager and competent subordinates he could not be made liable in damages for the death of a miner employed in the pit, alleged to have been caused by their fault.

Sheriff—Process—Closing Record—16 and 17 Vict. c. 80 (Sheriff Court Act, 1853), sec. 3.—Observed that a Sheriff, before closing a record on a summons and minute of defence, ought to hear parties, and ascertain that the grounds of action and defence are properly stated.

1ST DIVISION. Sheriff of Lanarkshire. M.

THIS action was raised in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire by Robert Sneddon, miner, against the Mossend Iron Company, and William Neilson, ironmaster, "the only known partner of that company."

The conclusions of the summons were for £500 of damages "as solatium for the loss, injury, and damage sustained by the pursuer through the gross carelessness and culpable neglect of duty of the defenders, or others for whom they are responsible, in having failed or neglected to make, or caused to be made secure the roof and sides of a travelling road and working place in a coal-pit situated at or near Bellshill aforesaid, commonly called No. 1 Orbiston Pit, belonging to the defenders, or of which they are lessees, and which was being wrought by them at the date aftermentioned, whereby, on or about the 11th day of August 1873, while the deceased John Sneddon, miner, residing in Bellshill, son of the pursuer, was engaged in the employment of the defenders as a miner in said coal-pit, at or near the place known as the Causeway Top, and at or near to a horizontal pivot-wheel at the top of an incline in said pit, on which pivot-wheel a chain works, by which loaded hutches of coal are let down and empty hutches drawn up the incline; and while the said John Sneddon was in the act of disconnecting an empty hutch from the said chain, or engaged in the execution of some other duty at or near thereto, the roof and sides of the said travelling road or working place, or part thereof, in which he was then engaged, or along which he was then proceeding, gave way and fell upon his person, whereby he was crushed to the ground and instantaneously killed."

The record was closed upon the summons and the following minute of defence:—"A denial that the falling of the roof or sides, whereby the pursuer's son, John Sneddon, was killed, was occasioned by culpa on the part of the defenders, or others for whom they are responsible, said fall having arisen either from some latent defect in the roof or sides or materials supporting the same, in respect of which the defenders were not responsible, or from the fault of the deceased himself, or of some one or more of his fellow-workmen."

A proof was allowed before answer. From the proof the following facts appeared:—There were two partners of the Mossend Iron Company, William and James Neilson. Neither of them took any personal supervision of the mining operations in the Orbiston Pit, but devolved these entirely on James Munro, as colliery manager, and his subordinates. On 11th August 1873, while the pursuer's son was engaged in the defenders' pit, a large stone fell from the roof of the place where he was working, and killed him. The accident arose from the supports of the roof being insufficient. It was further proved that the duty of providing for the support of the roof lay on the said manager, and John Gillies as oversman, and William Downie as roadsman, and that these persons were experienced and skilful persons, quite competent to the discharge of the duties committed to them, and were furnished by the defenders with all the requisite materials to enable them to discharge their duties.

The Sheriff-substitute (Clark) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that, on or about the date libelled, the 11th August 1873, while the pursuer's son, the deceased John Sneddon, miner, was engaged in the employment of the defenders as a miner in their coal-pit known as No. 1 Orbiston Pit, and at or near the place known as the Causeway Top, and at or near a horizontal pivot-wheel at the top of an incline, the roof and sides of the place at which he was working gave way and fell upon his person, so that he was crushed to the ground, and killed, by and through the fault of the defenders, or of those for whom they are responsible: Therefore, and for the reasons assigned in the subjoined note, finds the defenders liable to the pursuer in damages, and assesses the same at the sum of £200 sterling, and decerns against the defenders for said sum accordingly: Finds the defenders liable to the pursuer in expenses; allows an account thereof," &c.*

* "NOTE.—From the evidence it would appear that on the occasion in question the pursuer's son was engaged at work at the defender's pit, when the roof and sides of the place where he stood suddenly gave way and fell upon him, crushing him so that his death resulted almost immediately after. At and prior to the occurrence the roof was not supported in a sufficient manner. The mere fact of the occurrence taking place is of itself prima facie evidence of this; because it is plain that when proper precautions are taken, the roof of a coal-working will not fall in, unless for the occurrence of some damnum fatale, which no one could foresee, or for some piece of gross impropriety on the part of the men at work. But, apart from this presumption, there are facts in the present case which sufficiently explain the falling in, and affix liability against the defenders.

"In the first place, the roof was not properly supported by being furnished with the proper appliances and gearing. . . .

"Secondly, the whole arrangements as to the construction and working of the wheel were unsatisfactory in the highest degree. . . . Now, it is important to notice that all these precautions against danger, which were so obvious and necessary in themselves, were afterwards supplemented and adopted by the defenders, but only after the pursuer's son had lost his life from their absence. After, and not before, this deplorable occurrence, the roof was supported by proper gearing, the wheel was removed to a more secure part of the workings, a brake was supplied, and a brakesman appointed.

"The defence amounts to a denial that the falling of the roof was occasioned by culpa on the part of the defenders; and a suggestion that it arose from some latent defect in the roof or sides, or materials supporting the same, for which

No. 141.

Both parties having appealed, the Sheriff (Dickson) pronounced this interlocutor:—"For the reasons stated by the Sheriff-substitute, adheres to the judgment appealed against, except as to the sum at which the Sheriff-substitute has assessed the damages, and decree therefor, to which extent recalls the said judgment....: Assesses the said damages at £100 sterling, for which sum, with interest as libelled, decerns against the defenders."

The defenders appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—Where a master had devolved the whole management upon a person thoroughly competent, and furnished him with proper subordinates and sufficient materials, he could not be liable to the workmen for injuries sustained through the fault of these persons. The only ground for a claim such as the present was personal fault on the part of the master, and there was no proof of that.[1]

Argued for the pursuer;—The master was bound to see that the pit was so constructed as to be safe. The onus lay on the defenders to shew that they instituted a proper system of working. There was a difference between the institution of a system and the carrying out of the system. The master was responsible for the former but not for the latter. Here there was a defective system, and for that the master was answerable.[2]

At advising,—

Lord President.—The summons in this case is founded on the allegation that the deceased was killed "through the gross carelessness and culpable neglect of duty of the defenders, or others for whom they are responsible, in having failed or neglected to make, or caused to be made secure, the roof and sides of a travelling road and working place in a coal-pit situated at or near Bellshill aforesaid, commonly called No. 1 Orbiston Pit, belonging to the defenders, or of which they are lessees, and which was being wrought by them at the date aftermentioned." That ground of action has been sustained by the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, who finds, "that on or about the date libelled, the 11th August 1873, while the pursuer's son, the deceased John Sneddon, miner, was engaged in the employment of the defenders as a miner in their coal-pit known as No. 1 Orbiston Pit, and at or near the place known as the Causeway Top, and at or near a horizontal pivot-wheel at the top of an incline, the roof and sides of the place at which he was working gave way and fell upon his person, so that the defenders are not responsible, or from fault on the part of the deceased or of his fellow-workmen.

"The first observation that occurs on this defence is the very obvious one, that it is silent as to what the alleged latent defect was, and does not specify of what fault the deceased or his fellow-workmen were guilty. Upon all this the defence is a perfect blank. In the course of the proof, however, the defenders attempted to make out that the whole roof had been properly and efficiently geared at and prior to the accident." . . .

he was crushed to the ground, and killed, by and through the fault of the defenders, or of those for whom they are responsible." The direct personal fault of the defenders is not alleged by the pursuer, and there is no attempt made to prove it. Both the summons and the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute leave it uncertain by whose fault the accident took place. No doubt the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute says that the fault was committed by some one for whom the defenders are responsible. But I cannot find from the Sheriff-substitute's note who the person was he thinks was in fault. Yet he has arrived at the conclusion that the defenders are responsible for the fault of some one whom he does not specify. It is impossible to sustain such a judgment. The indirect responsibility of the defenders for some one else is not to be assumed in a case like the present, where the person injured is the servant of a company not personally superintending the business.

The Sheriff-substitute, and the Sheriff, who affirmed his judgment, have been misled by the manner in which the case was stated. The defenders ought to have distinctly stated that they were not responsible for the fault of any one in their employment, whether manager, oversman, or roadsman. If that had been stated the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff would have considered the case in a very different way.

When the appeal was stated to us it was quite obvious that the main question was one of law. Assuming that there was fault, and that the fault was committed by some one in charge of the pit, were the defenders responsible? If the case had been instituted in this Court we could not have proceeded until a new plea was added. But the 72d section of the Court of Session Act of 1868 gives us the following authority:—"The Court may, if necessary, order proof or additional proof to be taken in any appeal under this Act, such proof to be taken in the same manner as proof may be competently taken in any cause depending before the Inner-House, and shall thereafter, or without any such order (if no such proof or additional proof is necessary), give judgment on the merits of the cause according to the law truly applicable in the circumstances, although such law is not pleaded on the record; and the record may, with leave of the Court, be amended at any time, on such conditions as to the Court shall seem proper."

Following out this direction, we must look into the evidence to see on whom the fault lay, and whether the defenders are answerable for that fault. There is a little delicacy in affirming on the evidence before us that there was any fault at all. If there was any fault it lies between three persons—Munro, the manager; Gillies, the oversman; and Downie, the roadsman. The fault consisted in not properly supporting the roof. All these three had a duty of supporting the roof. The support of a roof requires to be attended to as the mine progresses. In the present case there was a dangerous roof which required a good deal of skill and energy to keep up. The delicacy in deciding the question of fault is that when this action has been dismissed, as I think it must be, it is quite possible that the pursuer may bring an action against these three men on account of personal fault. It would be embarrassing to have to decide such a case after having formed an opinion either that these men were or were not in fault. Of course a decision in the present case would not be res judicata. But it would be embarrassing that we should have already pronounced a judgment on the matter of fact. I therefore refrain from giving an opinion whether or not there was fault. One thing is clear, that if there was any fault it was fault in not supporting the roof, and the only persons responsible were these three—Munro, Gillies, or Downie, or one or more of them. The question of law is, assuming that there was fault, were the defenders responsible for that fault? It is not alleged that any one of them was unfit for his duties. On the contrary, there is evidence that Munro was a man of experience and skill, and that the two others were well acquainted with their duties. That being the case, I find it quite impossible to distinguish the present from the case of Wilson v. Merry and Cunningham. I am not referring to the dicta of the noble and learned Judges who decided that case. I am referring merely to our own decision, which was, that when persons in the position of the Mossend Iron Company here are not engaged personally in the supervision of a pit but employ other persons who are properly skilled in the supervision of the working of the pit, they are not responsible although an accident happen to one of the workmen which may result in his death. On that ground I arrive at the conclusion that the defenders are not responsible.

LORD DEAS.—I agree with your Lordship in thinking it not necessary for the decision of the present case to give any opinion whether fault has or has not been established on the part of the three persons your Lordship has named; although, if there was fault, it must, no doubt, have been that of one or more of these persons. One part of the evidence is unsatisfactory, viz., that which regards the matter of fact whether any part of the roof fell except the stone which killed the man whose death gave rise to the action. It has not been proved that anything else fell. And if that was the state of the fact, I should have wished to know whether a stone of this description was likely to be found in such a roof. The proper precautions for securing the roof would depend a good deal on this.

But in order to get to the question whether the masters were responsible, we must take the case on the assumption that there was fault on the part of those under them. The Mossend Iron Company carried on a variety of works under the supervision of skilled managers. It is not easy to see what more they could have done than to select these managers carefully. The partners could not have done the work themselves, nor could they be expected to have been upon the spot so as to have given instructions personally as to how it should be done. The probability is that they could not have done this so well as the skilled men who did so. It is not said that the manager would have had any difficulty in getting whatever materials he required, if he chose to ask for them. It is not indeed said what materials were necessary and were not used. The masters' duty was to furnish money to get the necessary materials, and it is not said that they failed to do so. In that state of facts, I have difficulty in distinguishing this case from the case of Merry and Cunningham. I think it would be a distinction without a difference. The record is very vague, and the question was not raised in the Sheriff Court. That may be important in a question of expenses, but cannot affect the judgment we are to pronounce on the merits, or the principles by which we are to be guided.

I am therefore constrained to agree with your Lordship.

LORD ARDMILLAN.—In this action of damages at the instance of Robert Sneddon, miner, near Bellshill, against the Mossend Iron Company, both Sheriffs have decided in favour of the pursuer. Differing only in regard to the amount of damages, the Sheriffs concur entirely in their view of the evidence and in their application of the law.

No. 141.
June 23, 1876.
Sneddon v. Mossend Iron Co.

The pursuer is the father of the late John Sneddon, miner, a young man of about twenty-three, who was unfortunately killed by the fall of a portion of the roof of the place where he was working in the defenders' coal-pit, and while in their employment. The father claims damages in respect that the death of his son was caused, as he alleges, by fault on the part of the defenders, or those for whom they are responsible. The accident happened on the 11th of August 1873, and this action was raised on the 4th of September 1874.

It does not appear necessary, in the view which we are taking of this case, to pronounce decidedly on the question of fact whether there was fault or not causing the accident in which the pursuer's son met his death. We must assume the fact of fault, because fault is alleged, and we are dealing with the relevancy.

Now, it appears on these averments that the defenders, partners of the Mossend Iron Company, though the employers of the man killed, were not present on the occasion; that they are not alleged to take personal charge of the pit-workings, or even of the furnishing of apparatus, or the direction of the system of working; and it is not alleged that the persons whom they appointed as manager, oversman, and roadsman were persons unfit or incompetent to discharge the duties committed to them. Such incompetency or unfitness has not been alleged. Under these circumstances, the question which arises in point of law is, whether, on the alleged facts, the defenders are liable in damages to the pursuer in respect that the death of his son was caused by the fault of one or more of the defenders' servants, including the manager, the oversman, and the roadsman employed by them?

It is of great importance, especially to the operative classes, that the true state of the law on this subject should be known. If the absence of redress in the form of damages tends to make them more cautious it may be of some service. The protection which the law affords to workmen in a coal-pit in such a case as this ought not to be matter of doubt, and ought to be seen clearly to be according to justice.

The law on the subject has in recent years been frequently considered, and the change in the law has been favourable to the employers. The redress afforded to workmen has been restricted and limited. The protection against responsibility on the part of the employers has been extended and strengthened.

In the case of an injury inflicted on a stranger, the master or employer has frequently been held responsible for the fault of his servant. The maxim qui facit per alium facit per se applies, and the master cannot in that case escape from responsibility because the act was not done by his own hand but by the hand of his servant. This has been repeatedly recognised as law. It is so stated by our institutional writers; it has been repeatedly so decided; and it is so laid down authoritatively by Lord Cranworth in the Bartonshill Coal Company v. Reid, and by the Lord Chancellor (Lord Cairns) in the case of Wilson v. Merry and Cunningham; and Lord Colonsay, in the same case, says,—"I hold it to be quite clear that the liability of a master for injury done by the fault or negligence of his servant falls to be dealt with on different principles where the sufferer is a stranger, and where the sufferer is a fellow-servant engaged in the same common employment."

This distinction must now be considered as quite settled. There is a series of decisions, some of which have been already alluded to, which leave no doubt on the subject. In the case of injury to a workman by the fault of a fellow-work-is meant by "others"? I know of no "others" for whom they are responsible. The defence is not very intelligible either. What is meant by their "denial that the falling of the roof or sides, whereby the pursuer's son John Sneddon was killed, was occasioned by culpa on the part of the defenders, or others for whom they are responsible"? Do they mean that there were others for whom they may be responsible? If the Sheriff had heard parties in explanation, it would have turned out, without the expense of a proof, that the fault lay with the manager, and then the question might have been decided on relevancy; and it is much to be regretted that this course was not taken. The expense would then have been trifling.

The other Judges concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff, dated respectively the 4th August and 31st December 1875: Find in point of fact (1) that on or about the 11th August 1873, while the pursuer's (respondent's) son, the deceased John Sneddon, miner, was engaged in the employment of the defenders (appellants) as a miner in their coal-pit known as No. 1 Orbiston Pit, and at or near the place known as the Causeway Top, and at or near a horizontal pivot-wheel at the top of an incline, the roof and sides of the place at which he was working gave way and fell upon his person, so that he was crushed to the ground, and killed; (2) that the death of the said John Sneddon was caused by the support of the roof having proved insufficient; (3) that the defenders took no personal superintendence of the mining operations in the said pit, but devolved these entirely on James Munro as colliery manager, and his subordinates; (4) that the duty of providing for the support of the roof lay on the said manager, and John Gillies as oversman, and William Downie as roadsman; and (5) that these parties were experienced and skilful persons, quite competent to the discharge of the duties committed to them, and were furnished by the defenders with all the requisite materials to enable them to discharge their duties: Find in law that if the roof fell through the fault of the said James Munro, John Gillies, and William Downie, or any one or more of them, the defenders are not answerable for such fault: Therefore assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decern: Find no expenses due to or by either party in the inferior Court, but find the appellants entitled to expenses in this Court: Allow an account thereof to be given in, and remit the same, when lodged, to the Auditor to tax and report."

THIS was an action of damages in the Sheriff Court at Hamilton by James Wardrope, tailor, against the Duke of Hamilton and two of his gamekeepers. He averred—"The defenders—the one or other aiding, abetting, instructing, and acting on behalf of the other or others—at least the defenders James Wood and John Tait, being in the service of the other defender, His Grace the Duke of Hamilton, and acting with his authority, or at least for his behoof, along with another (whose name is at present unknown), the one aiding, abetting, and assisting the other, and both acting in concert and collusively, on or about 5th November 1875, and in, at, or near the turnpike road leading from Glasgow to Carlisle, about a mile distant from Stonehouse, county aforesaid, did fire at or in the direction of the pursuer and his greyhound bitch, known by the name of 'Dolly Varden,' all wrongously, illegally, wantonly, and maliciously, and did shoot and kill the said animal (which was of the value of £70 or thereby), and did shoot and wound the pursuer."

Separate defences were lodged for the Duke of Hamilton and for the gamekeepers.

The Duke pleaded;—Preliminary—(1) There being no sufficient averment that the present defender either did the acts complained of, or gave any instructions or authority to the other defenders to do them, the action, so far as directed against the present defender, is irrelevant. Merits—(2) The act complained of being, and being alleged to be, of a criminal character, the present defender cannot be made liable therefor, merely on the ground that the other defenders were in his employment as gamekeepers, or without proof of special instructions.

The Sheriff-substitute (Spens) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the preliminary plea stated for the Duke of Hamilton, in respect there are no averments stated relevant to infer liability as against him, and assoilzies him from the conclusions of the action: Finds him entitled to expenses," &c.: "Quoad ultra, repels the preliminary pleas stated for the defenders Wood and Tait, in respect it is averred that in their alleged actings, which resulted in the alleged injury to pursuer and death of the dog in question, they were acting in concert."

On appeal, the Sheriff (Dickson) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Adheres to the interlocutor appealed against, in so far as it repels the preliminary pleas for the defenders Wood and Tait; but with this addition, that the said pleas are reserved in so far as they may affect the merits: Quoad ultra recalls the said interlocutor, repels the pleas for the Duke of Hamilton in so far as preliminary, reserving them as above, and, before answer, allows to the pursuer a proof of his averments, and to the defenders a conjunct probation."

Wood and Tait appealed for jury trial to the Court of Session.

The pursuer proposed issues, the first relating to the gamekeepers. The second and third were—"(2) Whether, on or about the 5th day of November 1875, and on, at, or near the turnpike road leading from Glasgow to Carlisle, about a mile distant from Stonehouse, in the county of Lanark, the defenders, James Wood and John Tait, or one or other of them, acting in the employment of the defender, His Grace the Duke of Hamilton and Brandon, wrongfully shot at the pursuer's dog 'Dolly Varden,' whereby the said dog was killed, and the pursuer wounded, to the pursuer's loss, injury, and damage. (3) Whether, on or about the 5th day of November 1875, and on, at, or near the turnpike road leading from Glasgow to Carlisle, about a mile distant from Stonehouse, in the county of Lanark, the pursuer's dog 'Dolly Varden,' was killed, and the pursuer wounded, through the fault of the defenders His Grace the Duke of Hamilton and James Wood and John Tait, or one or more, and which of them, to the pursuer's loss, injury, and damage?"

The Duke objected to the second and third issues, on the ground that there was no averment on record that the keepers were acting under his instructions.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I desire to call attention to certain impertinent and scandalous statements appearing on the record, and we must consider whether it is not necessary to impose some penalty on the author.

The statements were—In the summons:—"And he having delayed prosecuting or enforcing his claims in order that the public prosecutor might do his duty and bring the criminals to justice, but in vain."

In the condescendence:—"It is true that the pursuer lodged information with the public prosecutor of the occurrence libelled, and that the form of apprehension and admitting to bail was gone through, and never afterwards followed out. The pursuer is a humble man, but to himself and his family his life was of some little consideration. The Duke of Hamilton's servants, it is presumed, were of more consideration."

The pursuer's counsel explained that the author of these statements was dead, and he was allowed to amend the record by deleting the passages.

LORD PRESIDENT.—Before adjusting these issues we must dispose of the first plea for the Duke of Hamilton, which the Sheriff has repelled. The question is whether there is an averment that in shooting the dog and injuring the pursuer these men were acting under the instructions and authority of the Duke. I cannot find such an averment. The only statement is that they were "in the service" of the Duke, and "acting with his authority or at least for his behoof," and that is construed by the second issue to bear that these persons "were acting in the employment" of the Duke. I am clearly of opinion that such a statement is not sufficient to infer liability against the Duke. Employment as a gamekeeper does not imply authority to shoot dogs, or do any other illegal act. Therefore I think the second and third issues must be disallowed.

LORD DEAS.—This is a criminal charge, and it would require very specific averments indeed against the master to make him liable for his servant.

LORD ARDMILLAN and LORD MURE concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Disallow the second and third issues: Find that the pursuer has made no relevant averments to support the conclusions of the summons as against the defender, the Duke of Hamilton: Dismiss the action so far as directed against the said defender, and decern: Find the said defender entitled to expenses," &c.

Process—Appeal—Expenses.—An appeal against a judgment in the Dean of Guild Court of Glasgow was lodged in March, and the case was sent to the Short Roll, but had not been put out in the week's roll of cases for hearing. It would probably have been put out the following week, but the appellant lodged a note asking the Court to refuse the appeal. The respondent asked for a larger sum of expenses than £1, 1s., which was the usual sum allowed when an appellant departed from his appeal before the case was put out for hearing. The respondent stated that the papers had been sent to counsel in order to be ready for the hearing, as there had been another case between the parties, and it was necessary to decide whether papers which were produced in that process should be printed in the present appeal.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think this is a special case hardly falling within the general rule. If instructions have been sent to counsel in the expectation of the case appearing in the roll, and this was done in good faith, I cannot help thinking that this appeal cannot be withdrawn without payment of expenses. There was nothing premature in the instructions. I am therefore for finding the respondents entitled to expenses.

The appellant then consented to expenses being modified.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Dismiss the appeal, and decern: Find the appellant liable in expenses, which modify to £5, 5s."

2D DIVISION.
Lord Shand.
I.

In April 1873 Captain Riddell, heir of entail in possession of the estate of Muselie, executed an instrument of disentail of that estate, with the consent of his brothers, the three next heirs of entail living and of full age, under the 3d section of the 11th and 12th Vict. c. 36 (Rutherfurd Act). Thereafter he presented a petition to the Court of Session for warrant to record this instrument of disentail.

Captain Riddell's title to the estate was under two mortis causa deeds dated respectively February 5, 1836, and July 1, 1848, executed by the entailer, Charles Riddell of Muselie, who died on 11th December 1849.

The cause was reported by the Lord Ordinary (Shand) to the First Division, and on 6th February 1874 the Court held (Lord Deas dis.) that although the deeds creating the entail were mortis causa deeds, and the granter survived the 1st of August 1848, the date in the statute, the entail was one dated prior to 1st August 1848, and granted the prayer of the petition.

The deed of disentail having been recorded, Captain Riddell proceeded to divide the estate of Muselie into four lots, with a view to a sale. Lord Polwarth having purchased two portions of the entailed estate, a question was raised as to the validity of the disentail. Captain Riddell, accordingly, on 21st June 1875, raised an action of declarator and implement against Lord Polwarth, and also called as defenders for their interest his brothers and the nearest heirs called in the deeds.

Lord Polwarth lodged defences, and pleaded;—(3) The deeds under which the pursuer held the subjects at the date of the disentail proceedings, being mortis causa deeds, constituted a valid entail from the date only when they came into operation by the death of the granter; and this having occurred subsequent to 1st August 1848, the pursuer could not competently disentail the said subjects, and the instrument of disentail executed and recorded by him is null and void, and he still holds the subjects under the fetters of the said deeds. (4) The validity of the title offered by the pursuer being open to serious doubt, the defender is not bound to accept it.

On 20th July decree in absence was pronounced against the other defenders. At the suggestion of the Lord Ordinary, who proceeded on the authority of the case of Dunlop v. Crawford, Jan. 25, 1850, 11 D. 1062, and Jan. 25, 1850, 12 D. 518,[1] a supplementary summons calling all the heirs of entail in existence as defenders was executed, and on 4th January 1876 conjoined with the original action. On 27th January decree in absence was pronounced against all the defenders called in the supplementary summons, and on 1st February 1876 the Lord Ordinary found, decerned, and declared against Lord Polwarth in terms of the conclusions of the original summons.*

* "NOTE.—The answer to the defence stated in the first three pleas in law for the defender is, that the point raised has been decided—Petition Riddell, 6th February 1874 (1 Rettie, 462). That decision is not res judicata in a question with the defender, but it is a direct authority against the contention that the pursuer was not in a position to disentail the estates, and that the estates have not been validly disentailed. Even if the soundness of the decision were in my opinion doubtful, I should give effect to it, although pronounced in a proceeding ex parte. But the case was very carefully considered, and although one of the learned Judges differed, I see no reason to change the view I entertained in the application to disentail the estates, and which was adopted by the majority of the Court.

"It was further urged that the validity of the title is at least open to such doubt and risk of future objection that the defender is not bound to accept it, even if the Court should be of opinion that the doubt is not well founded, and reference was made to the case of the Duke of Devonshire v. Fletcher, June 19, 1874 (1 Rettie, 1056), and the other cases there mentioned in the opinion of Lord Ardmillan. That case was so special in its circumstances that it would be difficult, I think, to use it as an authority of general application. But however that may be, the present case differs from it and the other authorities referred to, in so far as the question said to raise a doubt in reference to the title has been expressly decided against the defender's view. This is a state of matters entirely different from any case which has hitherto occurred, in which a point of difficulty as to the title which the Court must consider and decide for the first time arises in the very litigation in which the question of the pursuer's liability to complete the contract of sale is raised. It appears to me that it cannot be properly represented that the question of validity of the title is doubtful, where, as here, there is a standing decision in a previous proceeding that the title is good; and on this point it cannot, I think, make any difference that the decision was in accordance with the view of a majority of the Judges only.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be adhered to. I do not think it necessary to go at any length into the reasons for this opinion, as they are entirely coincident with the detailed opinion given by the Lord President in his judgment in the petition, reported in 1 Rettie, p. 462.

I am of opinion that the word "dated" in the Act of 1848 means "bearing date," and, therefore, the date this deed bears is the date of the entail in the sense of the statute.

"Apart from this ground, which is, I think, sufficient to dispose of the defence, the case of Dunlop v. Crawford, 11 D. 1062 and 12 D. 518, seems to be a precedent directly in the pursuer's favour. In that case the Court gave an opportunity to all the persons called as heirs of entail to appear and oppose the sale of the property, and none of them having appeared, decree was given as concluded for. The pursuer having called all the heirs of entail, and taken decree against them, is in the same position as the pursuer in that case, and is entitled to decree unless the defender, who has appeared, can succeed in shewing that the title is bad."

2D DIVISION. Lord Rutherfurd Clark. R.

THOMAS YOUNG AND OTHERS (Trustees of Fox, Earl of Dalhousie), Pursuers.—Rutherfurd.
GEORGE, EARL OF DALHOUSIE, Defender.—Kinnear.

Entail—Constitution of Improvement Debt.

THIS was an action of declarator raised in January 1874 by the late Earl of Dalhousie against Admiral Ramsay, now Earl of Dalhousie, for the purpose of constituting as a debt against the succeeding heirs of entail in the estates of Panmure and others three-fourths of certain sums which he had expended in the improvement of these estates. He died in July 1874 before decree was obtained, leaving a settlement dated December 1872, in which he conveyed to his trustees and executors his whole estate, heritable and moveable, and "in particular, all claims which shall be competent to me or my representatives at my death for entailed improvements on the estates of Panmure and Brechin."

His trustees and executors were sisted as pursuers in his room.

By the deed of entail of these estates it was provided that the late Earl, as institute, or any succeeding heir of entail, should be a creditor of the succeeding heirs for three-fourths of any sums expended in improvements of a certain kind, but it was declared that the executors of the person making such should have no right to repayment unless "he shall, by some probative writing under his hand, have expressly declared or signified his intention that a share of the improvement expenditure should form a charge against the succeeding heirs of entail."

Upon the narrative that questions might arise concerning the amount of the sums expended at a great distance of time, when the material witnesses might be dead, the deed of entail further provided that it should be lawful for the institute and each of the heirs of entail, after expending money on improvements, to bring, if so advised, an action of declarator before the Court of Session, or a process before the Sheriff, in which the next heir of entail should be called, in order to have the amount to be charged upon the entailed estate ascertained.

The defender contended that no probative writing, such as was required by the entail, had been executed by the late Earl; that a mere assignation of all claims competent did not shew the testator's intention that this particular debt should form a charge against the succeeding heirs of entail, and that in consequence the pursuers had no title to sue.

The Court held that the late Earl had by his settlement effectually signified his intention that his trustees should be creditors for the improvement debt which he was in the course of constituting, and repelled the defender's plea of no title.

was pronounced expressly allowing him an opportunity of proving the alleged copula, but he adduced no evidence. Decree of absolvitor was pronounced. A, after an interval of thirty years, raised another action of declarator of marriage against the representatives of the former defender, who had died, and specially averred copula in his condescendence. Held that this action was barred exceptione rei judicatæ, the grounds of action having been disposed of in the former case.

Process—Consistorial Cause.—Opinions, that the Instruction to Commissaries of 1563 as to the finality of decrees in the Commissary Courts after the expiry of a year and day did not obtain with respect to decrees of the Court of Session in causes the jurisdiction in which had been transferred from the Commissaries to that Court.

2D DIVISION. Ld. Craighill. I.

(Vide A B v. C D, June 14, 1844, 6 D. 1148, 16 Scot. Jur. 500; and Lockyer v. Sinclair, March 3, 1846, 8 D. 582, 18 Scot. Jur. 290.)

In 1842 Mr Lockyer raised an action of declarator of marriage in the Court of Session against Miss Sinclair of Freswick, and after sundry procedure the Lord Ordinary (Cuninghame), on 17th July 1845, pronounced an interlocutor assoilzieing the defender. This interlocutor was reclaimed against by the pursuer, and on 3d March 1846 the Second Division adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

The pursuer appealed against these interlocutors to the House of Lords, but owing, as he alleged, to the failure of his agent to lodge the appeal case in due time, the appeal was dismissed.

Miss Sinclair died in June 1870, leaving a trust-disposition and deed of settlement in favour of certain trustees, who accepted of the trust, and proceeded to administer her estate.

Mr Lockyer, on 9th August 1875, raised this action against Mr Ferryman, the beneficiary under Miss Sinclair's trust-deed, and her trustees, and concluded (1) for declarator that he and Miss Sinclair were married persons; (2) for decree of reduction of the various interlocutors pronounced in the course of the former action, and of the extract decree following thereon; (3) for decree of reduction of Miss Sinclair's trust-deed, and certain other deeds following on and relative thereto; and (4) for a decerniture on the defenders to convey and make over the whole of the late Miss Sinclair's means and estate, heritable and moveable, to him.

The pursuer's averments in support of the conclusion for declarator of marriage were substantially the same as those contained in the former action, viz. that the marriage was constituted by the parties signing a marriage-contract, and exchanging holograph acknowledgments of each other as husband and wife, which it was contended were intended to be evidence of de præsenti matrimonial consent, and constituted ipsum matrimonium. Alternatively, it was averred that the marriage had been constituted by copula following upon promises contained in the marriage-contract, and given at other times. The pursuer averred that in the former "declarator of marriage the pursuer's case was, so far as regarded the conclusions of the summons, based upon the foresaid marriage-contract and the acknowledgments or declarations of marriage, dated the 29th August 1839, and upon these documents exclusively. There was no averment of consummation of the marriage by copula made in the summons. An averment of consummation was subsequently introduced into the revised condescendence; but promises of marriage followed by consummation did not form one of the grounds of action, and the pursuer's case was not originally, and never at any time, rested upon it."

The pursuer also averred that, although a proof before answer of his averments on record was allowed him in that action, owing to short-

June 28, 1876. Lockyer v. Ferryman, &c.

In support of the conclusions for reduction the following averments were made:—(Cond. 21) "As before mentioned, the sole evidence adduced by the defender, the said Janet Sinclair or Lockyer, against the pursuer in the said declarator of marriage, was that of Maria Sinclair and Jane Sinclair, and the Court, in construing the said contract of marriage and the said acknowledgments, and the whole attendant circumstances, proceeded upon the evidence of these said witnesses; but the pursuer has ascertained, and now avers and offers to prove, that both of the said witnesses committed wilful and corrupt perjury throughout the course of their evidence, and in particular portions thereof bearing directly upon the construing of the said contract and acknowledgments, destroying the same by explaining them away; that is to say, in the whole substance of their evidence, in so far as it was material and relevant, and in so far as it formed a ground for the judgment of the Court, both in the Outer and Inner Houses, they were suborned to commit perjury by the said Janet Sinclair or Lockyer, and in all the matters hereinafter detailed wherein they committed perjury they acted in concert with her."

Then followed detailed passages from the evidence of these two witnesses—the aunt and sister of Miss Sinclair, both of whom had since died—which the pursuer alleged contained untruths, knowingly sworn to by these witnesses.

The averments as to conspiracy, &c. were,—(Cond. 35) "The decree of the Court in the previous action, in regard to the pursuer's marriage, in so far as it proceeded upon oral testimony, was procured by conspiracy, fraud, perjury, and subornation of perjury. The defender, Janet Sinclair, conspired with her sister, Jane Sinclair, and her aunt, Maria Sinclair, who were examined as witnesses, to swear to facts and circumstances tending to shew that no marriage had been contracted between the pursuer and the said Janet Sinclair or Lockyer. In carrying out this conspiracy they swore falsely, in the knowledge that it was false, to many particulars, some of the chief of which are above set forth, and it was well known to the said Janet Sinclair or Lockyer, who lived with them, brought them to give evidence, and consulted with them day by day about the evidence which they were to give, and which they had given, that what they deponed to was false. The said Janet Sinclair or Lockyer repeatedly, previous to her death, confessed to various persons that she had led her sister and aunt Maria to swear falsely, and she greatly blamed herself particularly for having led her sister to do so, but her aunt, she said, ought to have known better than have so allowed her; and she, the said Janet Sinclair or Lockyer, expressed great contrition therefor. The proof lasted for months, and in the course of it she had ample opportunity to suborn the said witnesses, and she availed herself of her opportunities, by holding repeated, and indeed daily communings with them, for the purpose of fabricating evidence, and inducing them to testify contrary to the truth. Every parole statement which implied that there had been no marriage was a false statement; the whole material depositions of the said witnesses were false, and were procured through subornation of perjury, which was practised by the said Janet Sinclair or Lockyer."

It was further averred that at the date of the proof in the previous action it had been impossible for the pursuer to procure witnesses to prove the consummation of the marriage, as the servants of the family had been bribed and put out of the way, and that it was only after the death of Miss Sinclair and one of her uncles that such evidence had been obtainable. The following averment was made as to one of these witnesses :—"The principal witness of the pursuer's marriage was the said James Olson, now deceased, and previous to his death, when in declining health, he revealed the knowledge which he possessed to many persons, and expressed great indignation and horror at the conduct of the Sinclairs, and fear and shame of his own concern with it, and thereby incited others to follow his example in revealing the facts of the pursuer's marriage. To his intimate friends he stated that he had received from Janet Sinclair or Lockyer and her relatives several hundreds of pounds to go out of the way and keep quiet so long as the proof lasted, in order that the pursuer might not have the benefit of his evidence."

There was also an allegation that fresh witnesses had been discovered who would depone in favour of the pursuer's case.

Mr Ferryman and Miss Sinclair's trustees defended the action. In their defences they narrated the conclusion in the previous action, and the averments of sexual intercourse contained in the revised condescendence (Cond. 16) annexed to the summons in that action, and the plea in law founded thereon. They also quoted an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, on 18th July 1843, in the following terms :—"Before answer, allows the pursuer a proof of his averments, and to the defender a conjunct probation, with this explanation, that the pursuer, before leading any evidence to establish the allegation of copula in London under the 16th article, shall be bound to furnish the defender's agent with a specific note setting forth the time and place of the act said to have been done in London." This passage from the final interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, of 17th July 1845, was also quoted :—"Finds that the pursuer has totally failed to prove that any consummation of the said intended marriage ever took place, as alleged in the libel and record, and on the whole matter sustains the defences, and assoilzies the defender from this action." As also this finding in the interlocutor of the Second Division of 3d March 1846 :—"Finds that the pursuer, by his counsel at the bar, did not insist in the prayer of his reclaiming note, in so far as it prays for an alteration of any of the other findings in the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary than those on the merits of the declarator, and therefore to that extent refuse the prayer of the reclaiming note : Find that in stating his case on the merits of the declarator the pursuer, by his counsel at the bar, expressly admitted that he did not now insist, as any part of his case, in the averment that consummation of the alleged marriage between him and the defender, by conjugal intercourse, had ever taken place, and that he did not mean to represent any part of the proof as intended to prove the same even indirectly."*
